DEALI CLIFF IN THE HIMALAYAS.

THE HIMALAYAS.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

A CROSS the north of India stretches a solitude magnificent in extent—a solitude whose mountain peaks are the loftiest, whose waterfalls are the highest, whose landscapes the sublimest the world possesses. Here are glaciers exceeding those of the Alps; mountain torrents, wild ravines, fertile valleys, green pastures and barren wastes. This solitude is seldom trod by the foot of the explorer, but given over to be the habitation of wild beasts and wilder birds. Here the elephant is secure in his mountain fastnesses, and here the treacherous tiger finds his lair. Here, too, are a few semi-savage tribes, a pastoral race of hardy mountaineers, who tend their flocks on the mountain slopes, and till the narrow strips of ground which these same steep slopes afford; who possess no knowledge of the outer world, and look upon all strangers with entire distrust. This region, occupied by the chain of the Himalayas, is alike the region of perpetual snow and of frightful malaria. Here are found all climates, and the productions of all climates. In the valley lying south of the mountains is the burning heat of the tropics; on the northern slopes the climate and products of the temperate zone; while upon the mountain brows a perpetual winter reigns.

The Himalayas extend along the whole northern frontier of India, separating it from Thibet. A recent traveller thus speaks of these mountains: "The climate of these regions is so extraordinary, the atmosphere so dry, that the line of perpetual snow which extends down to about four thousand yards on the Hindoo slope of the Himalayas, rises on the Thibet side to six thousand yards. The grand and imposing appearance of these mountains arises less from their apparent height than from the space they occupy. This is a feature of which the Alps do not give us the slightest idea. The diameter of the belt occupied by their summits is comparatively very narrow, and the eye runs over their open valleys as it does over a plain. But in the Himalayas, on the contrary, the eye is always attracted to their summits, and when the spectator rises still higher, it is only to discover new heights still more distant. It is a labyrinth without end of black peaks, and gaping chasms, and eternal snows intermingled in a thousand ways. Here are steep, isolated ridges, unmarked by a single ravine, like broken prisms placed on one of their faces; then, the ridges, equally isolated, are curved or bent like an elbow. In other localities they are pyramids piled one upon another, and these project in every direction angles which meet other angles coming from other similar masses. Sometimes they rise higher at the point of junction, and sometimes descend abruptly, forming a narrow gap."

Dhawalaghiri, near the source of the Gunduk River, and Kinchinjanga, or Kunchinganga, further to the eastward, are rivals in height, each approaching, or possibly exceeding, twenty-eight thousand feet above the level of the sea—the highest points upon the earth.

One of the most magnificent views in the whole mountain range can be obtained from the top of the terrace at the Darjeeling, a sanitary station. "The Kinchinjanga, about sixty miles distant, is the principal object in this picture. Rising above the Alpine level on which the spectator stands, sixty-four hundred and eighty-eight yards, the enormous mass seems to rest on an undulating ocean of woody mountains; the eye runs along the line of everlasting snow, and plunges at the horizon into a gaping gulf, where, seven thousand feet below, the Runjeet flows, white with foam, a silver furrow through a tropical forest."

Tradition and superstition have done what they could to add to the interest which attaches to these regions. It is believed that somewhere in these mountain ranges, drained by the Indus, or beyond their barriers in Hindoo Kooh, that the human race made its first appearance upon the earth. Here, among the pinnacles of Mount Himavan, the Hindoos believe their great patriarch, Menu Vaivaswata (the sun-born), to have disembarked with the seven famous sages from the ark, where those eight persons had been preserved by Vishnu from the universal deluge in which all the rest of mankind had perished. Here Menu and his family took up their abode on Mount Sumera, or the "Holy Meru," from whence, when considerably multiplied, his posterity descended to the plains. And it is somewhere in these untrodden solitudes that the Hindoo places his heaven on the summit of Mount of Meru. The site of this mountain cannot be exactly ascertained, but it is popularly placed somewhere between Baumian, Cabul, and Chizni, where the abundance of those cavern dwellings, which were among the earliest abodes of men, would seem to countenance the idea.

"In the midst of the mountains," says Abul Fazl, "are twelve thousand caves cut out of the rock, and ornamented with carving and plaster-work. These places are called Summij, and in ancient times were the winter retreat of the natives. Here are three astonishing idols, one representing a man eighty ells high; another a woman fifty; and the third, which is the figure of a child, measuring fifteen ells in height. In one of these Summijes is a tomb, where is a coffin containing a corpse, concerning which the oldest man can give no account; but it is held in high veneration." These twelve thousand caverns constitute what is called the City of Baumian. There are also recesses hewn out of the solid rock of such extraordinary dimensions that they are supposed to have been temples. Many of the apartments are adorned with niches and carved work, with paintings half obliterated by smoke and time, and with figures in relievo, barbarously disfigured by the Mussulmans. Persian tradition also points to this region as the abode of the progenitors of mankind. The Brahmins turn with superstitious reverence toward the north in every circumstance of life, as the Mohammedan turns toward Mecca.

In the Himalaya Mountains are the favorite abodes of the Hindoo deities, especially in that portion of them where the sacred river Ganges takes its rise. Though the Ganges has many tributaries, all of which drain the southern slopes of the Himalayas, the especially sacred spot is the fountain head of the Ganges proper, which is found at or near Gungootree. "A pilgrimage to Gungootree," writes Emma Roberts, a recent traveller in this locality, "is accounted one of the most meritorious actions which a Hindoo can perform; and in commemoration of his visit to this holy place a Ghoorka chieftain has left a memorial of his conquests and his piety in a small pagoda erected in honor of the goddess on a platform of rock about twenty feet higher than the bed of the river. The Brahmins who have the care of this temple are accommodated with habitations in its close vicinity; there are a few sheds for the temporary residence of pilgrims, many of whom, however, are content with such shelter as the neighboring caves can afford."

The same traveller, in describing the route to this place, says: "The next point of great interest is the summit of a ridge, whence the first view of the Ganges is obtained, a sight of which never fails to raise the drooping spirits of the Hindoo followers, and which excites no small degree of enthusiasm in the breasts of the Christian travellers. The sacred river, as seen from the height, flows in a dark, rapid and broad stream, and, though at no great apparent distance, must still be reached by more than one toilsome march. From a height about two miles from Gungootree the first glimpse, and that a partial one, is obtained of that holy place, which lies sequestered in a glen of the deepest solitude, lonely and almost inaccessible, for few there are who would persevere in surmounting the difficulties of the approach. Considerable distances must be traversed over projecting masses of rough stones, flinty, pointed, and uncertain, many being loose, and threatening to roll over the enterprising individual who attempts the rugged way. Sometimes the face of the rock must be climbed from cliff to cliff; at others, where there is no resting-place for hand or foot, ladders are placed in aid of the ascent, while awful chasms between are passed on some frail spar flung across. These horrid rocks would seem indeed to form invincible barriers to the approach of the holy place, but religious enthusiasm on the one hand, and scientific research, stimulated by curiosity, on the other, renders the barriers inadequate for resisting the invasions of man. The difficult nature of the access, however, prevents the concourse of pilgrims who resort to more easily attainable places esteemed sacred on this hallowed river.

"The grandeur of the scene which opened upon us, as we at length stood upon the threshold of Gungootree, cannot be described in words. Rocks were piled upon rocks in awful majesty, all shivered into points, which rise one upon another in splendid confusion, enclosing a glen of the wildest nature, where the Ganges, beautiful in every haunt, from its infancy to its final junction with the ocean, pours its shallow waters over a bed of shingle, diversified by jutting rocks, and every leaf shadowed by the splendid foliage of some fine old trees. The devotee who undoubtingly believes that every step he takes toward the source of that holy river, which, from his infancy, he has been taught to look upon as a deity, will lead him into beatitude, is content to seek its origin at Gungootree, but the real source of the sacred stream lies still higher, in more inaccessible solitudes; and it was reserved for the ardor of those who measured the altitude of the highest peaks, and penetrated to the utmost limits of man's dominion, to trace the exact birthplace of the holy river. Captains Hodgson and Herbert, in 1818, found at the height of thirteen thousand eight hundred feet above the sea-level the Bhagarati or true Ganges, issuing from beneath a low arch at the base of a vast mass of frozen snow nearly three hundred feet in height, and composed of different layers, each several feet in thickness, and, in all probability, the accumulation of ages."

The route between the Jumna and the Ganges is described by the same traveller: "Descending to the Bini-ke-Gārh, a torrent rushing down a high ridge to the northward, the glen which it watered proved of surpassing beauty; nothing could exceed the loveliness of the foliage which clothed this summer valley or rather vista; for, opening on a view of the precipitous heights of the Unchi-Ghāti, it contrasted its romantic attractions with the sublime features of the mountains beyond. Reaching the junction of the Bini and the Bhagarati, the holy name given to the sacred river, the travellers found the Ganges a noble stream, much wider and deeper than the Jumna, at the same distance from its source, but not so tumultuous.

"Descending to Nangāng by a different route to that already mentioned, we also were compelled to encounter many difficulties; the prospects, however, repaid them. Equally grand, though different in character to those last described, at a very considerable depth below, we looked upon a cultivated scene—the hanging terraces common to these hills, waving with grain, and watered by winding streams, and running along the base of high, woody trees. Beyond, again, were the eternal mountains in all their varieties; snow resting on the crests of some, others majestically grouped with venerable timber, and others bleak, bare and barren, rising in frowning majesty from the green and sunny slopes which smiled below. Between these different ranges ran deep ravines, dark with impenetrable forests, rendered more savage by the awful music of the torrents roaring through their fastnesses, while presently their streams issuing forth into open day, were seen winding round green spots bright with fruit trees.

"Travelling westward we came to the Setlege, a river rising in the most picturesque and interesting part of the vast mountain range—if one part can be said to be more picturesque and interesting than another—and pursuing a tortuous and divergent course through high and narrow banks, rushes onward in a mad course until it reaches the plains of Hindoostan."

Miss C. F. Gordon Cumming, who recently made a pilgrimage into the heart of the Himalayas in the region of this river, setting out from Simla, thus describes the beginning of her journey: "You are surrounded on every side by very shapeless hills, in the springtime all of one dull red earth, though a little later clothed with vivid green like velvet drapery. Here, too, though the depth of the khuds is very great, and the slope so rapid that you can scarcely find footing when once off the beaten road, they have none of the beauty of rock or precipice, and the long interminable lines in continuous sweep, become very wearisome to the eye. Moreover, every hill facing the south is utterly barren, and when our route lay along these, the dreary expanse of red earth was truly hideous. On the other hand, as we turned to face the north, we found ourselves surrounded with a wealth of vegetation that made amends for the bleaker side—a stunted lilac acacia clothing the whole khud so thickly as to give the appearance of heather, while masses of very sweet roses (red, pink, white and yellow,) covered every tree with their long, graceful clusters. Clematis, also, and the sweetest white jessamine made the air fragrant.”

Speaking of the inhabitants of this region, Miss Gordon Cumming says: “Their dress is altogether like that of the Lowland Scot. At Simila we bid adieu to turbans and white drapery, and to women clad in breeks. Henceforth all the men are dressed alike, in a warm blouse and trousers of sonsy gray homespun, with similar plaid over the shoulders. The women are dressed in bright striped woollen material—a long petticoat and plaid, caught in a heavy fold at the back, and leaving one shoulder bare, showing a good arm and quaint bracelets.”

Of the religious faith of these people the same writer says: “It is a very small proportion of the children trained in the [missionary] schools who show the slightest tendency to become Christians in after years, the most that can be hoped being that gradually prejudice may melt away, and the people may lose faith in their own superstitions. Already very many are ashamed openly to call themselves devil worshippers, as, in fact, they are; but the more unsophisticated point out their temples as being ‘Sheitan Ka Bungalow.’ Their faith varies greatly from that of the Hindoo of the plains in more ways than merely abstaining from ablutions, which is the most palpable difference. They say there are thirty-three millions of gods, and that it is quite impossible to worship them all; therefore, they omit the good spirits, who will not harm them, and devote all their energies to propitiate the evil spirits, who are always on the alert to do mischief. So every here and there along the route you see a sacred bush covered with rags, as votive offerings to the spirit of stream or forest; and here every passer-by halts to do obeisance, or make ‘pooja,’ as they say.”

These people cultivate the tiny, narrow ridges of the hills, sometimes not four feet wide, which are artificially levelled and act as fields.

Another writer describes as a peculiarity of the Himalayas a malarious line which extends, during a certain season of the year, nearly the whole length of the range of mountains. At the foot of the mountains, both before and after the rainy season, may be seen a dense line of fog called the Teray, signifying a noisome vapor. Even the animals, without exception, abandon this belt about the middle of April not to return until the middle of October. The tigers and elephants betake themselves to the mountains, and the monkeys and antelopes to the plains. Human beings who are obliged to traverse this region report that not a sound can be heard in this immense solitude given over to malaria. The only practicable pass through the Teray is formed by the Setlege, which, issuing from the sacred lakes, it takes a rapid and tortuous course through high black walls. It is not more than fifty yards wide, but its great depth and rapid fall, estimated at over thirty feet in a mile, makes it a powerful watercourse. It takes high rank among the streams deified by Sanscrit mythology, in which it was known under the name of Satadrore.

Miss Gordon Cumming gives an interesting account of her journey, from which we make further extracts: “From Wangtu to Urni the road lies close to the roaring Setlege, from whose wearisome noise we were thankful to escape, and hurry on to Rogi, where the real grandeur of the march begins—for many miles the path is cut along the face of tremendous cliffs—in many places sheer perpendicular. Far below rushes the swollen river, full of melting snow from the grand range which towers above us. Three peaks from this group—Raal Dung, in the centre, twenty-one thousand feet, and on either side the greater and less Khylas, both over nineteen thousand. The Khylas is regarded by the Paharis as the dwelling-place of the Great Spirit, chief of all the gods, whom they reverence greatly, and serve with exceeding fear, as a Being of infinite terror. As to anything in their faith that can gladden life—anything like love or companionship, or daily help, that is utterly unknown and quite incomprehensible. The only idea is fear of a mighty power that will send all manner of famine and disease unless they are forever striving to propitiate it. One means hereto is the perpetual offering of prayers by machinery. The priests and many of the people walk about always with a small prayer-mill in their hands, turning it as they go. It is engraven with the words, ‘O mane pad me han’ (to him of the Lotus and the jewel), an ascription which is carved all over all sacred places. Inside the mill is a strip of paper, on which a short but very comprehensive prayer is written in Thibetan—and which Mr. Pagell, the Moravian Missionary, assures me is said by the people to be a prayer for the six classes of living creatures, i. e., the souls in Heaven, the evil spirits in the air, men, animals, souls in purgatory, and souls in hell.”

The same traveller crossed the Setlege at Chergaon on one of the native bridges. These bridges are nothing more than a cable stretched across from one bank to the other. A large wooden ring is attached to the cable, and to this ring travellers suspend themselves and their baggage, and are drawn quickly to the opposite side. Below them roars a furious torrent, into which they must inevitably fall if the cable gives way.

In these mountain regions a curious change in social customs occurs. We have it upon the authority of Miss Gordon Cumming, that while below this point polygamy prevails, men buying and selling their wives at pleasure, “farther up the valley, where the people are very poor, and the tiny ridges of cultivation will not support large families, polyandry is common. The elder brother of a family chooses one wife for himself and all his brothers—the children are common property, and seem equally beloved by all the family.”

On the above-quoted lady's return to this point, at the approach of the rainy season, she found a great change in the appearance of the landscape: “A march along very precipitous cliffs next brought us to Wangtu, whence we merely retraced our former steps, though often almost wondering whether the scenes so altered by the rapid growth of vegetation could really be the same. Every mossy stem was now clothed to the topmost bough with every species the sea, and shut in by a mountain wall, reaching sometimes to a height of fifteen thousand feet, is regarded by the Hindoos as a kind of terrestrial paradise. Its seclusion from the outer world is complete, as of the few openings the greater number are impassable during the winter, and even the main gateway does not admit of the passage of wheeled vehicles.

Tradition says that this valley was originally a lake shut in by mountains; but some convulsion of nature made an opening through the rocky walls, and the pent-up waters escaped, leaving only lakelets and streams behind. Fields of perpetual green, where violets, roses, narcissuses, and other delicate and of graceful form in wonderful luxuriance, while the ground below was brilliant with large white anemones. The hills we have left so dreary and brown were now one vivid green, with deep-blue shadows running right up to the snows, and showing red and purple cliffs, the whole half-veiled by soft, mysterious 'clouds of dewy steam,' which one of our men pointed out, unconsciously reminding me of an unscientific translation of King David's words: 'See,' he said, 'how the mountains do smoke!'

At the northwestern limit of the Himalayas, surrounded by a protecting arm of the mountains, there is found "the happy valley," the Vale of Cashmere. This valley, elevated nearly a mile above the level of fragrant flowers grow wild, meet the eye at every turn. Around, on all sides, rise ranges of low, green hills, dotted with trees, while the peaks of the Himalayas, pointed, jagged or broken into a thousand fantastic forms, pierce the clouds with the dazzling lustre of their eternal snows.

Still, in spite of its name, the "Happy Valley," during a period of less than ten years' duration, lost by famine, pestilence and earthquake, three-fourths of its inhabitants, reducing their number to one quarter of a million.

Including the mountains which form its boundary, Cashmere is about one hundred miles in length, by sixty in breadth.

Serinagur (City of the Sun) is the chief town, and situated upon the banks of the Hydaspes, a rapidly-flowing river. The city is intersected by numerous canals, which give it the name of the Venice of India. A recent French traveller thus describes this city: "The vast city, with its innumerable gardens and parks, lay spread out before me, and, towering out of its central portion rose the tall rock on which is erected the ancient citadel. Winding through the midst of this scene, the rapid current of the Hydaspes contrasted strangely with the still waters of twenty canals, where hundreds of light barques flitted to and fro, reminding me of the caïques of the Bosphorus. And on the outskirts of the city, instead of those filthy suburbs which disgrace all our great capitals, I saw gleaming everywhere, amid the dark green of the gardens, and of the avenues of plane trees, light and coquettish wooden cottages, whose balconies, overhanging the river, were adorned with carvings almost as delicate as lace itself. At my feet terminated the famous avenue of poplars, broad as the widest street in Paris, and more than a mile in length, and the trees forming which average more than a hundred feet in height. On my right was the lake, fast becoming overgrown with reeds, from which rose three or four untenanted palaces, with their many-hued pavilions. There was an indescribable charm and enchantment in the scene. I could now easily comprehend why this magnificent jewel had been named the Indian Venice."

The first evening of his stay at Serinagur, the traveller whom we have just quoted was invited to a private entertainment, where he witnessed a dance performed by a party of bayaderes, or dancing-girls. "No entertainment," he states, "is complete without these. On this occasion there were present some fifteen or twenty women, the pick of the bayaderes of Serinagur. They glittered from head to foot with gold and jewelry. Their beauty, plastic and cold, harmonized well with their dance, which was simply a series of statue-like attitudes, wholly antique in character. They advanced two by two, gliding rather than stepping, moving slowly, softly, and with highly-studied and even correct art. I could easily have fancied them figures from a bas-relief on one of the Grecian temples of the age of Phidias. A sort of trembling of their naked feet set in tinkling motion the little golden bells and rings with which their leggings were heavily ornamented, and the metallic or cadenced sound thus produced had a strange and peculiar effect on the ear and the nerves."

There is one singular fact about the inhabitants of this valley. The original Cashmere tongue and characters are now abandoned and forgotten by the present inhabitants of the Vale of Cashmere, while they are preserved in all their purity by a colony of shawl-makers, who, leaving their homes to strangers have settled at Loodianah, an English town in the Punjab, at least two hundred miles distant.

The principal industry of Cashmere is the manufacture of shawls, whose reputation is world-wide.

These shawls require for fabrication an average of four months of labor each.

The present principality of Cashmere, which includes not only the celebrated valley of that name, but smaller Indian provinces, contains a population numbering about eight hundred thousand. It has a fine army, created and commanded by an American by the name of Gardner, who figured more or less conspicuously on the Confederate side in our recent rebellion. When the rebellion was quelled, he retired from his native country in apparent disgust, and seeking the antipodes, found a home and good fortune awaiting him in the "Vale of Bliss."

Cashmere, surrounded by snowy peaks, like an emerald in a setting of crystal, marks the furthermost extent of the Himalayas toward the northwest. The Indus, gathering its waters from the northern slopes, circles a long, lone stream without a single tributary around the northwest extremity of the range, and traversing the Punjaub (the country of the five rivers), enters Scinde, and from thence discharges itself through many mouths into the Indian Ocean.

From a remote period the inhabitants of Cashmere have possessed a high reputation for their ingenuity and industry, as compared with the rest of the Hindoos. The arts and sciences flourished amongst them, and their various manufactures, especially of cabinet-ware and inlaid-work, were renowned all through the Orient. But what most tended—and, indeed, still tends to give them a widespread reputation was, and is, their exquisite shawls, those soft and delicate fabrics, the delight and desire of the fairer sex throughout the world.

"It is difficult for me," writes M. Lejean, "to speak of Cashmere without saying a word in regard to the fabrication of those famous shawls which are at once the wealth and the pride of the principality. It is well to know that the goat which furnishes the hair of which these shawls are made is not indigenous to Cashmere. It is found principally in Thibet, from which country the hair is carried in the rough to Serinagur. There it is first cleansed—a difficult operation, inasmuch as it contains nearly fourteen parts in thirty of foreign substances, as dust, fragments of wood and the like, and only ten parts of hair available for shawls. It is then spun, a labor which occupies about a hundred thousand women, of whom perhaps one-tenth spin on their own account. They work steadily all day long and a portion of the night, those who cannot afford to buy oil for their lamps profiting by the light of the moon. The thread having been spun, the next process is to dye it, and it is here that the ingenuity of the Indian dyers shines conspicuous, especially in the number and variety of the shades of color they are able to impart to the material put into their hands. After it is dyed, the thread is given to the manufacturer to be woven. The manufacturer always works to order. He has his designer, who furnishes him with a design. This he hands over to his European correspondent or agent, who suggests improvements or corrections, if any are needed, and he design is then placed in the hands of the weaver."

I have found it impossible, within the limits of a magazine article, to give anything like an adequate description of these wonderful Himalayas ("the abode of snow"), but I may have awakened interest concerning them, so that my readers will seek elsewhere for that information which may be obtained in the records of travellers who have climbed their fastnesses and traversed their wilds.

"THE CHILD IS FATHER OF THE MAN."

I.—HER FATHER'S DARLING.

A TINY, happy face,
Six sunny tumbled curls,
Two rosebud lips apart
Disclosing milk-white pearls.

Two wondering wide blue eyes,
Now bright with baby gladness;
Beaming on some small prize,
Now wet with some small sadness.

Plump shoulders, soft and white,
For kissing surely meant;
Rumpled and crumpled muslins,
With here and there a rent.

Dimpled little fingers,
Everywhere they fumble;
Restless, little active legs,
Now and then a tumble.

Saucy little stampings,
Pretty little rebel!
Saucy small expressions
In a silvery treble.

Ringling shouts of laughter,
Sobs of deepest woe;
Going to see wee piggies,
Hurt a tiny toe.

Now naughty wilful ways,
And most indignant glances;
Anon her stick a racer,
She caracoles and prances.

A little sunbeam ever,
With very softening power,
Oh! how her father loves her,
His sweet unopened flower!

II.—THE FATHER'S ANGEL.

A tiny, weary face,
A hot, flush'd cheek and brow,
"Nurse me, papa, I'm tired,
I don't want dolly now."

A tossing, restless head,
The red lips parched and dry,
"Drink some nice water, darling:"
"Papa, what makes you cry?"

The bright hair like a halo,
A little gasp for breath,
The gentle moaning ceases,
"Doctor, it can't be death?"

A tiny, quiet face,
A rounded cheek of snow,
Her "Father's little darling"
Is her father's angel now.

No gleesome merry shouting,
"Papa is at the gate,"
No hurrying little footsteps
For fear she'd be too late.

No rosy lips upheld
To get the look'd-for kiss,
No clasping little arms—
"Was ever pain like this?"

No fondling soft wee hands
To soothe away the care,
No blue eyes glancing bright
Because "Papa is there!"

No sunny, tumbled curls,
One has her father now,
Cut from the little pallid face,
From the little icy brow.

Dear Lord! I know 'tis well,
I know Thou heard'st my prayer,
But home and heart are empty
Without my darling there.

III.—HIS DARLING'S HOME.

They say "he has forgotten
How hard it was to part,"
But the wound is not quite heal'd
Yet—in her father's heart.

Although once but a name,
Heaven's very real now—
Since the golden curl was cut
From the little icy brow.

Since the small white thing was laid
In the little coffin-bed,
And home and heart were desolate
As word hath never said.

Yes—Heaven is real now—
His loving darling's home;
A tiny hand is beckoning,
A tiny voice says "Come."

A tiny face is gazing
When he kneeleth down to pray,
To beg the Lord to keep him
To walk the narrow way.

For the father of an angel
Must be good, and pure, and true;
Keeping the better country,
His darling's home, in view.

This world was all too dear,
Now the bright gold looks dim,
And that was why his darling
Was taken up from him.

Because in paths desiling
Weak, erring feet might roam,
The Lord made Heaven real,
Made Heaven "Nellie's home."

THE AURORA BOREALIS.

BY E. CHARDON.

EVERY one is familiar with the appearance of the Aurora Borealis as it illuminates the the northern sky during the autumn and winter months. Sometimes it is in the form of an plays are, according to Baron von Humboldt, the closing act in a magnetic storm. They usually precede and portend cold weather. To view these displays in all their beauty and magnificence, one needs to approach the Arctic regions.

In the picture we see two ships lying in the midst arch, sometimes in stationary rays, and again in irregular streaks which dart and flash like tongues of flame. Sometimes it lights up the whole northern horizon like an immense bonfire. These auroral diaof icebergs and broken ice. Overhead is a brilliant arch of electrical light, which illuminates the whole scene, and presents a weird beauty, its brilliancy and color reflected from the smooth surfaces of the ice.

There is nothing else in nature which can equal a display like this.

Charles Francis Hall, who made an expedition to the Arctic regions several years ago, recounts in his book of travels a number of beautiful auroral displays. One of these he describes as follows:

"On November 2d, at 6 P.M., there was another magnificent display of the Aurora. From east to west—south of us—was a beautiful arch of living gold. The eastern base rested, to all appearance on the high land, as did also the western, and the centre of the arch was ten degrees above the horizon south.

"The wind was blowing strong, and the aurora truly appeared as possessing life. It danced to and fro from one extreme to the other. Its colors rivalled the rainbow, the pea-green predominating over the other hues. At the east a bank of golden rays shot up far above all the rest. The stars were obscured as the 'merrie dancers' swept along in piles of coronations. The arch continued to recede, falling lower and lower; the reverse is the usual course of the Aurora; as far as my observation has extended not a cloud could be seen.

"At 7 P.M. the Aurora was lifting its arches zenithward; there were now two reaching from east to west, and for some portion of the way there were three. The wind was blowing almost a gale, the thermometer being six degrees above zero. The stronger the breeze, the more beautiful was the Aurora, the brisker its races and dancing, and the more glowing its colors."

Baron von Humboldt gives the following general description of the Aurora Borealis:

"To group in a single picture all the features which characterize this phenomenon, we must describe the different phases which mark the development of a perfect Aurora Borealis. At the horizon near the magnetic meridian of the place of its appearance, the sky, which was quite clear, begins to grow darker, and a sort of nebulous veil is formed, and mounts slowly upward, to about the height of eight or ten degrees. Across this dark segment, which varies in color from brown to violet, the stars are visible as if seen through a thick fog; a little later a larger arc appears on the border of this segment, which is white at first, and then yellow, but always of intense brilliancy. Sometimes this luminous arc seems agitated for hours together, by a sort of effervescence and continual change of form, before emitting the rays and columns of light which mount toward the zenith.

"The more intense this polar light, the more lively are its colors, which pass through all the intermediate shades, from violet and bluish white to green and purple red. It is the same with electric sparks; the intensity of their color is in direct proportion to the force of their tension and the violence of the explosion.

"Sometimes the columns of light seem to shoot up from the brilliant arch, mingled with dark rays resembling a thick smoke, and sometimes they rise simultaneously from different points of the horizon, and merge in a sea of flame, of which it is impossible to represent the magic splendor, for the rapid undulations cause it to vary in form and brilliancy every instant.

"At certain moments the light, which is increased by the rapidity of the magnetic whirlwind, is so intense as to render the play and undulation of the Aurora Borealis perfectly visible even in bright daylight.

"Around the point in the heavens which corresponds to the direction of the magnetic needle, when freely suspended by its centre of gravity, when the display has reached its highest development, the rays unite and form what is called the crown of the Aurora Borealis, a sort of celestial canopy, shining with a soft, quiet light. It is rare that the Aurora is complete, or continues long enough to form this crown; but when it appears it always indicates the end of the display. The rays begin to rarify, contract and lose their color. The crown and luminous arches dissolve, and very soon nothing is seen on the celestial vault but large, motionless, nebulous spots, very pale or ash-colored. These vanish in turn, as well as the dark segment which marked the commencement of the display, and soon nothing is seen but a thin, whitish cloud with ragged borders, or divided into little dappled spots; the last traces of one of the most dazzling spectacles that can be offered to the eye of man, in the high regions of the atmosphere."

WINTER.

IT was Wordsworth, we believe, who said, on looking at a tree in winter, that, if it were not for fact and experience, no imagination could reach the possibility of its being clothed again with blossoms and verdure. Life seems gone forever. We have all felt something like this, in looking at a tree stripped by the frost of every sign of life. The coarse, hard bark has in it no prophecy of soft green leaves, or tender blossoms of grace and beauty. All seems dead.

But we know that, after a short sleep, the tree will awake to a new life, and put on its beautiful raiment again. Our thoughts go beyond the present to the coming spring, and we can say, in the language of Mrs. Barbauld:

"O Nature, beautiful Nature, beloved child of God! Why dost thou sit mourning and desolate? Has thy Father forsaken thee? Has He left thee to perish? Art thou no longer the object of His care?

"He has not forsaken thee, O Nature! Thou art His beloved child, the eternal image of His perfections; His own beauty is spread over thee, the light of His countenance is shed upon thee. Thy children shall live again, they shall spring up and bloom around thee; the rose shall again breathe its sweetness on the soft air, and from the bosom of the ground verdure shall spring forth.

"Shall the rose and the myrtle bloom anew, and shall man perish? Shall goodness sleep in the ground, and the light of wisdom be quenched in the dust; and shall tears be shed in vain? They also shall live; their winter shall pass away; they shall bloom again. The tears of thy children shall be dried up when the eternal year proceeds. Oh, come that eternal year!"

Of the many aspects of winter, that presented by snow is the most attractive and beautiful. There is an indescribable charm in the first soft falling of the flakes, dropping down so gently, and silently, and gracefully. "The poem of the air," as Longfellow calls it in his "Snow Flakes:"

"Out of the bosom of the air,
Out of the cloud-folds of her garments shaken,
Over the woodlands brown and bare,
Over the harvest fields forsaken,
Silent, and soft, and slow
Descends the snow.

theme. Her picture of the weird changes wrought in a few hours by a snow storm is exceedingly fine:

"Lo, what wonders the day hath brought,
Born of the soft and slumbrous snow!
Gradual, silent, slowly wrought,
Even as an artist, thought by thought,
Writes expression on lip and brow.

"Hanging garlands the eaves o'erbrim,
Deep drifts smother the paths below;
The elms are shrouded, trunk and limb,
And all the air is dizzy and dim
With a whirl of dancing, dazling snow.

"Dimly out of the baffled sight
Houses and church-spires stretch away;

"Even as our cloudy fancies take Suddenly shape in some divine expression,
Even as the troubled heart doth make
In the white countenance confession,
The troubled sky reveals
The grief it feels.

"This is the poem of the air,
Slowly in silent syllables recorded;
This is the secret of despair,
Long its cloudy bosom hoarded,
Now whispered and revealed
To wood and field."

With her usual grace of style and beauty of description, has Florence Percy written on the same

The trees, all spectral and still and white,
Stand up like ghosts in the failing light,
And fade and faint with the blinded day.

"Down from the roofs in gusts are hurled
The eddying drifts to the waste below;
And still is the banner of storm unfurled,
Till all the drowned and desolate world
Lies dumb and white in a trance of snow.

"Slowly the shadows gather and fall,
Still the whispering snow-flakes beat;
Night and darkness are over all:
Rest, pale city, beneath their fall!
Sleep, white world, in thy winding-sheet!

"Clouds may thicken, and storm-winds breathe;
On my wall is a glimpse of Rome—
Land of my longing!—and underneath
Swings and trembles my olive wreath;
Peace and I are at home, at home!"

In a volume of poems by Mrs. E. H. Barker, entitled "Marguerite, Baroness of Leichenstein, and other Poems," published by Lippincott & Co., there is one called "The Frost Spirits," which, for delicacy, finish, and beauty of imagery, is scarcely equalled by anything we have seen. There is not a lover of poetry among our readers who will not thank us for giving it entire:

"Beautiful Spirits of Frost and Snow,
I hear your wings flutter as on ye go—
Ye change the drops of the wintry rain
Into castles and groves on my window-pane:
Castles and groves, and knights with plumes,
Scenes from the tropical climes of balm,
Carriage and steeds with liveried grooms,
Monks in cathedral singing a psalm;
Fern leaves growing near silvery lake,
Laplanders skimming the glittering snow,
Fleet reindeers the light sledges take,
Sending the diamond dust to and fro—
Wide is the reign of your scepter'd hands,
Ye gather your spoils from earth's many lands.

"One winter eve, as he looked at home
On the panel'd glass from the dashing rain,
Saw, did not Angelo see the dome
Of St. Peter's grow on his window-pane?
For, on mine, a Gothic doorway opens,
Inviting my fancy to enter in,
It seems to look on the sunny slopes
That surround the palace of Conradin:
Crowds are there (who throng the street)
Entering in at the open door;
I almost think I see their feet
Tread on the tiles of the marble floor—
Here ye spread, in Honiton lace,
The mazy wet, more delicate now,
Than ever a queen, in her queenly grace,
Wore in a veil on her stately brow.
Deep set edge, with tracery rare;
Not the gossamer gauze, nor the fabrics light,
The dark-eyed, gemm'd sultanas wear,
Those robes that float on the summer air
Of the Persian's cloudless night,
Can with thy textures, O Sprites! compare—
For Dacca's thread was ne'er spun as fine
As the one that forms your fairy line.

"Surely, spirits unseen, ye bring us
All that is lovely to mortal eyes,
Ye wake the mystical songs within us,
That keep tune to the march of the starry skies:
All that is beautiful, just, and true,
Comes from the Veiled Universe, where
There spreads through space a most delicate air,
And perfect types, upspring and new,
Are made indigenous there:
From those come, as now, from the frost and rain,
Original sketches stamped on our brain,

Thus photograph'd here from above;
But verily, earth can copy but faintly
The glory of forms, angelic and saintly,
Invoked to our pillows, by prayer or by love.

"How do we enter the Land of Dreams?
Is there an angel with ivory wand
To open the gates of its palaces fair,
To lead us on by its crystal streams,
To drink of the joy we find only there?
By the light of the earth, unseen they stand—
Like the wonderful city, 'neath Araby's skies,
That Golden City, whose gates were closed
Forever to mortals' longing eyes:
And then, when closed, came a mighty cloud,
Dark and dense as a demon's shroud,
That circled the beautiful city, and hid it
Evermore from him who bid it
In the desert of Aiden rise:
The Arab prince, who thought to make
A Heaven on Earth, and had daringly plann'd
Each Palace of Gold in its mirror'd lake,
Its gardens fair, and its castles grand;
Pillar'd porticoes running along
Perfumed rivers that flowed in song,
Banqueting halls, and towers high,
With turrets lost in the cloudless sky—
In that City of Arem, so vast and fair,
The treasures of earth were gather'd there.
All that the soul of man could ask
Did the Arab prince supply;
And there, when ended his pleasant task,
It vanished from his eye.

"Was this a dream, or a story told
With a moral, by Arab sages old,
To teach us how vain is a city of gold
Built in the desert here?
For the clouds of Earth, and Time's whirling sands,
Cover the cities of earthly lands,
And our hopes, like Sheddad's, have found their bier.
Spirits of Air, with your silver wands,
Open the gates of your hidden realms,
Touch our closed lids with your magical hands,
Take from our eyes the earthly films:
Through the winter's frost and summer's heat,
Come, with the pat of your dainty feet,
And still in the dash of the gusty rain,
Stop, as you go by my window-pane."

CHEERFUL.—Emerson says: "Do not hang a dismal picture on your wall, and do not deal with sables and glooms in your conversation." Beecher follows with: "Away with these fellows who go howling through life, and all the while passing for birds of Paradise. He that cannot laugh and be gay, should look to himself. He should fast and pray until his face breaks forth into light." Talmage then takes up the strain: "Some people have an idea that they comfort the afflicted when they groan over them. Don't drive a hearse through a man's soul. When you bind up a broken bone of the soul, and you want splints, do not make them of cast-iron." After such counsellings and admonitions, lay aside your long faces.

PEARLS AND DISH-WATER.

BY KATHIE KEENE.

"Oh, dreary life!" we cry, "Oh, dreary life!"
 And still the generations of the birds
 Sing through our sighing, and the flocks and herds
 Serenely live, while we are keeping strife
 With Heaven's true purpose in us, as a knife Against which we may struggle."

"NINE hundred and sixty-three women, and five thousand seven hundred and forty-one children!"

That was all the major said, when he opened the kitchen-door, and saw three of his little girls taking a bath in one corner of the room; little Dodie in another, devouring the doughnuts which rosy-faced Hallie was frying over a very hot stove; while Bessie sliced apples in a very little closet, and Mrs. Major superintended the whole, and darted to and fro so swiftly that I think the major must have counted her four or five times to make out his number.

Hallie looked up and caught the look of dubiouness on her father's face.

"Why, Papa Major, you're too bad! there's only mamma, and Bessie, and Dode, and Lily, and Jen, and Millie, and myself, and we can get along very comfortably in this dear, little place, by going sideways." And then papa had to laugh at Hallie's red face and beaded forehead.

'Twas in the middle of July, girls, when, you know, every effort costs a perspiration-drop, and she did look funny, but her spirit was up, and she went on: "I know it's warm, pa, dear, but I take a spiteful satisfaction in proving to myself that we girls, that's mamma and I, cannot cook over the stove with hands and face as white as 'Mrs. Holabirds,' or cheeks as pink as 'Rosamond's.'"

She was obliged to raise her voice at the last, for the three little girls in the bath-tub had kept up deafening screams for papa to "go 'way! we're washing us—'tis not proper! Oh, go 'way!"

After vainly trying to hide behind each other, they had apparently collapsed into the bottom of the tub, but their yellow heads kept bobbing up, to see if the coast was clear, and so the major, looking very much shocked, retired behind the door, and talked through the crack.

"You know it's about dinner time?"

"Oh, why no! it can't be—we're not nearly ready!"

"But it is, and what's more—" Here the door opened a little wider, and bob went the three "Graces" in a state of nudity. "What's more, General Trefethen's come to dinner."

Everybody dropped everything and screamed. Nobody says anything instantly after a thunder-clap, you know; there's a second's silence, before the confusion comes. Dode clutched theatrically at her long-sleeved apron, and spoke first.

"Good land of Goshen! The butcher and the baker haven't been near us to-day, and there isn't a scrap of meat for dinner."

"Well," frowned the major, "this is the beauty of living in a country village, where we have no market. If I was only a farmer, independent of meatmen! anything but a poor lawyer, in a place where I don't belong! What shall we do?"

Then Mrs. Major began to give hurried orders, and Hallie dropped her doughnuts, spattering her bared arms with the boiling fat, and just darted out of the room, and up, over the stairs, into her own little chamber, and down on her knees. Please don't laugh at what she said. I insist that 'twas a prayer, only kitchenish, instead of prayer-meetingish.

"Oh, dear God, we're in such a fuss down-stairs! Nothing for dinner, and he's come! Oh, please do send the meat-man or something, and oh, do help us hurry quick! Amen!"

Then down-stairs again went the brown calico and flushed face, and reached the foot just in time to answer a knock at the porch-door. Of course we know it was the butcher, and we should have done the proper thing, but Hallie, in her excitement, held out both hands to him, and, with a beaming countenance, told him she was "so glad to see him! Why didn't he come before? Sit right down! She would take ten pounds of nice steak!" and then climaxed the poor man's astonishment by bringing a chair for the dripping slices.

The kitchen looked encouraging. Children and doughnuts had been expelled, and mother was preparing the fresh vegetables, with a little, amused smile on her face, which Hallie's extravagant order for beefsteak had produced. Hallie began to stir up one of her favorite puddings, exclaiming, "Mother Nell, you're the wonderfullest woman for an emergency! I believe you would be perfectly at home in an earthquake," when she found that Bess was entertaining the general in the parlor, and Dode was arranging the china on the table in the great, cool hall. "Thank Heaven for one shady place in this dove-cote," she said.

That pudding was beaten feverishly. Hallie fairly ran with it to the oven. Then she turned round, and seeing there was no more to do till the potatoes were soft, deliberately sat down and began to cry. Mrs. Darton smoothed the little, fluffy curls off her daughter's broad, white forehead, a very fair forehead, too, notwithstanding its "steaminess" a little while ago.

"Is my Hallie so very much agitated by a late dinner?"

"Wait a minute, till I've weeped my little weep; Mother Nell, then I shall make some remarks," and Hallie choked with a great sob, that wanted to be a laugh.

"Mother, this is the way we shall tell of it: We had unexpected company to dinner, and because the hall-clock was slow, and the meat-man late, we were very much hurried when we learned the time. Now, wont that be a mean way of expressing how much I've suffered in this little while? Wasn't it the whole world to me whether the butcher came or not? Didn't I feel terribly guilty because dinner wasn't ready, and experience just as deep emotions of despair, joy, anxiety, and the reaction, as any girl who had accidentally murdered somebody, and then found that her victim wasn't dead, after all? Yet she would think she had cause to have hysterics for a week—and—and—what I mean to say, is, that we Bridgets, Lady Bridgets, like you and me, ma, who take an interest in things, find the most of our hard work in the anxiety—the 'for fear,' the hurrying one minute, and waiting the next. Some people may do housework like automaton—maybe that's what they mean by taking work easy; but we go heart-deep into it, you see, and carry all our emotions and reasonings into making pies, or settling the childrens' quarrels. You provoking woman! You shouldn't laugh when an experienced person like me discourses to an innocent like you! You've only done housework for forty years, you know! Now, if it had been anybody but you, your education and accomplishments would have got crowded out. How did you keep them up? How shall I? Father's given me every advantage, and Mrs. Grundy says Hallie Darton is an accomplished young lady, and has finished her education. But I know better; for I'm deep in the 'art culinary' now, and I confess that it does seem a little absurd for us to try to keep up our music and literature in the midst of so much dish-water! Don't you think there's danger that our struggles for Mrs. Browning and Shakespeare will grow fainter and fainter, and—and—oh! here's a striking figure, Mother Nell, entirely original, and our science and poetry will get so diluted with dish-water, that, way up on this Vermont hill, where we cannot get help, we shall submit to being flooded with dish-water; in short, dish-water will beat."

Hallie's eyes were big and shining now. They had shot out her idea, before her hyperbolic, little sentence could half convey it. Mrs. Darton was an experienced lady. She herself had dreamed dreams, and sighed for a life to which she was fitted, and at last learned to be content with what she had. But now there was no time for much of an answer to Hallie's indignant appeal, so she only sang lightly, and began to peel the potatoes.

"Do you think that Katie guessed Half the wisdom she expressed?"

Hallie peeped into the oven.

"Oh, my pudding looks like a great gold puff-ball! Mamma, isn't General Trefethen that man with the curly mustache, who used to call me 'Nellie's blue-eyed baby,' when he came to see you and papa? and wasn't he the nice boy you've told me about, who used to play 'little brother' to your 'sistering,' when you was his teacher in Boston?"

"Yes, dear," said Mrs. Darton, poisoning a potato on her fork, and standing still, with a happy, far-away look on her worn face. "I am proud to claim Irving Trefethen as an old friend. He was a frank, generous boy, and is a brave, noble gentleman. I wonder if there'll be any silver in that brown mustache of his?"

"Hadn't I better put on my white muslin before dinner?" asked Hallie, blushing.

Mrs. Darton looked her over, as mothers will, in their kindly "What-can-make-you-prettier?" way.

"That dark calico suits best your rosy face, daughter," was all she said, but Hallie knew by the look that her face was not too rosy, nor her dress too dark, and by a sudden impulse mother and daughter turned and kissed each other.

Oh, you mothers and daughters who talk of "proving your love by deeds," and "being sickened by sentiment over a cook-stove," can you think of this kiss, this confiding, impulsive love-kiss, without a tender throb in your heart of hearts? Oh, mothers, these girls would love you all, where now they love you half, if you were not ashamed of any interest in their girlish sentimentalism! Oh, girls, these mothers are not staid and sober matrons, caring only for your dress and manners! They have warm, girlish impulses, and sometimes a great yearning to have you girls talk love to them.

While they were taking up dinner, Major Darton brought the general out into the dining-room. Mrs. Darton wiped her hands and went forward to greet him, saying, cordially, "Irving, I am very glad to see you here."

"Thank you, Nellie," he said, and she noticed that his mustache was as brown as ever, and his face only a little paler and thinner than it used to be. "I have wished, for a long while, to visit your home in the mountains."

Here little Dode came in, with the three children following. She had made a great effort on this extraordinary occasion to exercise some motherly care over her little sisters, and they really looked very sleek and demure; but the poor child had forgotten herself, with her uncombed hair and long-sleeved apron, and as she marched in with such an important look on her little tanned face, Mrs. Darton laughed—she couldn't help it. She hadn't intended to present the little ones until after dinner, and this move of Dode's amused her. But the general kissed them all, and said something pretty about them, and Dode found confidence to blurt out one of her dreadful little speeches, as Hallie knew she would, for the child was irrepressible on all occasions.

"Why, Mr. Trefethen, I thought you were a soldier, but you haven't got any gun, nor any pantakts on!"

"Epaulettes, you mean, Dode; now take the children into the other room, until we are through dinner," and Mrs. Darton, who had learned that wise lesson—never to be surprised—smiled again at her daughter's smothered "Hush, Dode!"

Hallie was bringing in the feather-pudding—she held it high over the childrens' heads, as she stood still to let them pass her. General Trefethen thought he had never seen a more beautiful face than Hallie Darton's was then. Her cheeks were just flushed; her eyes were large and clear and blue; and turned full on him for an eager, little instant; her ripe-red lips were just parted—for she was a little out of breath with a run up-stairs, a little sweep of the brush over her braid, and a little dash of cold water over her face. This same braid of yellow, glittering hair wound crown-wise round her head, and the little, fluffy curls fell out from under, and shaded her forehead. It was such a pure, open face!

He thought instantly of these lines, in "My Kate:—"

"And when you had once seen her forehead and mouth,
You saw, as distinctly, her soul and her truth."

He turned from her to Mrs. Darton.

"She is yourself at sixteen, Nellie."

Hallie said: "Oh, thank you, sir," in a clear, pleased, girlish voice, and came forward to be introduced.

In the midst of the bright flow of dinner-talk, Hallie touched her father's arm, and said in a little "aside," "Isn't it enchanting to hear them? Mother looks twenty years younger to-day. It's like—why, as if a pearl had been dropped into our dish-water, isn't it?"

The general heard her, and turned quickly. "Do you often find them, Miss Hallie, these pearls in the dish-water?"

"No, sir," very bluntly; and then seeing the smile in his brown eyes, she spoke slowly and thoughtfully. "Maybe—it's—because—I—never look for them there."

And she stopped eating to think of it. It was a new idea to her, so, after all the little ones had been fed, she drove every one out of the kitchen, saying, playfully, that she didn't know why, but she wanted to wash the dishes "all sole alone" this afternoon. There was a large pile of china for one pair of hands, but, you see, she wanted to think. So she opened the south window over the portico, and filling the dishpan with steaming suds, she bared her round, dimpled arms, and began bravely and cheerfully. The dripping goblets were just ready for the dry towel, when Hallie felt somebody looking at her through the south window.

"It doesn't look so dreadful, this washing dishes," he said.

"No, sir."

Hallie was blushing under his steady, brown eyes.

"It's nice, when one forgets that one is actually washing dishes. But we always speak of this life, sir, this cooking and clearing away, and sitting down, only to look at the clock and find that it's time for the next meal, this fussing for the 'wherewithal,' that's never done because you can't gain on it any—that's what we call our 'dish-water life.' If it's all I'm good for, then I'll make the best of it, but it never will satisfy me, never, never!"

Then, remembering who her listener was, she looked very much embarrassed and prettier than ever, and General Trefethen said something which sounded funny, very funny for such a proper, cavalier-looking general as he.

"May I wipe those dishes for you, Miss Hallie?"

Hallie laughed a little ripple of a laugh.

"Of all things in the world!" she began, then, with an air of offended dignity, "I didn't intend to grumble so that mamma's visitor should feel obliged to offer his assistance."

He just swung himself in at the low window, and began to wipe those dishes in a charmingly off-hand and graceful manner. With demure gravity Hallie handed him an apron, and with an air of perfect solemnity, he tied it round his neck. She laughed, and they began to chat more easily and sensibly than they could possibly have done in a drawing-room, and never did a tall man with an apron round his neck, and a smiling lassie with a dish-mop in her hands, make a more delightful tableau vivant than these two.

She looked up, at last, like a surprised child.

"We're all done! Why, I think it's perfectly beautiful to wash dishes!"

"Let's wash them all over again," said the general, putting two plates back into the dish-water; but the twinkle in his brown eyes sobered a little, as he looked down into hers, and said, gravely: "My little girl, you are half right, it does seem wrong that your lady-mother and her 'blue-eyed daughter,' should be obliged to do all this. But if you must, and Major Darton tells me that 'tis a necessity, until he can remove his business to the city, if you must, wont you let it do you good? I need not ask you to do it cheerfully, for I see you have given your own father the impression that you rather enjoy it, but I do not want to go away, my little dish-washer, and think it's hurting you. I want you to take comfort in doing it lovingly. I think God would like to see you wash this pretty china with a heart full of love to Him, who spares the life in all these bodies you are feeding, and gives you strength to do so much."

"So much!" said Hallie, "why, I always had a vague idea that when God's little girls were washing dishes, He was looking the other way, and answering other folks' prayers!"

He smiled, and answered: "Our worship of Him is not all praying, you know. The most of it is the glorifying; and wont it help you in the drudge-y work here, Miss Hallie, to think that this is your part of the glorifying, just for a little while, and wont the love make the labor light?"

At the end of that hour these two were very good friends. I sha'n't tell how Hallie hid the greasiest dishes under the sink, out of his sight, the same to be washed to-morrow morning, nor how two little teacups lay all shattered, because his big, man's hands couldn't manage the wee, slippery things; for this talk had done them a world of good. The weary sickness and bitterness against the vanity and frivolity of the world, went out of Irving Trefethen's heart, as he stood by the side of this sapphire-eyed maiden in brown calico, wiping the dishes which she washed; and she was all aglow with the earnestness of the thought which he was making clear, and with another thought, by which she was almost frightened—that this brown-eyed man was gradually assuming the look, and speaking the words of the ideal hero whom she had worshipped all her life, as some girls do worship their ideal heroes. And it is a good thing for them, too, Sir Doubtful, for this high-hero-worship sometimes carries them through their romantic girlhood without any of this imaginary falling in love with what Timothy Titcomb calls “posts with ope-sticks on their heads.”

As General Trefethen was going away that night, Mrs. Darton and Hallie shut their eyes to what they would otherwise have thought absolutely necessary to do, and went up-stairs to dress, together. It was a pleasure to watch them. They made such pretty work of “beautifying each other,” as they called it.

They braided each other's hair, and Hallie “wished hers was brown,” and her sister-mother “thought golden much prettier;” and they pinned each other's bows, and tied each other's sashes, and looped each other's skirts, and then came down-stairs, with their arms around each other, ready for a twilight stroll with the gentlemen.

They all stopped on the west balcony, to look at the sunset. Hallie spoke softly, in a voice that seemed hushed with admiration: “Oh, wont somebody make a poem of it? That shimmery green border, just billowing into those crimson heaps, and purple and gold above it all?”

The general looked down at her. Her dress was white, with rose-colored streamers, a pale, pink, gauzy thing floated over her shoulders, and a little white hat, rosebud wreathed, was tucked down upon the ripples of her hair, which shone like spun gold.

“You look as if you were a pink cloud yourself, Miss Hallie, and belonged to the sunset! Who did it?” he said, and touched lightly the floating gauze.

Hallie smiled brightly. “Mother is my dressing-maid, and I am here,” she said, simply, without taking her eyes away from the west.

Mr. and Mrs. Darton had started down the street, and called to them to come.

“Yes,” Hallie said, and lingered to catch the fading glory. Meanwhile her father and mother turned the corner, and were out of sight.

Just then Dode came running from behind the house, followed by the three little ones, crying dismally. They were covered with mud, and dripping.

Hallie colored with vexation, and set her teeth hard.

“You will have to go with father and mother, Mr. Trefethen, and excuse me. These children have been in the bog, and I must stay and change all their clothes!”

She said the last words wearily, and the lip quivered, with which she tried to smile, and she grasped Dode's arm, to lead her into the house, a little harder than she meant. Honest Dode jerked back indignantly.

“I knew you'd scold and cry, because you always do, Hallie Darton, when we fall in anything, but I didn't s'pose you'd pinch me 'fore that man, when you've been dressing all up and nigglecting us, on purpose for him!”

Poor Hallie was scarlet, but she acted on a sudden impulse, and stood the children all up in a row, and said, hurriedly: “Please look, sir; they are disgusting! Dode said the truth—these things happen every day, and I am naughty and angry with them. I thank you for what you have said about making ugly tasks pleasant, but it wont do for me, I'm too wicked—I shall just go on doing my duty every day, and hating it, and hating it!”

So she went in, and did it all, with a convulsive fierceness; and her fingers tore the fastenings nervously, and sharp, little words kept spattering out, and the little wretches would persist in saying they “didn't get into the bog a-purpose,” and they “spised such a crosspatch as she was;” and when she asked why they called her cross, when she hadn't scolded them yet, they answered, provokingly, “Well, we know you're awful mad!” and so on, and you can imagine how highly delectable was the state of Hallie's mind, when she walked out on the piazza, to get cooled off. General Trefethen stood talking with her father and mother at the gate. He was saying “Good-bye,” he must go, for the party with which he was travelling over the Green Mountains would expect him that night; he had started to Allan Hill very hastily, finding he was so near; he had been fully repaid for coming; and a great many other pleasant things. At last: “I shall come again, Nellie, as you tell me I may, when I come back from over the seas.”

Then he left them, and came and stood by Hallie.

“They're pretty little things, your sisters,” he said, softly, as if to himself. “Didn't they remind you of weeping little mermaids?”

“Not in the least; I saw nothing but muddy children.”

“I wonder, Miss Hallie, if you couldn't have found as much poetry and beauty in that scene, if you had looked for it, as in that sunset, which lighted your face so, just now! Did you notice how wistful and pleading their eyes were? Wouldn't a single, little love-word have won them at once, and made such repentant sinners of them, that one hour more of grace, and tenderness, and beauty would have come to your life.”

Then seeing the regretful flush of pain on her face, he added: “We all wade through the dish-water part of our lives with eyes looking away from it, and hands stretched out to ‘better and nobler things’ which we cannot reach, while there are pearls right at our feet, if we would stop to gather them.”

“You mean that if I love them, and love it, this clayey sort of life, I shall find the pearls in it, and that it wont drag me down, after all?”

The sheer clearness and wideness of her eyes told him that she understood.

For answer, he took her trembling hand, and held it in his, and told her that he should think of her as his little heroine away up on these Vermont hills, not buried here, but placed here—as his little heroine, who would not fail, because she was too brave, and who had power to make a perfect love-palace of her home.

Her face, pure and tender now, was raised thankfully to him. Her lips said simply and earnestly, "I will be good," and he kissed her hand and mounted his horse; and with a low "Good-bye, my little heroine," was off and away.

Three years is a very long time to a little girl. Saturday forenoon, with its doughnuts and children, has just come one hundred and fifty-six times to Hallie. "The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak," and Hallie's heart and she are "so tired, so tired!" She is thinking it over now, as she sits darning stockings by the west window, and basting patch-work for Dode and the three little yellow-heads. Dode, who is Hallie's devoted slave, and especial favorite now, exclaims suddenly: "Hallie Darton, you're about twice gooder'n you used to be! You never grit your teeth when you wash dishes now, nor pinch us when we're naughty, nor hate to peel potatoes; and you sing when you're doing everything, whether it hurts your hands or not! and you're a real comfortable person to have round—you always look warm when we are cold, and cool when we are roasting; and I heard papa say you were the light of the house—and I don't see why you aren't good enough to have a lover!"

As that was the superlative of the adjective "good" to Dode, Hallie appreciated the compliment, and answered sweetly, "Thank you, Dode. My dear little sister, you have all helped me. My naughty heart used to hate all these things, you know; but God has been very good, and now it just—just—jibes in, and I'm very happy and proud of you all."

They look bright love to her from their honest, little child-eyes, and Hallie's face is very strong and pure in the quiet and womanliness which three years have brought to it. She is thinking of how much, in this time, God has helped her to "do and bear." Mother Nell has had a long sickness, and is now away on a visit with the major, whose brow, when rumpled with care, has often been smoothed very tenderly by the little girl, who is learning to do all things for love. The little yellow-heads have been carried through innumerable diseases of the measles-species; Dode, freakish as ever, has been cried with, and laughed with, warned and praised, until Hallie has come to be her very heart-confidante; bashful Bess has been patiently initiated into the mysteries of French verbs, and the proprieties of a young debutante; Hallie herself has been wooed, but not won, by good men, who have all carried away the same answer: "I love my home, and will not leave it. I belong to it."

But her head is throbbing, and she feels strange and restless, for she has worked steadily all day, and there has been no mother to kiss away the weariness; and as she sits thus, half-dreaming, she hears the children's voices rising angrily.

Lily, the wee lady in crimps and earrings, produces a note from Dode's little boy-champion in school. Dode, with the old, theatrical air, reads indignantly:

"DEAR LILLIE.

"I want you to be my girl I have got tired of your Sister she promised to curl her hair up on papers, if I woud, but I wunt, because I had rather have you—besides she's got a Cold, and I think your Nose is the prettiest shape than hers.
"Your in life and death.

"JOHNIE.

"P. S. I'll find a place to Hide your rubbers in, just as I used to hers, and bring you a lossenger every day."

Dode stamps and burns the note, and shakes her little brown fist at her treacherous sister—treacherous sister, very much frightened, uses the point of her needle in self-defence. Dode, squealing, shakes her in a highly, superior way; and Lily, like a revengeful, little cat, jumps at Dode and pushes her down. This rouses Hallie from her unusual fit of dreaming, and she starts up with a thoughtless, angry, "You naughty child, Lily Darton! Can't I have a little peace?"

Lily leaves the room, and Hallie, strangely excited over this child's quarrel, runs after her. A breathless chase follows, and the others stand still and watch them, wondering "what can be the matter with Hallie to-day?"

Swiftly they run, Hallie flushed and angry, Lily rapid and defiant, through the room, up the front stairs, down the back, through the hall, round the table, up-stairs and down again—and then it strikes Hallie, what a foolish thing she is doing; and, turning suddenly on the front stairs, she twists her ankle slightly, and falls in an exhausted heap. The pain brings out the cry, which she has stifled all the day, and she lays her head on the stair-carpet and sobs aloud, and cries as only a tired woman can cry.

The children, melted now, of course, all gather round her, sobbing and crying, too; and, just at this interesting crisis, when five pairs of eyes are raining down tears on the front-stair carpet, and when a fresh chorus of "oh, ohs!" bursts from the doleful quintette, somebody stops at the open hall-door, and General Trefethen's voice, grave and pitying, says: "What a very rainy day!"

Poor Hallie! the color leaves her face, and starting up with a stifled cry of pain, she never stops till she reaches the farthest corner of the attic chamber. There she sinks down, and begins to moan piteously.

"Oh, it was cruel, it was cruel, dear God! Why did he come then, why did he come then—and I was weak and naughty—all weak and naughty! and I've failed—oh, he will think I have—and he trusted me—but he won't any more—never—any—more. Oh, I have been good. Dear God, you know I have been good; but he will never know—oh, never know."

Then she lay in a kind of apathy, and Hallie's God must have known what she suffered, with the thought that all her long dream had ended; for soon his little girl, looking very pale and heavy-eyed, in a soft-falling black grenadine, was going to meet "her hero" with these thoughts whirling in her head.

"I must do my duty, and entertain him till mother comes. These three years have not been a failure—they have been full of pearls! I wonder how God will help me talk, with this lump in my throat!"

She did not know how the hours ever passed; but when the greeting, and the berry-supper, and the children's twilight talk were over, she remembered dimly that it had all been very gay, and they had all been laughing and chatting very merrily. She had a recollection of a feeling of shame that made her draw back the little hand she had offered to General Trefethen, when she met him; a tingle of shame for the burns and scars and rough places which house-work had made on the hand she put out, and the thought that, of course, all his friends had soft, pretty white hands, which would be pleasant to take. Then she remembered the sudden resolution which had made her hold it out again, and keep back a blush, and deliberately draw her sleeve back a little and expose the new-made scar on the wrist. She was almost reckless to-night. Her head whirled so!

After she had carried the little ones to bed, and heard them say their good-night to God, she came back and began to play and sing with a wild pathos in her voice and manner, which didn't seem at all like her old, frank, childish self. Carelessly she took up "The Rainy Day," the sweet, sad "Rainy Day," and began to sing.

"Some days must be dark and dreary," she sang, and wondered if hers would ever be bright again.

On the last verse her voice grew fainter and fainter.

"Be still, sad heart! and cease repining!
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining.
Thy fate is the common fate of all.
Into each—life—some—rain—" and then the pallor deepened on her face, a whirling faintness took her strength away, and she would have fallen had not General Trefethen caught her in his arms. He drew her down beside him on the parlor sofa.

"Hallie, dear, those blue eyes must not look so grieved. Dode has told me all about it. Were the three years any longer to you than to me, my little heroine?"

"I'm not your heroine," said Hallie, feebly, trembling in his arms. "Heroines don't pinch, nor have red faces, nor cry on the front stairs."

"Mine does. Why, you were a perfect 'Venus smudged in tears,' Hallie!"

Then she laughed; and when she was quiet, with his strong arm around her, and his deep, true eyes looking down into hers, he said, gently, "Why, I loved you all the time, little Hallie!"

And the old love-light shone over her face, and, with the old childish air of wonder, she asked, "And you will trust me, after all?"

"Yes, darling, we will go and hunt for pearls together."

"Oh, my own, own hero!" she murmured, and the weary head rested confidently on his shoulder. Then they looked up and saw Mr. and Mrs. Darton at the door; and when, after Hallie's first rapturous mother-kisses, Irving Trefethen said slowly: "Nellie, I have waited, as you wished. Major Darton, may I take her away? Your little sunbeam?"

They loved her too well to refuse.

So, when Dode, gorgeous in her scarlet wrapper, darted in, she comprehended the whole thing at a glance, and exclaimed, in her high-tragic way, "I told you so! Why, it's just like a story book! Mr. Trefethen, when did you fall in love with her?"

"When she was washing dishes, my lady," laughed the general, holding Dode tightly by the wrists, and glancing at Hallie.

"Then, besides the little pearls, I found my very biggest one in the dish-water—didn't I, Dode, dear?" and Hallie's voice was one low thrill of gladness.

"Well," said Dode, "I mean to write to all these girls, who have so much dish-water, and 'hate it,' and tell them all about how you found your pearls in it, Hallie."

"Be sure and give them my recipe for 'Dish-washing made easy,'" answered Hallie. "It's half the quantity of dutifulness and twice as much love; and I should advise them, when they wash their dishes, always to stand at an open window that looks out on a portico; and I wish, with all my heart, that the dear things might find their heroes standing there," she added, generously.

Then, for the first time, he stooped and kissed her lips, and after she had stood still by his side for one moment, she left him, and nestled down by her mother's chair.

There, as she laid her golden head beside the chestnut braids, she whispered softly, "Isn't it a beautiful world, Mother-Nell?"

POETIC IMPULSES.

BY S. J. D.

YE visitants from far-off song-land, filling
My soul with ecstasies I may not tell!—
For, when I fain would catch the cadence thrilling,
And emulate your speech—I break the spell.

Ye hover o'er me, sweet suggestions bringing
Of harmonies celestial—notes divine,
Like distant joy-bells through my soul are ringing!
Oh, may I never hope to make ye mine?

Why do ye beckon me on with shadowy fingers;
Then skyward soar away on mocking wing?
Yet, life is sweeter, since your echo lingers;
Ye thrill the soul ye cannot teach to sing.

Perchance, in the fair land that we call Heaven—
When the true life hath crowned this earth-worn brow;
Perchance to me sweet utterance shall be given
To speak the thoughts that only haunt me now.

RUINED AT HOME.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

IT is at home that the ruin of a soul begins.

"At home!" We hear the response in tones of pained surprise or indignant denial from many voices. "It is a hard saying—and cruel!"

It may hurt like a blow many sad hearts; but if it be true—what then?

"It is not true! I can point you to a dozen cases within my own range of observation to disprove the assertion—to young men who have gone astray in spite of the careful training and good example of religious homes—in spite of all the best of mothers and wisest of fathers could do."

Yes; we hear such things said every day; but feel certain there is an error somewhere—a defect in your observation. Were you in the homes of these young men from the beginning? Were you familiar with their early training? Did you observe the personal bearing of their parents toward them—know their walk and conversation? If nay, then you are not competent, with your instances, to disprove our assertion.

A small error at the beginning of a series of calculations in applied mechanics, may lead to a great disaster; the slightest variation from a right line at the beginning will throw a projectile hundreds of yards away from its object. It is in the little things at home; the almost unnoted departures from order and good government; the neglects arising from parental self-indulgence; the weakness of love that fails to nip a fault in the bud; and many other things that might be instanced, which turn the young feet into ways of life that, as the years go by, lead farther and farther from safety and happiness.

The Bible, experience, and reason, all declare that the future of a child depends upon his early training. If this is bad, the chances are nearly all against him.

"But," we hear it said, "children raised under the worst of influences often make good and useful men."

The cases are exceptional, and stand out in strong contrast with the rule. And so we go back to what was declared in the beginning, that the ruin of a soul begins at home. How many instances crowd upon the memory! Let us take a few at this time for their lesson and their warning.

Not long ago, in one of our principal cities, an almost broken-hearted mother parted from her son in the court house, and was taken fainting to her home, while he was thrust into a van and conveyed to prison. His crime was stealing. Society held up its hands in pity and amazement, for the young man's father and mother were highly respectable people, and good church members, as the saying is. The father's business reputation stood high. People said of him: "His word is as good as his bond." And yet his son was a condemned thief. He had stolen from his employer.

Did the ruin in this case begin at home? Yes. It was at home that the son learned to be dishonest; and he learned it from his mother! Let us rehearse a few of the lessons, in precept and example, that were given to the boy. We begin when he was just five years of age. He was standing near his mother one day—we will call her Mrs. Omdorff, and the boy Karl—when he heard her say to his aunt, in a tone of satisfaction: "Barker has cheated himself. Here are four yards of ribbon instead of three. I asked for three yards, and paid for only three; but this measures full four yards."

The boy listened, and waited for what was to come next. He loved his mother, and trusted in her.

"What are you going to do about it?" inquired the aunt.

"Keep it, of course," answered Mrs. Omdorff. "Barker will never be the wiser. He makes enough out of us, dear knows!" And she rolled the ribbon about her fingers.

Karl was a little surprised. It did not seem like his mother; nor in agreement with what she had often said to him about truth and honesty. But he had faith in her, and was sure that she could do nothing wrong. His Aunt Ruth, of whom he was very fond, and who had great influence over him, was a weak woman in some respects, and much more inclined to take the current of other's opinions, than to give herself the trouble of opposition. Her innate sense of honor was a little disturbed at her sister's view of the case; but she failed to say the right words that were in her thoughts, and which, if spoken, might have helped the boy to see what was just and right.

A day or two afterward, Karl heard his mother say: "I saved a car ticket this morning."

"How?" inquired her sister.

"The conductor forgot to ask for it."

"Why didn't you give it to him, mamma?" asked Karl.

"It was his business to look after his passengers," replied Mrs. Omdorff, who felt rather uncomfortable at this question from her little boy. "It will teach him a lesson."

Karl thought a moment, and then said: "But he won't know anything about it."

"Oh, you're too sharp!" exclaimed his mother, with a laugh. "I wasn't talking to you, anyhow."

"Little pitchers have big ears," said Aunt Ruth, echoing her sister's laugh.

And so the matter was pushed aside, neither mother nor aunt imagining that the bright and beautiful boy they both loved so tenderly had received a lesson in dishonesty not soon to be forgotten.

"I do believe," said Mrs. Omdorff, not long afterward, as she sat counting over some money, "that Poole has given me the wrong change."

Karl was in the room, and heard her remark.

"Let me see," she added, going over the money again. "Two and a half, three, four and a half, four and three quarters. It's a fact, I gave him a ten-dollar bill, and here are four and three quarters change."

"What did the goods amount to?" asked her sister.

"There were eleven yards of muslin at eighteen. That's a dollar and ninety-eight cents. Two yards of silk at a dollar and a half, and an eighth of a yard of velvet, one dollar; making just five dollars and ninety-eight cents. If it had come to six dollars my right change would have been four. But he has given me four and three quarters."

Then in a tone of satisfaction, she added: "I'm that much richer, you see, Ruth."

Her sister smiled; but did not utter the disapproval that was in her heart. Karl listened and took it all in. A little while afterward Mrs. Omdorff got up and rang the bell, saying, as she did so, with a short, gurgling laugh that seemed ashamed of itself: "I guess we'll have a little ice cream—at, at Poole's expense."

Aunt Ruth only shook her finger, and said, feebly: "Oh, that's too bad!"

But Karl was not able to see whether she approved or disapproved. The ice cream was sent for, and enjoyed by the child. While the sweet taste was yet on his tongue, he heard his mother say: "I'm very much obliged to Poole for this treat—it's delicious!"

Is it strange that the boy's perception of right and wrong should be obscured? or that, in a day or two afterward, he should come in from the street with an orange in his hand, and on being questioned about it, reply: "A woman let it fall from her basket, and I picked it up. She didn't see it drop, mamma."

"But why didn't you call after her?" asked Aunt Ruth.

"Cause I didn't want to," answered the child. "She dropped it. I didn't knock it off."

Mrs. Omdorff was not satisfied with the conduct of her child; and yet she was amused at what she called his 'cuteness, and laughed instead of reproving him for an act that was in spirit a theft.

So the child's education for crime was begun—his ruin initiated. The low moral sense of his mother was perpetually showing itself in some disregard of other's rights. A mistake made in her favor was never voluntarily corrected; and her pleasure at any gain of this kind was rarely concealed. "He cheated himself," was a favorite saying, heard by Karl almost every week; and as he grew older, he understood its meaning more clearly.

Mr. Omdorff was a man of higher integrity than his wife; and just in dealing to the smallest fraction. "Foolish about little things—more nice than wise," as she often said, when he disapproved of her way of doing things, as was sometimes the case. Mrs. Omdorff had learned to be guarded in her speech when he was at home; and so he remained in ignorance of the fatal perversions going on in the mind of his child.

As the boy grew up his father's supervision became more direct. He was careful about his associates, and never permitted him to be away from home without knowing where and with whom he was. He knew but too well the danger of evil association; and guarded his boy with jealous solicitude.

Alas! he dreamed not of the evil influences at home; never imagined that the mother was destroying in her son that nice sense of honor without which no one is safe; nor that she had taught him to disregard the rights of others; to take mean advantages; and to appropriate what did not belong to him whenever it could be done with absolute certainty of concealment.

We do not mean to say that such were the direct and purposed teachings of his mother. She would have been horror stricken at the mere suggestion. But she had so taught him by example. In heart she was not honest; and in many of her transactions she was as much a thief as if she had robbed a till. Retaining what belongs to another, simply because it has come into our hands by mistake, is as much a theft in its spirit as purposed stealing; and the fine lady who keeps the change to which she is not entitled, or the yard of ribbon measured to her in error, is just as criminal as the sneak thief who gets into her hall through a neglected door and steals her husband's overcoat. The real quality of an act lies in the intent.

Is it any wonder that amid such home influences, the boy did not show, as he advanced toward maturity, a high sense of honor? That he should be mean, and selfish, and dishonest in little things? "As the twig is bent the tree's inclined." Evil seed will produce evil fruit.

Society punished and execrated the unhappy young man, and pitied his wretched mother; little dreaming that by her hand his prison doors had been opened.

Another instance of the baleful influence that may exist at home is to be found in the ruin of a young man who recently died in one of the lowest and vilest haunts of the city. He had been well educated, and grew to manhood with a fine sense of honor. His mother was a woman of rare culture, and beloved by every one in the circle where she moved. All the moral sentiments of her son had been carefully fostered and developed, and when he reached manhood no one showed a fairer promise.

But, it was not long before a shadow fell across his life. He had learned one thing at home that was destined to work his ruin—he had learned to love the taste of wine.

His father belonged to a class of men who consider wine-drinking as a mark of good breeding. He knew all about wines; and had a weak vanity in being thought a connoisseur. If he had a friend to dinner, he would bring out two or three kinds and discuss them through half the meal. He called the men who were ranging themselves against the terrible evil of intemperance, and seeking to stay its baleful course, "poor fanatics." He talked of pure wines and liquors as harmless, and gave them to his son at suitable times and occasions, moderately; only guarding him by warnings against excess.

But these warnings went for nothing, as appetite increased. At twelve years of age, the boy was content with a single glass of light wine at his dinner. At eighteen he wanted two glasses, and at twenty-one three. By this time he had acquired convivial habits, and often drank freely with other young men of his age. His mother was first to take the alarm; but his father was slow to believe that his son was in danger. The sad truth broke upon him at last in a painful humiliation. At a large party in his own house the young man became so badly intoxicated that he had to be removed from the company.

From that unhappy period, wine was banished from the father's table. But it was too late! The work of ruin had progressed too far. At twenty-seven the wretched young man died, as we have said, in one of the lowest and vilest dens of the city.

We could give many instances like this. Here, at home, is the chief source of that wide-spread ruin by intemperance, that is every year robbing society of thousands upon thousands of young men, who, by education, culture, and social standing are fitted for useful and honorable positions. They are ruined at home. Here they acquire a taste for wine, and here they learn to think and speak lightly of temperance. Not in one case in ten does a young man acquire the taste for drink in a saloon or tavern, but at home—if not in his own home in that of some friend. We fear that the drinking-saloons men set up in their dining and drawing-rooms, and to which they invite the young and old of both sexes, do more to deprave the taste and lead to intemperance, than all the licensed taverns in the land. It is here that the appetite is formed and fostered—here that the apprenticeship to drunkenness is served. Year by year, the sons of our wealthiest and most intelligent and influential citizens are tempted and led astray by the drinking customs of society—ruined at home. How few of the sons of successful men rise to the level their fathers have gained. How many, alas! sink so far below this level that the eyes ache to look down upon them!

Worse than dishonesty and drunkenness, because more hidden and subtle, and more destructive of moral and spiritual life, is that home influence which springs from perverted ideas of marriage and its sanctities. If sons and daughters grow up in a home where the moral sentiments are low; where departures from virtue are spoken of lightly; where prurient gossip and vile scandals are indulged in with manifest pleasure, their corruption is almost certain. Chameleon-like, they will take the hue of what is around them; and when they advance to manhood and womanhood will, in most cases, be found practically false to the high and pure standards of Christian morality.

It is from this corruption at home, growing out of the essential impurity of the sphere in which children are raised, that society is cursed, in each new generation, by unions called marriages, but in which there is no true essential of marriage. Hence come infidelities, divorces and all the evil consequences with which we are too sadly familiar.

Let the sentiment at home be pure and Christian, and the children will grow up pure. Starting, then, on the journey of life, with minds unperverted by false ideas, and hearts uncorrupted by actual evils, they will be strong for the battle that each must fight ere the natural mind, in which lie the germs of evil that all receive as their inheritance when born, is brought into subjection to the spiritual.

This is the battle that all must fight—the battle between the false and evil things that lie hidden at birth in the natural or lower region of the mind, and which at maturity, when reason becomes active, assert their power, and strive for mastery over the human soul, and the higher or spiritual mind, where truth, and honor, and purity, and God have their dwelling-place.

Think at what disadvantage they will be in this great and momentous warfare, who have, during childhood and youth, had the lower things of their nature—the false, evil things—stimulated into activity; who come to the verge of manhood and womanhood already corrupted, and with the memory full of what is vile and false, instead of with things pure, and true, and good. Alas for them! If they overcome, it will be after long and fearful struggles, in which the odds will be terribly against them!

Lay it up in your hearts, all ye who love your children and desire their happiness, that it is the home-influence that more than everything else goes to determine their future. If that is healthy and good, all the elements are in their favor; if it is not healthy and good, the chances are all against them.

IMPROMPTU.

BY H.

DEAR Lord! Oh, let me lean myself on thee,
For I am weak, and faint—oh, comfort me!
In all this world there are no lips to bless
With gentle words, or with a soft caress,
This tired one, so tired I fain would creep
Into some lone spot and weep myself to sleep.

Upon the altar of self-sacrifice
I try to lay whatever I most prize;
Love duty for its own sweet sake, and bear
My cross without a moan, and love my care,
Looking for no reward, wishing for none,
Yet now I faint the battle just begun.

It still is morning, if I faint so soon
How shall I bear the burning heats of noon?
If my parched lips so early long to press
An overflowing cup of happiness,
At midday can I dash the cup aside,
And all my life be thus unsatisfied?
Hungry for bread, receive instead a stone,
Longing for home and yet abide alone?
Yea, Lord, I leave the future all to thee!
My prayer is heard, for thou dost comfort me.

CROOKED PLACES.

A STORY OF STRUGGLES AND HOPES.

BY EDWARD GARRETT.

Author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," "Premiums Paid to Experience," etc.

INTRODUCTION.

EVERY life keeps one or two secrets of experience which it might be well for its fellows to know. In those mysterious times of solemn visitation or thanksgiving, when the gates of the heart are set open, that its "Miserere" or its "Te Deum" may pour forth, have you never noticed that though the scoring may vary wildly, the tune is always the same? We poor human beings are so strangely prone to forget our common resemblance, that we only recognize it in a sort of joyful wonder. Yet just dare to whisper to another how you felt in your day of weakness or of loss—not your mere conventional feeling, nor yet the great capital letter of your anguish, but the little secret pain that nestled nameless in your bosom, and that other will, in ninety cases out of a hundred, stretch forth the warm right hand of brotherhood, whilst nine at least, out of the remaining ten, will store your confidence in secret, and go on their way rejoicing.

But we are such perverse creatures that, slightly altering our words of confession, "we speak what we should leave unsaid, and are silent where we should speak." So many of us are doomed to go through life without being able to utter the pangs and the fears that lie in our very heart of hearts, our only hope being, like that of the woman with the issue, to follow in the crowd behind Jesus, and haply be healed unawares. Thus, how many a preached or written word, which seemed as nothing to him who uttered it, has been as a drop of dew under which some poor scorched heart once more lifted its head to God's blue sky, or as a friendly hand-clasp to some weary soul, alone in the crowd of life?

There is a sadness about this strange silent secrecy of our lives; yet to name a pain is often to fix it; and in many of the straits of life, one walks the braver for not measuring exactly how narrow they are, nor how deep is the gulf below. The visible hand of human help would often lie heavy on us, where the unseen hand of God upholds. And no pointed counsel, nor personal consolation could ever come to us with such force as the unsuperscribed message of warning or comfort which our own heart appropriates to itself.

And let nobody say that his own life has been too blank and humble to have any such uncoined gold to spare for others' stamping. Have we not seen what treasures some people can work from what others cast aside as rubbish? How many of the truest pictures of life have been limned by men or women who lived quietly among common people, and left no outward history that might not be told in two or three simple dates? Could we have found such wisdom in such homely places? Perhaps not; nevertheless it was there, for those to whom God gave eyes to see.

It is not our strength, but our weakness that demands wide social circles, varied and stirring experiences. It takes a more complicated educational machinery to teach a blind child than a "sighted" one. We often cannot read the histories that are going on before our eyes in our own dull street. Our spiritual sight is too weak for such small caligraphy, though we can see the same stories afar off, brought out by the lurid flames of some long past martyrdom, or written large in gold and red, with crowns for initial letters, and margins illuminated with battle fields and victorious cavalcades.

It has often struck me that it would not be a bad idea to study the history of every individual member of a family. I think writers are rather unfair in this respect. They pick out the picturesque "bit," the beauty, the genius, or the prodigal, and treat the good grandmother in her arm-chair, the steady father in his counting-house, the patient mother, or the trusted servant, as if they were only useful backgrounding. Writers are not altogether to be blamed for this partiality. Most forms of art demand a central figure, and I am no admirer of that grotesque Pre-Raphaelitism which makes every leaf on a tree as prominent as the lovers who are whispering beneath it. But it seems to me that these people who are never seen but in their supernumerary parts, must each have a history of his own, which may be worth even more than the picturesque "bit," not perhaps for its intrinsic value, but for its closer interest to that larger section of the world, who (thank God!) are neither beauties, wits, nor prodigals.

Now, I have lived a very bounded and ordinary life, and do not understand æsthetics, and I write, half to keep myself company in a world where few old friends remain to "talk over" the matters which interest me most, and half in hopes that sometimes I may drop a word that shall bind up some hidden wound, or cheer some heart to its battle. It seems to me that such as I may find only too wide a field of labor in faithfully etching one after another of a certain group of family faces. Some of them I have known with that true knowledge which is born of love, and of every one I have such ample sources of information, documentary or oral, or both, as might well fill professed biographers with despairing envy. I have slighted no scrap of information as too trivial to bear on my studies. My mass of collected material includes all sorts of things, from delicate miniatures on ivory to worn-out fragments of fine needlework, from dainty old love-letters to scrappy washing-bills.

It touches me strangely as I turn over these simple, used, useless things. They seem so like withered leaves—swept off the hewed-down trees of life, as they were carried away to the building of the City not made with hands. Pitiful, it seems at first thought, how little of its very own a full, strong, busy life leaves behind it. Most of what it leaves has other uses beyond it. The chosen furniture, the selected pictures, the favorite books, live on in other service. Even the loves it cherished, bear fruit for other hands. Only here and there, in perfumed, seldom-opened drawers, lie a few crumpled papers, a few faded ribbons, and here and there, in the shady corner of the household circle, is a face which people say "has never been the same since." And yet this is not grievous, but joyous. Life, and not death, is the end and aim of creation. Life here and life beyond. God's way of marking graves is not to lay barren granite boulders on them, but to make the grass and flowers to grow there more freshly and abundantly. God's way of keeping the dead in remembrance is not to stay looking into the open grave, but to go the way that they have gone before us, where we shall see them (Mark xvi. 7). And so I tenderly turn over my heap of relics, and, in the sure and certain hope of the coming spring of Immortality, am cheerfully content to know that all such poor withered leaves must first be swept away.

I mean to show you these dear lost friends of mine more especially in their "crooked places," because every life has such, and indeed, without them, life would be a long, straight, easily-forgotten road. It does run so sometimes. There are whole years which we don't remember much. If such a smooth highway opens to us after we have been sifted and shaken round a sharp corner, then let us thank God, as those should thank Him, whom He has made the blessed of the earth. Nevertheless, it is the crooked corner we have passed that gives the level all its beauty. It is well for us when we come upon it soon, for we find more flowers, and hear more singing of birds, and enjoy a wider prospect ever after. Christ is often nearest to us when we are in our "crooked place." As artists give to their dearest a copy of their masterpiece, as most men make sacred love-gifts of pictures or symbols of what lies nearest their secret life, so our Lord gives us our "crooked place" as the similitude of the cross under which He lived, and on which at last, He died, that our sinful natures might there be crucified with Him. And presently, as the tender mosses of time and memory clothe its sharpness, our hearts will love to return to it, like birds to their accustomed tree, and we will build our Ebenezer there, and sing with the quaint old poet, that the breast—

"That is possessed
Of earth without a cross, has earth
Without a rest."

PART I.—A JUST WOMAN

CHAPTER I.—MRS. HARVEY'S HOME.

OUR story begins about sixty years ago; and it commences in a quiet, dark room, with a young woman sitting at its window. Her fresh widow's cap showed out wide and hard in the twilight.

There was a glimmer of fire in the grate, and the heavy plated candlesticks stood ready on the table. Mrs. Harvey had long been accustomed to light her candles herself.

The place was profoundly quiet, though it was in the heart of London. Sixty years ago people found out such places and lived in them. The front door of this house opened into a street, not unfashionable, and decidedly genteel. The window where the widow sat looked out—over a tree-shaded promenade—upon the broad cool river. There was plenty of life in the Willow Walk on fine summer evenings. Mrs. Harvey had enjoyed many opportunities of watching it. For herself, she had not gone there for many years, except in the very early morning with her children.

It was too late for the gay company now, and the great willow-trees were left to sigh and whisper to each other. And all the boats were gone off the river, except here and there a lighterman's hoy, or a red-sailed, hay-laden barge.

The widow had sat there alone all the while the light faded. She had not been a widow a month yet, poor thing, and neighbors where still whispering as to how she was "left," and how she seemed to bear it.

She had wept, but not vehemently, rather those slow tears that come with a bitter, aching pain—the tears of those who have long learned to mourn inwardly, while going about with a smile on their faces, and a cheerful word on their lips.

She had been an only child in her own home, and a very dainty pet. There was an old portrait of her over the mantel of that twilight chamber—the presentment of a pretty sprightly child with fair hair curling over an elaborately embroidered muslin dress, which it must have taken months to make, for there was no clipping machine-work in those days.

They had left her no fortune, those dear kind parents, both dead now. Her father had been but a civil servant, with an income not sufficient to allow much saving. The shrewd mother had not quailed before her darling's possible future. "We've given her a good education," she used to say, "and if that don't keep a woman on her feet no fortune will. Only one woman of my own set ever died in a work-house, and her father had left her ten thousand pounds only twenty years before. If a woman can't make money, she'll not be able to keep it, for it's a carrion that draws vultures."

But the father had not been quite so courageous, and he had been very profoundly satisfied when young Mr. Harvey, a merchant in a fair way to make a sound and substantial competence, had laid his fortune at pretty Bessie's feet.

Now, there had always been a form of godliness in the girl's early home. The family had gone to public worship, and honored the vicar, and eschewed all who mingled in masquerades, or other of those looser junketings then so fashionable. In after years, Elizabeth, who had lived nearest to her father and mother, was not afraid to believe that there had been much better things in their hearts, albeit somewhat faded and checked, like misunderstood flowers, shut up in damp and darkness. But she remembered well enough that though she had thought more of the bridegroom's open face and frank manner than of his fortune, and that her parents had congratulated themselves upon his character rather than his prospects, still neither she nor her parents had ever once reflected whether these fair fruits were the genuine outcome of a soul deep rooted in the love of God. They were victims of a heartless state of pseudo-religious thought, in whose creed respectability and goodness were synonyms.

So the girl Elizabeth was married to Peter Harvey, and went home to his snug, semi-luxurious house, and took a young matron's pride in cookery-books and housekeeping accounts, and gave her first dinner-party with satisfaction to herself and all parties concerned.

In those dreary days of the false wit and wild license of the regency, the ideal woman of more respectable life was she who filled most jam-pots, who could not have slept on unfilled pillows, and who kept her kitchen red with burnished copper. The spirit of household love and mercy and peace, was neither the beginning nor the end of this fashion of "notableness." The husband might miss his companion while she performed feats of pickling and preserving, and the boys might run to ruin while their mother was mending their socks, so that none could detect a darn. All her ambition ran in the groove of the Pharisee's thanksgiving, that she should not be as others were. A hideous image of vain-glory and self-righteousness was set up in the temple of domestic virtue. Alas, that when the iconoclasts came, as they always will come, they not only overthrew the idol, but demolished the shrine!

Young Mrs. Harvey, with her inbred exactitude and energy, her lofty standards of kitchen, pantry and linen-closets, her moderate yet ample means, seemed certainly doomed to develop into one of the most flourishing of these stolid, intolerant mothers, whose life in reality was as much a life of sense and selfishness as that of those poor women, the goddesses of a widely-different clique, who were then fluttering like half-burnt butterflies in the glare of Carlton House.

Her father, in his sleepy satisfaction, would not have hoped anything better for his Bessie. Her mother, who was shrewder in her spiritual insights, would yet have said, with a half-sigh, that there was nothing better to be hoped for.

But the heavenly Father, who was so little remembered at that decorous, bountiful, wedding-feast, had other purposes toward the youthful life that lay, unconscious, in his hand.

She had not learned to see Him in the sunny little waves of her existence. Like the rustic who mistakes the porter for the prince, and thinks that the vestibule of the palace is the royal chamber, her heart was quite at rest among its outside treasures. The God who was watching over her, and loving her with a love beyond her husband's or her parents', was an unknown God.

Just once, her heart swelled toward Him, when they laid her first-born son on her breast, and left her alone to read the divine secrets of motherhood.

But she could not understand her own thankful yearning. The earth, earthly, closed round her so soon. They said hers was the most beautiful child in the parish. The doctor pronounced it the finest boy he had helped into the world for twenty years. The most elaborate preparation had been made for its coming, yet every day her jealous pride was busy supplying some discovered gap. She did not love other babies more for its sake, though she observed them curiously to see that none surpassed it.

Then the Lord put forth his hand and took back his own gift. Not in judgment; but because He loved both the mother and the child. It had just grown old enough to twine little clinging hands round her fingers, and to make a sweet crowing whenever she took it in her arms. But she could not hold it back from God.

She took her loss very quietly. There was this good in the life wherein she had been trained—that if it did not foster the purest and tenderest sentiment, at least it discouraged the shrieking semblance thereof.

"I never lost one," her mother said to her, following her about the house, with the half-reverent wistfulness of a parent who sees her child pass above her on the heights of experience. "I never lost one. I don't think I should have borne it so well as you do, Bessie."

But in her heart, Bessie knew she was not bearing it well. She was silent because there was no use in crying out. She was dumb with despair. She had never thought about death. She had known it, only as an ugly fact, to be turned from as quickly as possible. Be gentle to her, reader. Don't judge that her mind must have been utterly dry and dead, but remember that she lived in an era when they carved skull and cross-bones over churchyard gates.

But a woman's mind must follow her heart. While her darlings are under her own roof, the mother does not heed that all the vast continents are to her but names and mist. But let her boy go out to the stranger's land, and how she will hunger and thirst for information! Bessie's thoughts went after her baby into the shadowy region they had always shunned before.

Poor thing! poor thing! It was to her only the land of charnel houses. She would sit and shiver before her fire to think how the rain was falling on her baby's grave in St. Martin's churchyard. She went every day to look at it. And she shrank from meeting her next-door neighbor, who had a little living babe of the same age as her dead Peter.

Kindly gossips warned Mr. Harvey that he must begin to take care of his wife. The good man did his best. He took her to Bath and to Cheltenham. She did not refuse to walk with him on the Parade, and she accepted all his proffered amusements with a piteous gratitude.

She was fading, and fading, and even her mind was losing its old bright energy of grasp. What would be the end of it, nobody knew—except God.

When her husband told her that he must leave her awhile at Bath, and return to his business, she cried a little, and begged him to take her back too. But he was fain to flatter himself that she was benefiting by the fresher air and varied scene, and perhaps thought it might not be an unkindly experiment to throw her a little on her own resources. So he was firm, and came away. And then she cried a little more to herself, and thought of the final separation of death, and only looked at the sunshine and the trees to remember that they would go on when all who were enjoying them were turned to dust.

She sat still day after day, with her active white hands folded on her black dress, and her kindly landlady said to herself that this sort of thing had gone on quite long enough.

Was it chance that had sent Elizabeth Harvey to the house of a woman who had known almost every sorrow under the sun, who had buried husband and children, who was a weakly woman and a poor woman, who had to slave for daily bread under the whims and fancies of her thoughtless fine lady-lodgers, but who knew God, her Father, and carried such a bright face, and such a merry heart, that many a puling madam was fain to pay her the compliment of unreflecting envy?

We cannot stop to tell how it happened—indeed, neither of the two women could have detailed it themselves. But Elizabeth found that the homely widow had sweet secrets to impart. She never spoke of her "loss," but of her "dear ones with God." She no more thought of them as in the humble graves on which she sometimes snatched time to plant a rose-bush or an evergreen, than as in the stiff, jerky old drawers where she had folded away their poor garments. She did not look at life as a drama to be hastened on ere the curtain fell, but as a work to be diligently done ere the curtain should rise.

It was a mode of thought which had such attractions for poor wrung Elizabeth, that she would have gone anywhere to find the key to it. Her good landlady only invited her to accompany her to Mr. Jay's chapel.

Now, as we have said before, Elizabeth's whole training was not favorable to self-revelation. She said very little. But she went to the chapel again and again, attending week-day services for which her hard-working friend could find no opportunity. And she took to reading the Bible. It was wonderful how little she knew of it. It had been kept in her father's house, wrapped in green baize, as if its mere presence was a sufficient charm, though to be sure her mother had an old black-letter edition, over which she sometimes pondered on Sunday evenings.

She said very little, but presently bands of white were introduced among the dense mourning which she had hitherto cultivated in morbid vanity of woe. And she took her little baby's miniature (painted after death) from the black-grape bag where she had kept it, and went out and bought a purple-velvet frame for it. And she wrote to her husband, and told him that she was quite well enough to return home, and was only sorry she had been so selfish and troublesome already, but at any rate she would not bring him out of his way to fetch her, but would take courage and travel by herself.

Peter Harvey was glad to have his bonnie Bessie again, still more glad to find that she could once more venture to open the piano and softly play him some of the sweetest of his favorite songs, even though his favorites were nearly all pathetic. She had improved in her singing too. She welcomed back their old acquaintances. She embroidered a little frock for the birthday of the baby next door.

In the face of this soft sunshine Peter Harvey was fain to wink at some other changes of which he did not so heartily approve. Elizabeth seemed somewhat seceding from the ways which he thought best for a woman. She was as delicately neat as ever, but she did not seem to cultivate being as "fine" as other women. She began to ask her mantua-maker how soon she "could" execute her orders, instead of issuing them, to be obeyed, whether or no. Her dinners were as punctual and as dainty as ever, but she developed curious inclinations to include another class of guests—people who did not always give invitations in return. As for her gentle persuasions that they should attend a more faithful and devout ministry than that they found in their genteel chapel-of-ease, Peter Harvey was quite willing to accede to them, for it was a matter of indifference to him, and certainly their former clergyman was very much given to attend operas and balls, and to absent himself at his brother's, the country squire's, with whom he followed the hounds, and Peter Harvey was a man who thought there should be some limits to license, and that clergymen, at least, would be better within them.

But altogether Peter Harvey was well satisfied with the restoration of his handsome, gracious wife, and though at first he was inclined to say to himself that some of the minor changes to which he took slight exception would be sure to pass away when other children came to enliven the house, presently Peter became aware that these very changes had a subtle charm of their own. Not in the least that he learned to understand their origin or their spirit. But he found Elizabeth more at his service than when she had been engaged in laborious vanities to outshine her neighbors. And among their new and poorer guests Peter not only found people more kindly and entertaining than the pragmatic aldermen and their pompous wives, but presently some of these humble visitors did him better business service than the richer ones had done.

Elizabeth started in her upward course in all humility and trembling, too doubtful of her own Christianity to begin straightway to question that of others. Her sweet womanly nature was ready to infer that as she had looked up to her parents and husband in all worldly ways, so they were probably before her on this. But by and by, the truth forced itself even on her humility.

when, even socially or intellectually, we pass before those with whom our heart dwelleth. It is a pang which balances the pleasure of prosperity or fame. But it is nothing to the agony, when crossing the line which divides the renewed man from the old Adam, we suddenly discover that we have left our nearest and dearest at the other side. This is a nameless anguish. The heart that really feels it never dares to clothe it in words, even to itself. It would be its own death blow.

Elizabeth instituted no bravado parallels between her own yearning affection and the mysteries of the Divine Love. She simply clung to her new-found faith that God was good, and pitiful and full of tender mercy, far beyond human imagining. But she did not try to draw hard and fast lines as to how such goodness and tender mercy must exactly manifest themselves. She was wiser than many sages, inasmuch as she was wise enough to know that the working of the moral attributes of the Almighty, like his secret ways in earth and ocean, might be quite above her comprehension.

She had her hopes. How can any of us mistrust a God who has provided that these shall spring, like fresh grass, in every barren place? One hope was that she might be mistaken in her own judgment of what seemed to her as hard and selfish and worldly. Another, that the way was open, by which she herself had escaped from bondage. And a halo of trustful confidence rose like an incense out of these simple hopes, and mounted far beyond them.

Morning and evening she prayed fervently for her dear ones. Nay, every thought became prayer, and shaped itself into the beautiful life that was as a witness and a testimony before them. As we said before, Elizabeth had been trained to silence, and was a shy woman naturally. But science tells us that the dumb have sometimes articulated under the pressure of anxiety and alarm about their darlings. And so Elizabeth found her spiritual speech.

It was—as spiritual speech generally is—of a sort with her natural speech—discreet and gracious. Her father and mother first listened, then she thought they encouraged it. Sometimes her mother would stamp her thoughts and aspirations with a hearty endorsement. Sometimes her father would ask her to repeat a remark, and would observe that “there was something in it.” Elizabeth noticed that her mother became less impatient with her run of stupid servants—she could not quite check the old habit, but she pulled it up very often with a word of commendation.

“I’m thinking we ought to bear with one another, for the Lord bears enough from all of us alike,” she said to Elizabeth.

Her father left off smoking in the best room, and put his pipe away altogether on Sundays.

“Your mother never liked the smell among her curtains, Bessie,” he observed, “and it’s time I gave her her own way, at last. And if I put the cost of my Sunday pipe into the Bible Society’s box, I gain more than it does, for I needn’t drowse away any more Sundays, when I don’t know how few may be left.”

The mother died quite suddenly, the father also, after a long illness, which almost wore all his mind away. But their lives did not go out, to return no more, without first leaving a sweet olive branch of hope and promise with their daughter.

As for Peter Harvey, whenever his wife ventured to bring her new interests before him, he listened with respectful, dubious silence, and thought to himself that she was becoming a clever woman. Nor was he wrong. God’s sunshine in the heart quickens the mind. A Christian, however slow and stupid, is brighter and acuter than he would be without his Christianity. And the highest unconsecrated genius has missed that finest point of intelligence and sympathy, which only intimate contact with the divine nature can impart. Peter and Elizabeth had once been very equally mated. Both were well educated, according to the education of those days, and both were fairly endowed by nature. But her soul had undergone a refining and elevating process, through which it had passed out far ahead of his. She did not in the least notice this herself. But even mere gossiping acquaintances whispered that “Mrs. Harvey was very superior to her husband.”

Children came round the Harvey’s hearth, and for a long time their quiet domestic happiness might have seemed to give the lie to scriptural declarations as to the enmity of the natural heart against God. But the longest time is not forever; and the best wild fruit of human nature always falls rotten to the ground before the gathering season.

Just as family cares were thickening round Peter Harvey, he met with severe and unforeseen losses. He was a man of sanguine temperament, soon depressed, and rash and reckless in his schemes of recuperation. He fancied he saw a way to speedily retrieve his losses. It only involved him more and more.

He was certainly unworthy of his wife Elizabeth; for he had never attained the wisdom of the “virtuous woman’s” husband, whose heart “safely trusted in her.” Only from his look and manner, never once from his words, did she gather that things were going wrong. Now she had always been severely economical. Her establishment had cost at least a fourth less than most houses of its elegant and fitting appearance. But straightway Elizabeth hinted that she could manage perfectly with one servant, and that sundry simplicities, quite compatible with health and comfort, might be immediately introduced into their table arrangements.

That was the only occasion that Mr. Harvey ever spoke harshly to his wife. He rebuked her interference. He scoffed at such paltry retrenchments. He straightway hired a boy to assist the maids with the knives and boots, and that very evening he brought home a huge Chinese chest of tea at twelve shillings a pound.

Elizabeth was a wise woman. That night as she was storing the week’s washing in the linen-closet, perhaps a few tears fell on the fresh garments. But she remembered a homely saying of her mother's, "that the cow was never brought home by the man pulling its head, and the woman its tail." She had to obey her husband and to serve his best interests, too. So her quarterly allowance for dress went unnoticed into the housekeeping. She dropped her single glass of wine for dinner. That would save a whole bottle in a fortnight. She thought no more of a good teacher for her little girls, but quietly continued to instruct them herself.

But nobody can save a man's soul—or his fortune—against his will. Elizabeth soon became sorrowfully aware of new expenses that swallowed double the value of her meek savings. The wine went faster than ever, and Mr. Harvey repaired slowly and sulkily to his office in the morning, and often returned far too late for any plea of business.

Alas, alas! but when moral declension can turn success and prosperity into an apple of Sodom, what fearful bitterness must it add to the sour cup of loss and sorrow! How sad when the character falls beneath the fallen fortune!

We have said before that Elizabeth Harvey was a wise woman. She gave no word to her wifely anguish. Only she was glad with a bitter sweet gladness that her parents were gone from her before this trouble grew out of the very dependence and protection for which her father had been so thankful for her sake. And she was thankful, oh, so thankful! that she knew One to whom she could tell her troubles without rending her heart anew by shaming the man that she loved so tenderly.

The end came. Peter Harvey lay down to die in the prime of his days. He had shortened his own life. Well, he shrunk from seeing his boon companions. He said to his wife, "I should have done better if I had taken your counsel." Over and over again, he asked her to read her favorite hymn, "Jesus, lover of my soul." He bade his boy to "mind his mother in everything;" and not long before he died he said to Elizabeth, "I've no right to leave my widow and fatherless children to God; but He'll take you nevertheless." That was all.

But it was enough for love, which can keep hope alive and strong on very scanty food. Nevertheless, when their children looked back, after long years, they remembered that it was on the day of their father's death, and not in any of the troubles which came after, that their mother lost the last bloom of her beautiful youth.

And thus she came to sit in her widow's cap in the twilight, thinking over all these things, as we first saw her.

CHAPTER II.

CICELY BROOK'S MODE OF HELPING A NEIGHBOR.

MRS. HARVEY was waiting for the arrival of a distant relative and a lawyer who had spent the whole of that day, and of many days before, in her dead husband's office, and who had engaged to come that night, and bring her a final report of her pecuniary position. It was a dull waiting of fear, for she knew it was only a question of how bad matters would be.

She roused herself from her reverie at last, and lit the candle, for she only lit one, though there were three in readiness in the heavy old candelabra. The reaction of the mere act of rising made her feel unable to settle down again. She went out upon the stairs, looked into a bed-room, and then into the little breakfast parlor opening from the hall.

There had been a light there for a long time, for her eldest child had not yet gone to bed, and this was the room where he learned his lessons. He was sitting at the table, with his feet tucked up on the rung of the chair—a delicate boy of about twelve, who looked almost transparent in his deep mourning. He started when his mother opened the door, for the house had been awfully soundless since the little ones retired. He was one of those children who are constantly getting into higher classes, almost against their teacher's will, and at this instant he was busy translating Homer pages beyond his appointed task. He knew nothing about coming trouble, and had private dreams of going to college in two or three years' time.

"George, dear," said Mrs. Harvey, painfully struck by his pale, thin face, "what has kept you so late with your books? They should have been all put away long ago."

"Oh, mother, I only wanted to know how Menelaus and Paris got on in their duel. But I've done now." He had been trying a few stanzas on his own account since he had ceased the translation. He did not mention these.

"It's right for you to like your books well, my child," said his mother, with her hand resting fondly on his shoulder. "Still, there are other things beside books. It would be sad and wrong for you to pore over them till you hurt your health. Such learning does not make a really wise man. I should like to see you heartier and more active. You've had your own ways too much for these last few weeks, and it mustn't be any longer. Go off to bed now, and wake up in the morning bright and early."

"Oh, you needn't fuss about me, mother," said the boy, with a boyish horror of anything like "muddle-coddle," which is often at least as strong in the fragile and studious, who require some of it, as in the hale and stout, who sometimes even seem to like it for a change. And with a good-night kiss he obeyed, and had scarcely gone before a sounding knock warned her to retreat to the best room and receive her dreaded guests.

The lawyer looked the kindest of the two. The second cousin seemed hoarding his civilities like a man who is afraid lest such may be mistaken for promissory notes, payable at some future time.

"Well, madam," the solicitor began, blandly, "we have got through our work at last. It seemed a very complicated matter when we began. But we have got through." There he paused, and somehow poor Elizabeth suddenly and inconsequently remembered a smooth-speaking old surgeon, who, in the days of her girlhood, had once performed a painful operation on her hand.

"We hoped for better things, though," said the second cousin, gloomily.

"Ay, to be sure we did," the solicitor responded. "I am sorry to say, madam, that things might have been a great deal better."

"They couldn't be worse," decided the second cousin, bluntly.

"Well, well, that's hard to say," interposed the lawyer, pitying the strained, worn face that he had known so fresh and bright. "Of course, we will give you any details that you require. But the plain fact is there are no assets to speak of, and a good many debts."

Elizabeth sat silent for a moment, and then asked in a dry, harsh whisper, "Do you mean there is nothing even to pay the debts?"

"Well, I'm afraid it amounts to that," admitted the solicitor; "there is little money owing to the estate, and there are really no effects except the good-will of the business, the stock—which is very limited—the lease of this house and the furniture, and if they are all most favorably disposed of they will not cover the two thousand pounds, which it appears must be paid out of the estate before the other creditors can claim anything."

This referred to the deceased merchant's settlement on his wife, but the words had no meaning to her. She knew there had been certain legal processes gone through at her marriage, but she had never thought of them as securing her comfort amid the general ruin. She had taken Peter Harvey "for better for worse," and had long made up her mind for the "worse" without dreaming of evading it.

"It's very fortunate for you that Peter made so liberal a provision," said the second cousin, reproachfully, for he was thinking. "She didn't bring a penny with her; and I dare say she's been extravagant, and all the poverty is her own fault."

The second cousin was of Mr. Harvey's side of the house.

Elizabeth looked at him, half-mystified for the moment, but just then memory gave one of its singular dives into the dark, and brought back the old marriage-settlement.

"Do you mean that the money meant for me takes precedence of the just debts?" she asked.

"Yes, indeed," said the lawyer, "the property settled on you at your marriage is regarded as yours, distinct from your husband's."

"It certainly don't seem quite fair," observed the second cousin, who had lent Mr. Harvey £20 on an I.O.U.

"Is it mine to do what I like with?" Elizabeth inquired.

"It is yours," returned the lawyer. "The deed, whose draft I have, reserves to you power of absolute disposal. It is singularly brief, and, I should say, was made at the last moment, and was only intended to be temporary, and then got left as it was."

"Just Peter's way," groaned the second cousin, with the inward addition, "She'll get married again, and let the poor children go to ruin, or drift upon their father's relations."

"Then I can pay the debts with it; at least, so far as it will go," said Elizabeth, with a bright flush spreading over her wan face.

"She's so unpractical that she thinks she and the children can live on air; she'll expect us to keep the whole lot," thought the second cousin again.

"Why, madam," said the lawyer, "deeds like this are actually made for the protection of wives and children in such contingencies as the present. In this instance most of the creditors are wealthy men; and, considering the efforts your late husband has recently made to straighten his accounts, in spite of the great depression in his branch of business, I am sure they must all feel they have been honorably dealt with. You have no reason to indulge in the least feeling on their account."

"Certainly not," said the second cousin, briskly; "men in a large way of business calculate on such losses. But I can understand your feelings, cousin, and after you have realized your property, which is really a very handsome provision, and some little time has elapsed—say three months or so—you might quietly pay any smaller sums that may be due in any private way. As you are not obliged to pay any, I don't suppose any one could interfere with you paying who you like. A small debt is a greater loss to some people than a larger one to others. If I had a little free cash just now, I ought to be taking my poor little pale children for a breath of fresh air."

"Mrs. Harvey must not be allowed to pledge herself to anything in such a sudden way as this," said the lawyer, peremptorily. "The sum she can claim is by no means more than sufficient for a very simple maintenance of herself and her young family."

"But I cannot touch it, it is not mine," protested Elizabeth, repeating her words to every argument that they brought forward, till, at last, they rose and said it was time for them to depart; they would not go into any papers to-night, and there need be no hurry—she would think better of it when she had a little time for quiet consideration.

Elizabeth lighted them to the door, and said good-night mechanically, and then returned past the parlor, and went on to her own solitary bed-room. There were no sounds but the weird sounds of silence, the clock ticking on the stair, the flicker of the candle, the river lazily lapping the terrace below. She had a curious disembodied feeling. She lifted a chair and set it down sharply to wake herself.

Her soul turned a forlorn gaze over the dead level of the long-past years. What had there been in them to train her for this conflict? Marked decisions and active efforts had never come among her duties. It had been hers to submit, to persuade, to endure. How could that prepare her for this? Ah, Elizabeth, the tender Father—God—knew best, and the patient doing of one duty can never unfit for the brave doing of another!

"Why should you give it up?" asked the Temp-

ter. "Who would do as much for you? These creditors would not have been paid up as well as they are but for your caring and sparing. If you had been but a hired housekeeper all these years, you would have had something of your own; why should you have nothing because you have been more than a housekeeper, have given more than faithful service, have strained your very soul in this behoof?"

"You are going to plunge yourself into a poverty you don't understand," the Tempter went on, "not such a poverty as your aunt Mary's, with even her little pension of thirty pounds. She used to say that she knew her cloth, and cut her coat accordingly; but what cloth at all will you have? You will be as badly off as your mother's old charwoman, who worked from six on Monday morning till twelve on Saturday night, and was very glad of an extra loaf or blanket from the parish. What can you do for a living? How much are people paid for needle-work, and what would your drawings fetch? What will you do with children? You'll sink to the lowest, and then fall sick and die, and they'll be turned into the street. It's only the common lot of such as they'll become. And when they're in workhouses and jails, a disgrace to themselves and a curse to society, shall you have done the world a service? Why should you fancy that you and your children will be above the ordinary temptations that come to destitution? You are on a level with the rest of humanity, and only need the same candle to reveal the same dark places in your hearts." (The devil's best lies are made of half-truths.)

"Two thousand pounds," pursued the beguiling voice, whispering at the poor wrung mother-heart, "why, you could go and settle in the country, and live the quiet life that has been your ideal in these latter days of anxiety and moil and terror. You can live near some endowed school for the benefit of your dear, frail, clever son" (and against the blank wall of the chamber the Tempter conjured a phantasm of the child, with his transparent hands, bending over his books in the yellow candle-light). "Then, between scholarships and exhibitions and such like, you need have no fear for his future. Verily likely your boy will be a great man, and will be able to pay off old scores quite easily, with something over to the people for waiting. And you can bring up your little girls at your own side, and, well-kept and well-bred, you need be under no stress of fear for their establishment in life. You will be poor enough, but you will be genteel, and not lack friends. You will have leisure, and you will be able to do so much good among the villagers. You may become a spiritual Lady Bountiful."

The Tempter seemed tugging at her heart—tempters are generally very eager and exigent—and the Something that should have answered him seemed to Elizabeth to stand far off, silent, with reproachful gaze.

Seemed, we say.

For who was it that upheld her, as with one strong shudder, like the shaking off of a physical weight, she crossed the room to the ebony bureau, whose every pigeon-hole she had learned by heart during the last few days. There was but one which she had not looked through lately. It was the farthest to the right, and it held a single yellow deed.

It was her marriage settlement. With other papers, it had returned to her husband's hands, on the death of her father, who had been sole trustee. It should have been in other custody, but these were simple people, who avoided legal interference as much as possible, and the new solicitor had only seen an old draft copy.

As she drew it forth, a little withered flower fell out and dropped to the ground. An orange-flower. The document had never been opened since the time of bridal-trappings.

She clutched it in her hands, as if to hold it away from some unseen Presence that might grasp it from her. She looked round the room. There was no fire in the grate, bright with its summer polish. There was no tinder-box on its usual stand, the negligent servant had forgotten to place one there. "May not this be a check sent from Providence to curb you?" the Tempter began again.

She threw the deed behind the bars of the fireplace, and thrust the candle through them. How hard it was to get rid of that thick parchment! What a many opportunities it gave the Tempter to whisper, "It is not too late yet!" But she only thrust the candle further in. It would not have cost her so much had it been her own hand. Before the deed was ashes the whole candle was used, and it was in utter darkness that she dropped upon her bed, with one convulsive sob—

"My God, thou hast saved me from myself!"

Let those who toss sleepless or dream-haunted in their troubles try one safe recipe before they resort to the baleful poppy. Let them walk straight into the darkness of their woe, and grapple with its worst phantom. Let them make their souls wholesomely weary with active exercise in the fresh air of God's precepts and promises. We nearly all sleep soundly in the midnight of our tribulation, when God's rod has struck us so sharply that we forget to beat ourselves with our little pricks. It is in the twilight afterward, the hour of dim forms and nameless shadows, of doubt and weakness, that we lie moaning and staring.

That night Elizabeth Harvey slept like the dead.

She did not wake till she heard her servant's footstep on the stair, and pleasant familiar sounds of life on the terrace beneath. She woke slowly. Her soul seemed to have a long way to return.

She bathed her face and tidied her hair. She remembered what she had done, and was glad she had done it. But she was glad with a humble joy. For she feared she could not do it again.

Then she went to her boy's room. She passed her serving damsel in the passage, and spoke cheerfully to her.

George was already up and dressed, and at his books again. It smote her to see it.

"Put them away, dear," she said, "I want to talk to you. I have something to tell you. You are my right-hand man now, you know, George."

The boy pressed up to her, half fondling, half proud.

"You wont mind when I tell you that we are very poor now, George."

His face fell a little, for the college was uppermost in his mind. Scarcely daring to look at him, his mother hurried on. "We shall have to leave our dear old house and go away somewhere else, and we shall all have to work very hard and go without many things that we like, at least for the present. You'll be my brave boy, and help me all you can by being bright and cheerful, wont you, George? Then I shall not mind anything else."

It troubled her that he stood so quiet. It need not. Life hangs before children like the sheet of a magic lantern, and as each new view supplants the last, the last is forgotten, and the present one seems the prettiest. But there are some scenes that return often. The college will come back to little George's longing fancy, but never mind, at present it is blotted out for quite a new and fascinating design composed of notes of interrogation. Poverty meant that they must leave this house, said his mother. Where would they go? Would it be into the country? George only hoped it would be away from the river. He had never liked that. As a baby, he had cried when taken to the windows overlooking it, and though brave enough in every other respect, for as frail as he was, he was still frightened to be in a boat. George rather wished the new home might be farther east, somewhere deeper in that great, unmeasurable wilderness of bricks and mortar, on whose margin he had hovered once or twice, and in whose mysterious precincts his imagination played at a perpetual Arabian Nights.

She fancied she guessed his thoughts. "As God wills that we shall be poor, He will take care of us," she said, gently. "He will give us all we need. He will teach you Himself, my Geordie, as you are not able to go to school any more."

"School!" Why, George felt already far beyond that elementary formula. It is not from his first glimpses of practical life that any healthily made boy recoils to his books.

When the lawyer next saw Elizabeth he thought that she had become quite reconciled to her small, sure provision, she looked so calm and happy. He was very angry when she told him what she had done. That came of clients keeping their papers in their own hands, he said. He told her that her rashness need not inevitably stand good. It might be a fair case for an equitable settlement if there was anybody to take it up. But he was a kindly-hearted man, and appreciated her motives, though his admiration found its only expression in blame and grumbling, and he indignantly repudiated the widow's only suggestion that the creditors need not know the sacrifice she had made.

He told them. And they each and all said, "Well, it was really fair that a man's own should suffer first in his misfortunes. Still, not many women would have done as Mrs. Harvey had, and they honored her for it." Apart, Mr. B., whose debt was thirty pounds, said that if he was Mr. C., whose claim was four hundred, he should be ashamed to take it all, that he should, a rich man, keeping two carriages and three hunters, and giving away ever so much in subscriptions to charities. In Mr. B.'s opinion, Mr. C. should only take half, and think himself well off to have got that. But it never struck Mr. B. to set the example by commuting his own claim to fifteen pounds.

Mr. C., on the other hand, observed that for his part he thought the widow had behaved like a heroine, and that certainly something should be done for her. He had heard some whisper about commuting their claims. He did not think that would be pleasing to a lady of her highly independent mind. But she should not be allowed to want, and her children should be looked after in some way. He could not do it himself, he lived so far from London, but he could trust the two next largest creditors—Mr. A. and Mr. D.—to do everything that was right and considerate.

Mr. A. thought her rather a fool for her pains. Didn't believe she'd have done it unless she'd got some money put away safe somewhere.

Mr. D. was always very busy. Thought a man had a right to his own, without the burden of any moral obligations to the person who paid it to him. But was ready to do what he could. Would give his five pound if a subscription was organized.

The creditors all received their money, and they all made their professions, but everybody's business, as usual, proved to be nobody's, and they each passed on their way and forgot all about it.

All but one. There was a poor old maid, a Miss Brook, who had earned a scanty living as agent for some of Peter Harvey's goods, among his poorer out-lying customers. A small sum, something like six pounds, had been due to her for commission. She had trusted to it for her rent, and when its payment first seemed doubtful, she had gone to the Harveys' solicitor, and pleaded her peculiar case and her great poverty very forcibly. He had engaged that she should not suffer much in any event. Finally, of course, Miss Brook was paid in full. She gave one or two inarticulate grunts as she took the money. She had to pay it all over to her landlord that very evening.

Next day she "took the liberty," in her own phrase, of calling on Mrs. Harvey. She was a tall, gaunt woman with bushy eyebrows and wispy bonnet-strings, and she carried a great gingham umbrella, which she clasped about its waist.

"If there's anything to do that I can help you in, I'll do it," she said, fiercely, with a frown. "I'm used to most things."

"It is really very good of you," said Mrs. Harvey, with grateful sincerity (whereupon the old maid frowned fiercer than at first). The fact is, there are so many things to do, that I scarcely know where to begin."

"You'll have to get lodgings and to pack," observed Miss Brook, with a decisive definiteness that was more strengthening and comforting than any amount of wordy sympathy. "I can help in that. I know all about lodgings, and having 'em got into good order before you go in, and all that. I won't be put upon by landlords—I know 'em."

Grim Miss Brook had neither silver nor gold to give, but she had all her own hard-earned experience of life, and all the courage that she had learned in her loneliness. She helped Mrs. Harvey greatly, by being the first to name every necessary hard fact. It did not seem so cruel after she had spoken of it as a matter-of-course.

"Don't you go and be afraid of living in very lowly places," she said. "There's no need to be. There's good and bad of all sorts in them as well as everywhere, only there's more of both. While you've got to be a poor woman, my dear, be one, and don't break your back with straining to be anything else. Keep as close in everything as you can, that you may have the more to spare in bread and beef, for that's blood and bone to the children. There's all sorts of nice clean places cheap enough for the poorest. Little old cottages belonging to monthly nurses, and watchmen, and the like. I'll soon look out and find you one."

She did. It was in a mean, broken up, old street, just at the beginning of the Mile End Road. The lodgings were two tiny rooms with sloping roofs and projecting windows. The stairs were narrow and cracked. But the place was respectable, and the rough, cheerful landlady—forewoman at a neighboring laundry—was quite prepared to re-whitewash, mend broken panes, etc., at Miss Brook's suggestion.

The very extremity of the change made it easier to be borne. It was like going out into a new country.

"You'll never repent it, my dear," frowned Miss Brook, "there's nobody about here that knew you before, to be breaking your heart with their pity. It'll go quite the other way. The woman of the house says she can see you're the thorough lady, and so will the other folks, and that will put you on your mettle to keep yourself up. Ah, my dear, Cicely Brook knows by experience, that one way of life is about as good as another, if you look at it right down to its bottom."

Mrs. Harvey took away but little of her furniture. In her determination to pay all the debts possible, she let it all go. And the debts were paid. A glorious and comfortable conclusion which enabled her to endure the sight of the second cousin's wife cheapening her own dear mother's treasured stock of lace. The second cousin and his wife were very punctual at the sale, and carried off a good many of the little Harvey's toys for nothing, because "it was such a pity to leave them where they might be kicked about and destroyed." However, as they did not plunder Hatty Harvey's armless doll, or her Sister Milly's broken kaleidoscope, Mrs. Harvey forgave them, these oldest playthings being the more particular personal favorites.

CHAPTER III.

IN MILE END.

SO when they "moved" to Mile End, it was with the servant's bed, an old couch, a damaged crib, a few cane chairs, a painted table and a dozen pieces of willow-pattern crockery. Elizabeth saved the black silhouettes of her parents and husband, but her portrait in oil was sold, in a lot with the initialled silver, and the family crest in wools. Some furniture dealer bought them all. Well, it is pleasant and honorable to have family heirlooms and specialties, but sometimes it is even more honorable to have lost them!

And after all, the little slapping rooms did not look so bad. They had a few green plants for the window-sill, and a bit of red glazed cotton for a curtain. They put the willow-pattern china on the mantelpiece, the dish in the middle, and the plates at the side, with the cups and saucers in front, just as the Sèvres set had stood in the cabinet in the old home. They hung up the silhouettes, and George's common bedroom book-shelves, on which they ranged their Bibles and Prayer-books, and a few old favorite volumes, which they had been able to keep partly because they were so old and worn. And then the two little girls clapped their hands and said it was "as good as a game."

But George was quieter, and his mother's heart was yearning tenderly over her boy. What did all this mean for his future? Ah, me, she knew that it meant that he must take to hard, early toil—he, poor lad, young, half-trained, innocent, must mix with rude, rough, vulgar people, and either break in such a fierce crucible or pass through it, leaving behind something of his own. Then, again, how, oh, how, was she to tell her child that he must find out some way by which to earn a few shillings a week, and must not mind hard, dirty hands, and coarse, soiled clothes? Miss Brook never hinted at this. She feared to touch the torn tendrils of the mother heart. This was a winepress which the good woman had not trodden herself. And to Elizabeth it seemed harder to bear than to put that document into the fire as she had done. The widow had not yet proved the blessed truth that when we take one determined step on the steep ladder of righteousness and self-sacrifice, that God himself comes and lifts us over many succeeding rungs.

She never needed to speak to George on the subject. He spoke first. The boy had not been learning nothing in these few weeks since he had left school. He had fathomed what poverty meant, that it meant one did not get food and clothing without knowing exactly what they cost, and where the money came from.

"Mother," said he, in the twilight of that very first evening, amid their pathetic novelties, "you always said I read writing well, didn't you?"

"Yes, dear," she answered, wondering.

"I could always make out the queer handwritings that came to father, couldn't I?" he asked again.

"Yes, dear, often better than we could ourselves," she said.

"Do you know that they hire boys to read writing in printing offices?" he inquired.

"Yes, I know they do," she replied, with a jump of the heart.

"I used to know the reading boy at the Apollo Press, which I passed on my way to school," George went on. "I never spoke to him, but I always saw him. He was a nice, decent-looking fellow. Somebody told me his father had been a dissenting minister." A pause. Then suddenly, "Mother, a reading boy is wanted by a printer just round in the main street, here. Will you let me go?"

"Do you think he would take you, darling?" she asked, in fond, unreasoning despair.

"I know he will," said George, proudly. "I've been in already and spoken to him. He gave me a paper to try me, and I read it right off without a blunder, and he said I'd do finely. But I said I must speak to you first. He'd give me six shillings a week to begin."

"I suppose you must go, George," she said, with a smile that would not be sad.

He jumped up and kissed her. He was quite as happy as he could have been had he won the first prize for Latin verse.

Now, in the earlier days of her poverty, before her eyesight weakened and her hands grew unsteady, Miss Brook had got her living by waistcoat making. It was not so very badly paid in those days, when domestic service absorbed so much female labor, and machines were unknown. Miss Brook advised Mrs. Harvey to try it. She could get her work from her own old employers, and she would teach her and help her till she was able to give full satisfaction. Elizabeth was only too glad to follow her advice.

It may be remembered that Elizabeth's worthy mother had spoken as if the good education her daughter had received would stand between her and want, and it may be superciliously thought that it must have utterly failed her before she was reduced to such an humble resource as this. Not so. Elizabeth could have kept a school, and a good one, and she possessed capital to start with. But she did not. She could have gone out teaching. But she wisely preferred anything that kept her at her own hearth, and gave her own little girls the benefit of her society and instruction. And do you suppose there was any one part of her education which did not help her now? Was it not her well-disciplined mind which made her such a quick learner that Miss Brook held up her hands in astonishment? Did not her skill in delicate needlework stand her in good stead when it enabled her to throw herself into the gap caused by some sick embroideresses at the very moment when a large fancy order was driving her employer to despair? Was her drawing quite thrown away, when at last new patterns were suddenly wanted, and she revealed that she could supply them, although she had not been prepared to starve till that genteel work came in her way, and although that genteel work not being very constant or trustworthy, she contentedly returned to her stitching in its intervals.

All her rare gifts of economy and "household good" found worthy service now. She could make wholesome and dainty dishes at less cost than her neighbors' unsavory messes. These neighbors were not unwilling to learn of her either, for she was no despised "French madam," suspected of frogs and grass. She could also teach her own little girls. She knew, too, the most effective and simplest modes of cleanliness.

Do not think that her life was all sunshine.

It takes an inward struggle before eyes that have been used to rich carpets shine contentedly on bare boards. (And bare boards continued the fashion with the Harveys for many a day, for even when little odd prosperities came to them Elizabeth would not spend any perceptible sums on luxuries until they had made a little hoard against a possible time of sickness and adversity). And it takes a great struggle for a delicately-bred lady to accept that it is her duty to God and man to go out bare-handed, and store her one pair of gloves for Sunday wear. And it takes a greater struggle still for a mother to pass in and out among words and scenes which she would die to keep from her children's ears, and yet to believe that God's angels close their wings over them and shut them in from harm.

Neither think that her life had no galas.

There was a genuine merriment in their Saturday evening marketing, with sometimes a penny over for a bunch of flowers or a brace of ruddy apples. [N.B.—No apples are so good as those which must be divided.] The tradespeople were always in a good humor when that little family came in. Hatty had a pet cat in every shop she frequented, and the grocer's wife always lent Milly the Youth's Magazine before it was two months old.

They had two or three "whole" holidays in a year, fixing them for the whole family when George got his. When the weather was wet they went to the British Museum, and when it was fine they sometime got as far as Epping Forest, and brought home bundles of roots, and pine-cones to make fancy baskets to plant them in. Elizabeth never forgot the glad uplifting of her heart when their good landlady came to the door to wish them "good luck" on the very first of these excursions, and added that George "didn't look as if he needed change of air nowadays, for he was a sight fatter and rosier than when he first came." Elizabeth knew that it was true.

And the Sabbath was always such a blessed day in the little home—when they went to church together, and read the Bible aloud and sang hymns, and had nothing to think about except how God loved them all, and made them love one another. That was the time when Elizabeth's soul sat down at its Father's feet. On other days a care for the far future would sometimes crop up among her very thankfulness for present mercies. But on that holy day her heart had leisure to note how the sunshine of God's promises shimmers all down the vistas of life, and is overhead always, even when the boughs are so thick and dark as to obscure it for a while. On that day, too, her heart had time to get nearer the inner hearts of her children, and somehow, the more utterly she loved them, the stronger she felt to trust them to His care who had brought her through her own "crooked place," and turned its wilderness into water-springs.

"I'll tell you what it is, Mrs. Harvey," said Miss Brook, as they once walked home from evening service together, with George and his two sisters in front, "you paid a high price for your independence, but it has turned out a good bargain for every one of you; and, mark my words, it will be the best fortune you could leave your children. You'll see if it isn't."

So shall we.

CHAPTER IV.

A CONTRAST.

DESPITE the manifold trials of her hard-working, poverty-stricken widowhood, Mrs. Harvey might have been almost as happy as she had ever been in her life, but for her children. They were good children, and she had faith that God could preserve them in the path where He had placed them. But, just as we often feel that we may trust His providence that our bread and water shall be sure, yet trouble sorely whether He will always grant us milk and butter, so Mrs. Harvey grieved lest they should lose the dainty, delicate ways of her own youth, and of their former position. They were different now from those around them, although they were no richer. But would they be as different ten or twenty years hence? She could bear it for George. He was older than the girls, and more formed already, and, with his present fund of information, and his thirst for more, she had little reason to fear his falling into the coarse pleasures that degraded too many about him. The mother had a curiously boundless faith in her boy. It had been the habit of her life, as well as the instinct of her nature, to look up to the stronger sex. There might not have been very much in either her father or husband to justify it, but the ease and happiness with which some of the strongest and noblest women reverence and obey very ordinary men, is one of the sweetest and most touching hints of woman's true place. Elizabeth was one of those women who see in men not only all they are, but all they ought to be. It may be fairly discussed whether such reverence is not more honorable and wholesome to her who gives, and him who takes, than the modern feminine consciousness of "purifying and elevating influence."

It was about her daughters that Mrs. Harvey pondered. She taught them and lived with them, but not all her maternal anxieties had worried her into any unnatural shutting up. Among the visions of her own youth, she remembered several "comedown" genteel people, friendless and antedated, with bloodless faces and ghostly tones. To her sensible judgment this horror was greater than any other. Better that Hatty and Milly should grow up red-handed, bouncing and cockneyfied! And yet it seemed such a pity!

To tell the truth it was Hatty that troubled her most—Hatty, who was always spoken of up and down the lowly street as "the young lady." Unless Hatty belied her promise, she would be a beauty. The rough, outspoken neighbors said so to her face. It was a comfort to poor Mrs. Harvey that Hatty did not seem to care much either way.

Little brown Milly was in no danger of flattery here. Her angular figure and white face were mere foils to her sister's lithe form, sweet-pea complexion, and blue eyes. Hatty's charms were those which appealed readily to uninstructed eyes, while it required deeper physiognomists than those poor neighbors to appreciate Milly's noble head, and grave dark eyes. It was the same with their characters. There were times when Mrs. Harvey, in her vexation, was almost ready to say within herself that her eldest daughter's very beauty and graces, physical and moral, must have something innately vulgar in them, they were of such a sort to command popular notice and applause. She was an universal baby lover. Had crèches been the fashion in that day, she might have been said to be as good as a crèche in the locality. She was always leading home some lost child, or volunteering the charge of some infant. Whenever Hatty was missing, she was to be found in the local dairy, where there were twins. She could keep a dozen children amused, for she had an endless fund of "stories," such being mere recapitulations of the ways of life in her old home, which Hatty grew to regard as the fairy land which it seemed to her auditors. Milly Harvey was of quite another disposition. She made few friends among the neighbors, shrank from children, and rarely entered a stranger's room, however invited, and spoke so seldom to anybody but her mother and George, that she was in little danger of catching the colloquialisms which infected Hatty's speech, and shocked her mother.

Hatty was also what is called "clever at her needle." Yet it was not she, but Milly, who went down the patient stitches of the family darning and sewing, and was oftener and oftener trusted with a straight seam in what they called "mamma's pay-work." But Hatty could put a ribbon across a bonnet, and a flower upon the ribbon, in the right way. She became an authority and a benefactress at Whitsuntide and Boxing-day. Hatty's idea of beauty was gayety of color and fulness of form. And for either of these she was ready to despise soundness of material or neatness of workmanship. Mrs. Harvey's own quiet taste had descended to Milly, after whom the boys in the street would sometimes call "Quaker." But Mrs. Harvey's prim purchases always grew smart the moment Hatty put them on. And horror of horrors, the dairy wife, out of gratitude for her kindness to the twins, presented Hatty with a pinchbeck brooch, which Hatty herself had admired in a shop window!

"Never you mind," said sage Miss Brook, on some occasion which had brought out an expression of the mother's anxiety; "God made gay cockatoos, as well as sweet nightingales and useful hens. You've not got to fuss yourself about what isn't in Hatty, but to find out what is, and make the best of that. God has got a use for the very ways that puzzle you, so long as the devil doesn't get 'em first. And mark me, Mrs. Harvey, your wise-like Milly, who is safe from most of Hatty's dangers, will have other hard passes of her own, of the sort that's too narrow for any hand to help her in, except an angel's."

The truth was Hatty was lonely in her own home. There is a great deal of that loneliness even in the most united and loving families. And, while we have always much sympathy for the genius who goes ahead of his fellows, too many of us simply slight and condemn the simple lowly nature that is left farthest behind. Could Mrs. Harvey but have known it, she had conferred a priceless boon on Hatty by the act of unconscious heroism, which had changed the level of her children's lives. Hatty was not a girl to be improved by what is called "education." She was far too sweet-natured to have become pedantic, which is the revenge that some shallow minds take for being sown with too heavy a crop. But she would have been disheartened. Only her beauty and grace would have saved her from constantly filling the demoralizing place of universal inferior, and these would naturally have assumed undue proportions in her eyes. In cultivated society her companions would, too frequently, not have been of the highest type. In a word, unless her mother had possessed the uncommon judiciousness to see and counteract these temptations, Hatty would probably have become an idle, gossiping, sentimental, fine lady. And Mrs. Harvey had no claim to uncommon judiciousness; except, perchance, that greatest claim of all, the will and the power to do the plain right thing, which is, after all, the imperial sword that can cut through all Gordian knots of social difficulty. In the present instance it had placed Hatty where her powers of lowly kindness and helpfulness came to the front, and given her friends whose roughness and ignorance were not necessarily connected with any moral taint, and who honestly respected and admired her.

Naturally enough, as time passed on, the household means increased. The day of sickness and adversity, carefully provided for, did not come. George rose rapidly in his printing-office, and expressed no wish to leave it. Often his mother almost hinted that he might procure some kind of counting-house work with shorter hours and a healthier atmosphere. For, though he was certainly far stronger than he had ever seemed likely to be in his earlier boyhood, he was still a slender, delicate lad, who grew very fast, had a slight appetite, and a strange inclination for abnormally long and rapid walks. As for Milly, she had proved such an apt pupil, under her mother's sole tuition, that she was presently in constant work as designer to a small manufactory near, and only needed to fill up her short leisure with the less remunerative stitching. "It was no trouble to teach her, except that she soon got beyond me," Mrs. Harvey would say fondly, "and that's always the way with the good scholars."

So they were able to leave their old rickety lodgings, and take a quaint, ancient four-roomed cottage down a quiet "Providence Place" hard by. This removal was not so easy as the last one had been, for of late they had odd shillings to invest from time to time, and the product of these, joined to the invention and ingenuity that they had all learned when there was no money to spend, made the new home look a very bright, snug place. Hatty filled the two tiny parlor windows with flowers, mostly raised from seeds or sickly shoots bestowed upon her by some of her friends.

"If you wouldn't buy the red carpet that I chose, and look grave when I put on my red ribbons, you can't object to the red in my flowers!" she said. "Twasn't me that made the geraniums!"

There was real housekeeping for Hatty now, and Hatty did it. She scrubbed down the whole house once a week. She went down on her knees at six o'clock in the morning and whitened the tiny courtyard in front of the door. She kept the windows so clean that you couldn't see there was glass in them. And yet, in her own homely phrase, "she was not above" keeping friends with people who were content to live in a constant "muddle."

"You may be as particular as you like with your own ways," she said, "but you needn't be so over-particular with other people's. And there's no use in disliking dirt so much that you can't even clean it up."

One thing Mrs. Harvey fervently desired, for all her children, that they might be God's children as well as hers. They had been brought up in a very different atmosphere to that of her own youth. They had lived under the warm shelter of a life to whom God, and Saviour, and eternity, and duty, were much more real than any material realities. And yet Mrs. Harvey's keen maternal sympathies could feel that they were all just what she had once been. She could bring them up in the courts of the Lord, but her hand could not raise for them the veil of the holy of holies. Only God Himself could do that. And the mother prayed and hoped. Her noble-minded, right-feeling George, her patient, thoughtful Milly, often seemed so near, so near. Theirs was the nature that can of itself appreciate so much of religion, from its side of moral and spiritual beauty. Milly was one of those who delight to clothe themselves in bands of strictest discipline. She had her morning and evening portions, her regular times, when her mother noticed that she sought solitude. Her favorite religious reading lay among books which were not then so popular as they have since become—writings of old Anglican divines, whose solemn precepts, clothed in stately English, had an echo as of a (Gregorian chant pealing down the tinted sunlight of an old cathedral. Mrs. Harvey sometimes found scraps of her daughter's writing, such as sets of "Resolutions for the New Year," or "Rules for daily devotion." It was actually these which dampened her hopes. They were of "the letter which killeth," rather than "the spirit which maketh alive." They were full of self-education and self-mortification, but they never once reached the true Christian idea of self-sacrifice. Their very asceticism and discipline were the mere self-indulgence of such a nature as Milly's. Mrs. Harvey sorrowfully owned that her darling was still on the wrong side of that mysterious line which divides the natural from the spiritual man—that she had not yet passed through Leviticus to the glorious Gospel of Christ.

And still Hatty seemed so much farther off. She read her Bible—the historical books and the Revelation. She seldom read anything else on Sundays. Hatty was no great reader at any time. On Sundays she would go about singing, "Oh, that will be joyful," or, "There is a land of pure delight," instead of the "Poor Mary Anne," and the "No, we never mention her," which she was given to lilt on week-days. It was a peculiarity of Hatty that she always sang sad songs and joyful hymns. Hymns had always been easy lessons to Hatty, while catechism had only represented tears and failure. She had been first tried with Watts's "Mother's Catechism," and had got on well through the simple facts at the beginning, and there stuck. She had been tried with the "Shorter Catechism," and the Church Catechism afterward, for Mrs. Harvey's creed was truly catholic in its breadth. In the first Hatty knew the first answer. "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy Him forever," and in the second she could reply to two questions, "What is your name?" and "What is your duty toward your neighbor?" That last subject she learned like magic in one Sunday afternoon, and never forgot it, and became greatly addicted to quote it in conversation. Mrs. Harvey was sorely afraid that her Hatty would be one of those good-natured, utterly careless people, whose status for time and for eternity is one of the sorest problems with many thoughtful people.

But He who brings the last to be first, and perfects His wisdom in the mouths of babes and sucklings, had ruled otherwise. Among these Harvey children, the first plain active decision for God was destined to come from this perplexing Hatty.

CHAPTER V.

HATTY DECIDES.

IT was a bright, dancing June morning; George was at his office—Millicent was out, taking home some of her patterns. Mrs. Harvey was at her needlework, and Hatty was sitting at a side table, shelling peas from a wooden bowl into a willow-pattern vegetable dish. She wore a piece of washed red ribbon in her hair, and a house-apron of bright-green print, with a frill at the bottom.

"Mother," she said, rather suddenly, "you wouldn't mind me being a member at Zion Chapel, would you?—I want to."

It must be explained that Mrs. Harvey and Milly attended church, and then kept house together. As George chose to go all across London to hear a celebrated preacher, Hatty was obliged to go alone, and had got into the habit of attending Zion Chapel, where most of the neighbors went, who attended divine worship at all.

Mrs. Harvey stuck her needle in her work. "You know I regard all Christian sects as aisles in the same house of God, my dear," she said. "And I shall thank our Father very much if He has given you the right to call yourself the follower of Him. I feared you didn't think very seriously of these solemn matters, Hatty."

"I don't see there's much to think about, mother," said the girl, simply. "It's just does one mean to be good, or wicked; and if one means to be good, how is one to be it? I couldn't make a goodness worth anything if I tried ever so. Of course, nobody can, but then one like me is in no danger of fancying I can. So I should have to go without being good at all, unless somebody else would give me his goodness, and that's just what Christ does. But I haven't taken it, unless I make up my mind to keep in His way and do what He says."

"Yes, my dear," said her mother, "that is the root of the matter."

"And I should like to belong to Zion Chapel, not because I see any difference between it and the church—I'm too stupid to notice the sort of things that George talks about, schism and apostolic succession, and such like—but because I got to care for these things through people that go there. They are not clever people, mother. They are mostly like me. I'm not far forward enough to understand the things that puzzle and interest George and Milly. The parts of the Bible that I can understand at all, are plain and straightforward enough, and have more in them than will last my lifetime. But old Uncle George at the dairy, and Mary Smith, the sempstress, knew the sort of feelings that I had. They knew how one is likely to shuffle on, from day to day, just doing one's work, as if it were nothing for God to notice, and meaning to think some day, but never thinking, and dropping off at last, like the beasts that perish. Old George at the dairy used to tell me that he believed I thought religion was a plaster to be stuck on when one was sick. And he was right. At least, I thought religion was separate bits to be pricked into one's life, and that some people, like ministers, should have a great many, but that such as me couldn't have more than one or two, a prayer at night and morning, and a sermon on Sunday. I remember when Mary Smith was converted. It's near two years ago. She always had sat at her work all day long before, and been a steady girl that went to church, and didn't gallivant. And there she was, just the same. And said I to her, 'Mary, what does being converted mean? What difference does it make to you? Ain't you doing just the same as you did before?' And she said, 'No, indeed, Miss Hatty, there's many a time when I've been pressed, that I've sent home seams scarcely fastened, so that they'd be sure to rip; but, please God, my seams will never rip again.' And that made me see how religion could come into such a common life as mine, cleaning and cooking, and just making things as pleasant as I can. And from that day, all these two years I've seen a difference, I've noticed myself in ways of work—getting off it, or getting over it, that have showed me what I wasn't, and what I ought to be. And so," said Hatty, simply, "I want to join Zion Chapel, because it began there."

Now the minister of Zion Chapel was an old devout man, who did not spare himself in his Master's service. He was doing a work of which no one took any heed, and which to his humility, seemed to himself, but poor and insignificant. In those days the East end of London had not become a focus for the seal, philanthropy and sentiment of the West. Foreign visitors were not taken to Ratcliff Highway as to a disgusting peep-show. This old minister would have shrunk from the very mention of scenes which are now drawn with Fuseli-exaggeration to make effective background for the supposed sweetness and light of the other end of the town. His gentle, tremulous hands were far too weak to let down the cup of salvation into that black dungeon of spirits in darkness. But he could stand and plead, and hold others back from going near its perilous archways. He had been a widower for nearly forty years—a childless widower. No dream of promotion would have taken him from the humble, common people, whose welfare, temporal and eternal, had happily and usefully re-filled his emptied heart. But he took no thought of self-sacrifice therefore, for no promotion was ever likely to come to him. He could only say very plain things in a very plain way, and superficial sharp people would have pronounced him an "unpractical man." But his poor flock could have told such, that somehow, obedience to their pastor's unworldly advice always led them farther and farther from the workhouse, the mad-house and the prison.

Such was the man, under whose direct personal ministrations Hatty Harvey sat, week after week, with about half-a-dozen other young people, for nearly two months before their admission to church-membership. Was it any marvel that, at the end of that time, Hatty had grown much more subdued and womanly? The hoyden was reined. The fine animal spirits, the indomitable lightness of heart were not destroyed, they were rather fenced about from the destroyer, and taught to preserve their powers, sweet and fresh, to lighten the labors of a humanity which left half its laughter in an empty Eden.

Hatty became a Sabbath-school teacher, and soon had the largest class. Mr. Webber, the superintendent and chief man of Zion Chapel, said she was "an invaluable young person." She found no difficulty in keeping up the "home visitation" of her pupils.

It was the most natural thing in the world to her. The parents used to ask her to take tea with them. One enthusiastic dustman engaged her for a whole hour hearing about the secrets of his profession. The folks at home couldn't help laughing when she told them.

"Never mind," said Hatty, "one thing is pretty near as good as another, only we could get along easiest without those that think themselves finest."

But next Sunday, the dustman was sitting with oiled hair, on a back seat in Zion Chapel.

And so Mrs. Harvey was greatly set at rest about Hatty. For Mrs. Harvey had the wisdom which is thankful for every good thing, even though it may not be the good thing that exactly fits our own taste.

"Mother likes pears best, but she don't think apples have no right to grow," said Hatty.

It was no wonder that Hatty was a very attractive woman. She grew up even lovelier than her childhood had promised. She was sometimes taken for a little above her age, on account of her tall, full figure, and even the stately outline of her features might have contributed to the mistake. More than that, she had a quaint, homely wit, essentially womanly—the precise sort of wit that used to be the pleasant fashion among great ladies, before female education was carried on in the dangerous style of "high farming," the kind of wit that a queen can enjoy, and a servant-maid understand. Hatty dressed very neatly now, rejecting flimsiness and flauntiness as "not becoming or consistent." (She had once seen the old minister glance, while speaking of the adornment of "a meek and quiet spirit," at a flounced barege that she was wearing). At the same time she vindicated her natural tastes by a single bright ribbon and delightfully fresh white ruffles. But how surprised Hatty would have been to be told she was witty! As for her good looks she heard enough of "that nonsense," as she called it. The only compliment that ever moved her was to be told she was "like her mother about the face." Then she blushed, asked, "Do you really think so?" and shook her head.

SICKNESS OF THE SOUL.—Says a writer in Scribner's Magazine: It is rather interesting to see how even with some very benevolent people a moral taint is a bar to charity. Is he honest? they ask first. If that question is answered satisfactorily, their generosity knows no bounds. But if the poor fellow has the double misfortune of a light purse and a slim conscience—then he must move on! If he is sick in body, they help him, O how tenderly! If he is sick in soul, they cast him off without compunctions. If a pile of bricks falls and breaks his leg, how quickly they run for bandages; but if a sadder accident overwhelms him in moral misery, they think they do well to abandon him to his fate. They appear never to consider how brittle the legs of their own virtue; how fortunate for themselves that their ways lie not alongside of tottering moral brick-piles.

A WHISPER FROM ST. NICHOLAS TO THE LADIES.

BY REV. THEO. L. CUYLER.

[This whisper from St. Nicholas to the ladies was published a year ago in the New York Independent. The warning sentences should be spoken again, and above a whisper.]

I AM the patron saint of Christmas and New Year's Day. I set out on my tour this week, and expect to visit during the coming week several millions of homes, which I shall make happy with the contents of my inexhaustible knapsack. The youngsters believe in me with a faith as unquestioning as that of all Mussulmans in the miraculous coffin of Mohammed. I never deceive them, and I never debauch them. In my wallets this year are numberless toys and trinkets, books to be read and trumpets to be blown; but not a single bottle of tipple have I got, even as big as a thimble. I occasionally see in a fashionable liquor-shop window a row of fanciful little bottles, which are labeled, "For Children's Parties." But I should as soon sprinkle arsenic over my candies, or drop a rattlesnake into a lad's stocking, as put one of those vials of poison into my pouch. No, my good friends, the crop of tipplers is increasing fast enough without putting one of these stinging serpents into the hands of your boys and girls.

But, as my Quaker friend, Broadskirt, says, "I have a concern on my mind" to whisper a word to the mothers and the sisters of my bright-eyed flock. Let me tell you what I spy every night before New Year's, while I am on my tour from one chimney and hearthstone to another, all over the land. As I slip down the chimney, and am peering about for the stockings, I often, yes, very often, see the mistress of the family preparing the table for the next day's entertainment. Sometimes Bridget is washing out the big punch-bowl, to be filled next morning with a tempting mixture; or slicing the lemons to mix with the toddy. The lady of the house is counting the number of champagne bottles, and I overhear her say: "The young Mushrooms, and the Toodlees, and the Shoddie brothers, and the Rapide, and Ben Dives, who is a beau of our Fannie's, will all make calls; and we shall want a dozen bottles, at least." In one house where I called last year Mrs. Highfire was making out an order for a dozen of brandy and two dozen of wine; and just then her oldest boy, Rob, came staggering into the hall, with an ugly gash on his cheek, where he had fallen against the doorsteps. As I flew up the chimney of the mansion, I saw the poor woman wiping the blood from Bob's face with her fine lace handkerchief. That woman has helped to make a half-dozen toppers every New Year's Day, and now "her own chickens have come home to roost."

As I stopped to fill the stockings at Lovetrade's the cotton-broker's, I saw his dashy wife arranging a row of "Johannisberg" bottles on her rosewood table. Her eldest daughter was just asking her: "Ma, can't I drink with all the young fellows who propose my health?" "Of course, my dear, if you don't take too much; but last year your tongue ran like a bell-clapper before the evening was over. You know that Dick Field told us that when he called for the Jenks girls to go to the opera they were downright fuddled."

I always make a visit at Will Lordly's house, for his children are the rosiest cherubs that ever were tucked into a crib. I unload a big wallet in their stockings. But last year I missed them from the splendid mansion where they always had lived. I peeped into a fourth-story room, to see if any one there was waiting for me; and there I saw the four poor Lordly children lying on a coarse bed on the floor, and their mother sat sewing beside them. Lordly died of delirium-tremens last year, and his goods were sold out by the sheriff. His hollow-eyed widow won't give any more wine-suppers.

And now, good ladies, if you could only go with me on my midnight rounds, if you could see the poor wives who moisten their pillows with their tears while their husbands are off frolicking in their clubs; if you could see the miserable mothers who are sitting up till toward the daybreak, for their wild boys to come home; if you could hear the horrible oaths and curses that I have to hear in the drunkards' homes I visit; if you could see where all the young men go after they have got light-headed with your choice wines, and what haunts they enter, you would never put a drop of the accursed drink on your New Year's tables again. There is a little verse in the Bibles I carry in my pack which says, "Woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor!" There is another little verse that I once pinned on a decanter of rosy Madeira: "At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." If you will go with me into some houses where raving madmen are shrieking in the delirium-tremens, I will show you the adders.

I am growing old, kind ladies. My beard is frosty, and age brings experience. Let me tell you that I never saw a New Year begun over a bottle of liquor that turned out well. And I never saw the husbands and the sons perfectly free from habits of drink when the wife or the mother is accustomed to set out the glass. And another thing I have seen, and that is, an army of tipplers who got their first glass from the hands of a lady! You have no moral right to tempt another woman's husband or beloved boy to ruin. Our Heavenly Father has given you enough good things for your hospitable boards without bottling up damnation for your guests.

But my reindeer are harnessed. My wallets are packed.

"A Happy New Year to you all, and to all a good-night!"

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSEIWAY POTTS.

No. I.

I PIPSEY POTTS, pride myself on being rather sharp in household matters, and, though it is no credit to me, I will own up that I found something this morning I had not learned before. It was dark when I rose—the deacon wanted to go out to his chopping on the hillside, and I rose a little earlier than usual on his account. Since his attack of rheumatism I make the fires, and had laid the kindlings, and chips, and small wood, and the pine to make shavings close under the kitchen stove, but forgot to place the knife on the window, to whittle the pine. I searched for it everywhere, and at last had to use the carving-knife instead. That was annoyance number one.

I had set the table the night before, thinking how much time I would save and how few steps I would take getting breakfast. The cold potatoes were already in the cupboard, the butter on the table, and I was getting along nicely.

But the deacon must have meat for breakfast, and there was not enough to warm over. I had been down cellar and strained the milk, and this bit of negligence made another trip. It is not safe to carry a lamp down the breezy cellar-stairs, so I keep a candlestick with a piece of candle in it, down there hanging from a hook overhead.

I made the second trip down the cellar-stairs, then, with a half-dozen matches in my pocket, but it happened that not one of them would ignite. This was vexation number two, and another trip up and down; then there was one more before we sat down to breakfast, for bread, butter and cream.

This set me to thinking how careful a woman should be to try and save steps. When we were all seated at the table I was so tired that I spread out my arms and sat like an old, brooding hen. My breath seemed gone. I had meant to save all my vitality and use the surplus to-day, in writing a story about the time when I worked out. I tried to laugh, but it sounded like a wheezy croak, or a rickety buggy crossing a culvert.

Well, let us reason together. I didn't get angry and allow the wrinkles to come in my face, and be sore for all day, but you tired women know that this might have been the consequence.

I'm only one of thousands, but as I have the floor, I'll speak first about saving steps.

I have found it an excellent plan to wash a peck or a half-bushel of potatoes at one time, say on washing-day, in the tub of rinse water when I am done with it. Let them drain until they are dry, then put them in a closet, or out-of-the-way place. I keep mine in a box in the pantry with a cover over it. This will save many and many a step for a woman when she is in a hurry. Of course, this plan is not so good in mid-winter, when there is danger of hard freezing, but in moderate weather this way will be found excellent.

It is not much trouble either, while your hands are about it, to prepare steak enough for two or three meals, or to cut pork enough to last through the day.

Whenever your cloak, or any garment is to be carried up-stairs—if you have a place for everything—lay that cloak or garment on the stairs, and let the first one who goes up carry it and put it where it belongs.

As to the matter of catching chickens, why half the women with whom I am acquainted think nothing of running down a chicken an hour or two before it is needed.

I have seen more than one gray head bobbing, now here, now there, under a burdock, among the thistles, through the raspberry vines and sprawling over tumble-down fences, running after a chicken; a leg-and-wing race—one of the most ludicrous and ridiculous sights I ever saw. The first thing I think of is the foolish waste of nervous energy—one's precious vitality wasted on the air. That same nervous force if rightly applied could have been spent in giving a glowing, earnest, strong talk to one's growing daughters, or to the little boys who will "make men" in the years to come.

Sometimes I fear we will be held accountable for the energy we trifle away in a foolish manner, the same as for spending money or talents in a way that benefits no one.

The way to catch a chicken is to pick it off the roost after dark, put it in a tub until morning and when the tea-kettle comes off, put on a kettle of water to scald it.

A little sixteen-years-old Dutch girl lived with us once from whom I learned a good many new things, and one of them was to lay a chicken in a pan of water after picking and singeing, and wash and rub it with a rag, well and carefully.

All housewives know that it is impossible to pick a young chicken to look clean, the pen-feathers leave it looking blue and dirty. Katie always rubbed down in a case of this kind, and the blue stain washed out and left the fowl clean and nice.

I hope young housekeepers will remember this, it will save them a great deal of time and annoyance.

It is an excellent plan to keep a pound or so of lard, with all bits of broken butter, and scrapings off the butter-plate, on an old cracked plate on the lower shelf of the pantry cupboard for common use, such as frying potatoes, or steak, greasing bread pans, and for mixing with marrowy skimmings to cook hashed beef and potatoes. This little item may save many a hurried run down a cellar-stairs of twelve or fourteen steps.

In bringing some crocks home from the store lately one of them got a piece broken out of the side. They were shallow crocks—just the kind I always wanted, and I was sorry. I said I would mend it and it would do to put scraps or grease in, and would save using a good one.

I put it under the stove to warm while I worked a bit of putty into a soft roll, then I laid it on the broken place, fitted the piece into it, pressed it together, and set it away to dry. When I looked at it a week later I found it just as good as new, and have used it the same as though it had never been broken.

We had a large white plate, too, with a piece broken out of the side. The ware was fresh and clean as new; I mended it the same way, and though it would look meanly on the table, it is the very thing on which to take out a kettle full of boiled pigs' feet, back bones and ribs, or any meat that has to be set away.

Plates make such clean covers for crocks that I don't see why a provident housewife shouldn't mend all her best broken plates for covers. Buy twenty cents worth of putty, with orders that it be put up to keep from drying out, and it will be wrapped accordingly. If putty is hard to soften, dip it in and out of hot water a few times, work it, and it will become as soft as if newly made.

Putty can be used to mend tinware, if it is inconvenient to go to the tinner's when a leak comes suddenly.

There is nothing a man dislikes to do more than putting up a stove. He always makes such a fuss, and puts on such an air of superiority and feels so injured that it makes a woman feel her physical inferiority most acutely.

Last summer when our men folks moved the stove out of the kitchen to the back porch, we resolved with sundry sly winks and blinks and grimaces, that after this time we'd try and manage without their assistance; they might "open gates" for us, and assist us out of the carriage, and such little courtesies—nothing more.

Well, we shivered on until into October before both the deacon and Rube happened to be away from home at the same time, but at last the day came.

We rolled up our sleeves, put on wide aprons, covered our hair, and went to work. We rather liked it, it was funny. First, we moved the small parlor-stove out of the kitchen, took up the carpet, washed the floor, and woodwork and windows, and then came the "tug of war."

The kitchen stovepipe had been put up in an honest, gentlemanly manner, fastened with wire and made safe every way.

We took it down and cleaned it—not anywhere, like a man would have done it, but in an old boiler, that the soot and ashes could be carried to the garden and not tracked back again into the house, then lifted the oven off and cleaned it, took off all the plates, tacked down the zinc, and by good management, and lifting all together, we carried it into the kitchen and put it up nicely.

But our stock of patience became exhausted before the many joints of that dreadful stovepipe would fit together. One place troubled us more than language could express—it would just fit here, but not there; how we did wish for a man's brawny palms to grasp it and press it until the refractory places would go together! It was too bad! Just as we despaired, and said, "Oh, for the kind hands of a man!" and as Ida's soft, little, determined hands reached themselves vainly about it, one of my gentle taps with the edge of the hatchet made it fit in, and the job was done, and the deacon said, when he surveyed it with round eyes, "better'n any man could have done it."

I wouldn't advise women to go about putting up stoves; it is not a woman's work, and she would be quite sure to skin her knuckles, smash her fingers, or let a corner of the stove fall on her feet.

There is a sleight in lifting that women would do well to learn, not to lift suddenly, or while standing at a disadvantage, and always to use good judgment.

Even if we never move another stove, we learned one thing that will be of great use to ourselves and to others, and it is, that before a stove is taken down in the summer the joints should be numbered, marked in figures with chalk, then the one great difficulty will be removed, and the men will not get angry and run in and out over the carpet with muddy boots, and aggrieve themselves and the women too.

This is Ida's proposition, and it is a good one, and I hope it will not be forgotten.

One of the faculty in a medical college said to me lately: "You leave one important item out of your homely, honest talks to women, Miss Potts, and I am a little surprised at it."

I blushed at the bare hint of any dereliction of duty, and asked what it was.

"You should say to women," said he, "that the one fruitful source of disease and sickness arises from improper attention to the feet. Tell them they must keep their feet warm and dry if they would have good health."

"Change the stockings frequently, and when they wash their feet they must rub them until they are all aglow, and perfectly dry, before going to bed."

"Wear shoes large enough to allow a free circulation of the blood, let there be no compression whatever."

"If the feet are dry and hard, bathe them in warm suds, or in tepid water in which a little sifting of ashes has been thrown, take them out, rub them well with a coarse crash towel, and put them back in the water again; bathe them, take out, rub briskly—doing this several times over."

"Sometimes, if warm water is inconvenient, and the feet are cold, rub them with a coarse towel or a piece of flannel until the blood circulates freely."

I was so fired up at the doctor's words and their importance that I felt like proclaiming it from the housetops to the poor, half-sick women I meet every day.

It does seem weak to stand at the window and fight disease while we allow it to come in, full-handed, at the open door, without so much as saying, "Away," or raising a hand to prevent it.

I begin to think that mothers whose children have "out-mouths" are not aware that this uncomely feature can be rendered pretty in the hands of a skillful dentist.

A mother is culpable who permits her child—more especially a daughter—to come up to womanhood with a homely, over-jutting mouth, caused by crooked teeth. The operation will give no pain, and in years to come the mother will have the gratitude of her child.

A neighbor of mine, who has been afflicted with dyspepsia for several years, and was pale and cross and sunken-eyed, has, within a few months, grown very hearty, with cheeks as ruddy as Spitzbergens.

I said to him the other day: "You don't seem like the same man, Dicky, that you were one year ago. Do you mind you and I had a little spat about your cutting down a fine young maple at the roadside, and you just as good as told me to mind my own business; and you said trees 'didn't look beautiful to you, and that you cared no more for flowers than you did for 'Jimson' or May-weed."

"I was a mean fellow, that's just so, Pipesey, and I've been going to beg your pardon ever since, but I did hope you'd forgotten that ungentlemanly act of mine. Fact is, I was sick—had the dyspepsia, worst kind, and I felt like snarling and showing my teeth all the time; but now I'm cured, and I eat heartily and work well, and whatever my wife does is right, and my babies, that used to look like little brats, are little darlings now.

"A man out on the Reserve sent me his cure, and though it does seems really foolish, I'll tell you what it is.

"The first thing when I get up mornings, after I am dressed, I give myself a real good pounding all over my breast and stomach, including the whole chest. I rub with my open hands and inhale all the air my lungs will hold, and then I pound with my fists as if I were in dead earnest. One must begin gradually at first, throw back the shoulders, inflate the lungs, and work with a will.

"At first I could hardly stand it, it hurt my breast and stomach, but now I couldn't do without my daily pounding any better than Coley could do without her oats. I tell you, it has made a healthy man of me."

I give Dicky's experience for what it is worth—at any rate, this morning exercise would do no one any harm.

I believe I never saw a woman yet who handled warm bread just taken from the oven like my mother used to. She always laid a clean towel or a newspaper back on the table or shelf, and tipped the warm loaves up on it on their sides, and laid a cloth over them. Now, all the women I know of flip their hot loaves out of the oven, and lay them down flat on a table or shelf to cool. Of course, that table or shelf is made of cherry, walnut, pine, poplar, or ash, and it cannot be otherwise than that the lower crust will taste of the wood. All of us have found that unpleasant, liniment-y or turpentine-y taste in the bread, and it is not a bit good.

I can hardly stand it sometimes, when I go into a house and see the hot loaves lying flat on an old black table, that is used every day in the year to wash dishes on, and for the commonest kitchen purposes.

Pies should be baked hard enough that they can be slipped off while warm upon a folded paper or fresh cloth; if they stand on the plates or tins until cool, they will generally be soggy in the under-crust. Pie-plates should not be used after they become old and the glazing become cracked, for they absorb grease and dish-water, and are hardly fit for the children's play-houses.

Here, at the deacon's, we have a good deal of fun about "princes." Now, with us, a prince is no other than any one of these miserable old stragglers who go travelling about over the country; if a young man, he is generally on his way to "Chicaugy" or Pittsburgh, is a machinist by trade, and longs to reach his journey's end, so he can get to work again. If he is an old man, he is going away East or away West to his "brother-in-law's" or his "cousin's"—has not eaten anything for three days, and sleeps in barns and straw-stacks, and has the old cheesy, greasy smell of an emigrant who had been a steerage passenger.

If we hear a sneaking, muffled rap at the door, Ida will open it and hear the unintelligible jargon mumbled, not understanding anything except, "A little piece o' bread."

"Here is a prince of the House of Hapsburg," she will sometimes say, turning to me; "his wants are limited to a piece of bread; what shall I give him?"

"Oh, the best the house affords—we have heard of people entertaining angels unaware," I reply, as sanctimoniously as I can say it. We always call them princes, even if speaking in their presence—sometimes they belong to one line of royalty, and sometimes another.

A few evenings since an old prince came to the front-door, spread out his hands and bowed graciously, saying, "Madam, I am unfortunate. I am stricken with poverty. Can you assist me?"

"What will you have, sir?" I said, very much amused, but self-possessed.

"I stand the most in need of money and tobacco," said he, with the utmost assurance.

"I cannot give you money, and no gentleman will use tobacco, much less, ask for it from the hands of a lady," I said, coolly. "Anything else, sir?"

"I am hungry, too, madam."

"Sit down," I said, "and you shall have something to eat."

As I came out of the dining-room door, with a plate containing half a pumpkin-pie and a slice of jelly roll, he waved me back with a kingly hand, saying: "Before I accept your hospitality, I wish to ask a favor, and it is that you will make me a nice lot of good, strong, black, hot coffee."

I was so amused at the prince's impudence, that laughing wasn't half expressive enough.

I put the plate away, saying: "My dear sir, I am sorry that you cannot be accommodated, but the fire is dead in the kitchen stove, supper is over an hour ago, we have worked hard all day, and are just ready to sit down and rest and look at our day's mail. You will positively have to excuse us."

He bowed, and rose to depart, saying in his softest tones, as with bared head he made his best bow: "I bid you good-night, madam, and may the Lord bless you, and may you have good luck."

This was the most ludicrous farce I ever played. He seemed to feel flattered by the deference he deemed shown to him. I like to treat these princes ceremoniously, and see them try to show off.

I said to one once: "Your language is good. You should be teaching school. Why not go to Hoop-pole County, in this State, and teach?"

"They've bin a wantin' me down there," said he; and then when he left he turned around, and, thinking to display wonderful educational acquirement, to dazzle me, he said: "I wish you would allow me to gather up a few of them apples that lay dilapidating out in your orchard."

It was through Lily that the tribe of shacks first acquired the name of princes.

We had been gathering flowers in the swamps and meadows along the railroad, and were coming home at sunset laden with our treasures, when we overtook a young man carrying a big satchel. I talked to him; and, among other motherly questions, asked him if he had money enough to bear his expenses to Pittsburgh. He said he had if he allowed himself to go without eating much, and sleep outdoors.

Just before we parted Lily whispered: "I believe he is a prince in disguise, and that he carries his family jewels in his satchel; do please ask him to stay at our house to-night; why it would be an honor to us, you know."

Lily was old enough then to delight in fairy love and stories of poor girls marrying the king's son, etc., and I thought this would be a good chance to teach her a lesson, and to disabuse her mind of all such folly. So I invited him to tarry at our house, and that would save paying out money for supper and lodging.

I introduced him to my family, and told them why I brought him home with us; and at Lily's urgent solicitation, I let the stranger sleep in her pretty room among her dolls, and toys, and pictures, and little books.

She talked so much about his jewels, that after he retired I reached in at one side of the satchel and drew out the old, dirty, patched, muddy leg of a pair of sheep's gray pantaloons, saying: "Lily, here is a diamond of the first water, second only to the Kohi-noor in beauty and value; it has been in the Bourbon family over two hundred years."

She said she knew the stranger's name was Clarence Fitzgerald, or Montrose De Alembert, or something of that kind, and, to gratify her, before he started the next morning I asked his name.

"My name is Jacob Snyder," said he, with the utmost pomposity.

My heart was touched with the pitiful words of a poor, shivering prince one cold day. He had stayed here all night and in the morning—the mercury almost down to zero, his old ragged clothes, fastened here and there with pins, and nails, and strings, hung on him like loose shingles. I got the button-box, and everything necessary, and told him to sit down and wait until I had put buttons on his clothes—honest ones on his coat, a row on his vest, and replaced the missing ones on his pantaloons. While I was sewing a suspender-button on his waistband, a tear fell on the back of my hand. I was afraid he'd blubber right out, and I chatted away, and never stopped to even put in a comma. I was telling him that one man was just as good as another; no matter how shabby or patched he was, he had it in his power to be all that any common man was—that "Many a lad born to rough work and ways

Strips off his ragged coat and makes Men clothe him with their praise."

"What made you do this for me?" said he; "no woman ever did the like before; they're afraid o' me, they hate me, and wouldn't touch me or my clothes. What made you do it?"

"I did it because I pity you, and wish you well, and I'll feel so much better now in my good warm home when I remember that you, out in this bitter cold day, are made more comfortable from the little work of my hands this morning." And so I did.

These old stragglers are a trouble, and when we do take them in and care for them, sometimes they are very ungrateful, and take us in. Though they do leave our beds dirty, and our rooms smelling like a sheep-pen, still I believe we ought to care for and make them comfortable, if only one out of ten is really an object of charity and a worthy but unfortunate man. So I'll stick to them, and patch up my old theory about "entertaining angels unaware," even if they do impose upon me and go away leaving me with a two days' headache.

Oh, I can do this in remembrance of a thin, haggard, half-starved face that looked sharply up into mine long ago after a wild, adventurous trip home from Denver City, and in answer to my inquiry of, "Why didn't you beg rather than suffer?" said: "Beg! Why even women are sometimes incarnate devils, and will drive a sufferer from their doors as though he were worse than any thief! You don't know what some women are made of."

My lips were white and sealed, and every half-mute face that looks up into mine since then seems stamped with his vain appeal for bread.

At this season of the year the growing boys will want their crullers for dinner at school, and for lunch after they come home from singings, hungry and excited and full of news.

It is a bad plan to eat before going to bed, but not so bad for the young and vigorous if they eat in moderation. Still, it is not advisable to eat after supper.

To make good crullers take one cup and a half of sugar, two eggs, ope heaping spoonful of butter, one cup of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar and half a teaspoonful of soda, flour to make it as stiff as pie-crust, roll thin and fry in hot lard.

By changing this recipe, taking sour cream instead of sweet milk, you can leave out the butter and cream of tartar, and then they will not be at all greasy, and I think more wholesome. If you put no butter or shortening in they will not absorb the lard in which they are fried.

If in any kind of cooking your recipe tells you to dissolve soda in hot or boiling water, don't you do it, it injures it, let the water be merely warm.

As I write this I find myself smiling, and by the time I get through with the recipe I ha, ha, ha! aloud. And this was why I laughed—I don't know when I've thought of that incident before.

I was fourteen years old when my mother died, and though I knew nothing at all outside of my few school books, I put on a great show of authority and tried to be quite like a mother to the four younger children.

My sister, two years my junior, was a real little Martha to make coffee and poultices and mash potatoes, and to give good teas and good advice to the three little boys.

I had read enough to know that over-eating, or eating at untimely hours was injurious, and I essayed to abolish the usual half-peck of walnuts, and crullers, and cider, and apples before bed-time. One time my sister, whose nickname was "Joel," read a pitiful little story about a child crying for a piece of bread and butter before it went to bed, and the mother, from good motives, refused it. The next morning the child was found dead in its bed, and the poor parent's anguish was intense.

After this, if Ruhe wanted a piece before he went to bed he would go (until years afterward unknown to me) to my sister, and say: "Now, Joel, just get me something to eat—if you don't, by Jimminy, I'll up an' die before morning, like that poor little boy did, and then how'll you feel?"

Poor, little, unsuspecting Joel! she has been a mother these many years and her family discipline is marked and marred by the same over-tenderness of heart that characterized her in her childhood.

[There's a kiss for you, Joel, to bridge over this breach of confidence.]

Here is a new thing. I saw the other day and I like it very much and hope others may be benefitted by it. Back of a cooking-stove which stood perhaps three feet from the wall, was a stout shelf covered with zinc, on which to set pans of bread to rise, or buckwheat batter, or to lay covers on while one is cooking.

Many a good batch of bread is spoiled in cold weather because there is no warm place of even temperature to stand the loaves while they are rising.

Women will find it an excellent plan when they have a good deal of sewing to do to take a whole day and cut out a lot at a time. As each garment is cut roll it up by itself with the buttons, lining, thread and trimmings that belong to it, and lay it in a basket kept for that purpose.

One can accomplish a great deal more by following this plan and by keeping each garment separate.

A great deal of time is lost by careless housewives in rummaging around searching for mislaid patterns, a lost thimble or the very spool of thread most needed.

I have told you that a good housewife always carries her thimble in her pocket, and I believe she does.

For my part I always have to carry a small knife, too, and as to going without a bit of wrapping-yarn in my pocket—couldn't think of it! Hardly a day passes in which I do not need a bit unexpectedly to tie up a swinging trumpet-vine, a spreading althea, a vicious rose-bush, or a gadding little grape-vine that has crept away from its ma.

That's a good plan—I read it somewhere—after sheets are pretty well worn out to make window curtains of them.

Now, it is really in better taste to have old sheets, white as snow and neatly ironed, made into window curtains than to have these frail cottony shams called lace curtains. They are honester and then they don't look scanty and pinched.

If old sheets are burnt or stained or patched make ironing cloths of them, but take the well-worn, best ones for up-stairs, dining-room or bed-room curtains. We have that kind in our kitchen this winter, and when they are let down at night they add the touch of cosyness that without them would be lacking.

I've seen some girls pass the meat-plate at the table. They do that way at Sister Stout's, and they're nice Baptist folks, profess sanctification and all that.

Brother Stout likes pork, rare done, and he likes to have lots of "the good, rich gravy," as he calls it, taken up on the plate, too, and then they'll pass it round and the gravy will creep up to the very edge of the platter.

Pork is abominable and I shall hail the day in which an enlightened people will vote the use of it hoggish, and eschew it altogether.

If you must have it on the table to please any member of the family, bear with it graciously—use as little of "the good, rich gravy" as possible.

Only yesterday I gave an unlucky tip sideways to the deacon's plate of pork, and a little thread of grease spun along a yard or more on our good floor, just missing the carpet. In less than a minute I had spread the place over with soap, but the soft ash floor had absorbed it and no washing or scouring of mine can remove it. The only remedy in an accident like this is to use a carpenter's plane, but ours were both loaned.

I don't like to see a woman scold over spilt grease or broken tableware or anything that cannot be helped, so when I saw Ida stand aghast at my mishap, I said: "Sister Potts, did you ever think what a royal poem could be written only about one's kitchen floor, come here!" and we both sat down beside the prettiest boards we could find, and then we counted the growths—wavy, ribbony, beautiful growths—and we counted fifty-nine.

Fifty-nine summers of God's own making—glorious summers of blessed sunshine and balmy airs and blue skies and soft rains, all this to make a board for Deacon Potts's kitchen floor.

What an exquisite poem it would make in the sweet creative power of the author of "The Drovers" and "The Huskers" and "The Lumbermen."

So, when our discordant harps were in tune again, I laid a paper over the unsightly place to absorb the grease, and then a rug over that, and it was well, and our housewifely eyes were vexed no more.

At this season of the year people are butchering and making sausage.

For men who work out in the cold you may save the pigs' feet. You know they dry away and toughen after they have been boiled a few days.

If you want to save some even until next spring, boil them well done and cover them with moderately strong vinegar. Put on a plate and have them pressed down so they will be covered all over. I wouldn't season them with mace and such things. They will keep very nicely.

If you don't want to salt down all your sausage, and prefer to keep some of it fresh as long as possible, hang it high up on a pole suspended in the coolest, airiest place you can find in an out-house, wood-shed, wash-house, or a spare upper chamber.

Old salted beef is not good. I always take a quarter or more of ours, cut it in three or four pieces, and lay it on a table in the coldest up-stairs chamber, with all the windows open. Put something on the floor to keep the blood off, look at the pieces occasionally and turn them, and if the blood settles in places take warm water and a rag and wash it all off. Beef can be kept a long while this way in cold weather. This is just as good for people living away out in the country as though they lived near a meat-market.

We shut up our house yesterday, and the girls and I attended the Grand Division of the Sons of Temperance.

One old gentleman rose to speak often, and his queerly-fitting trousers didn't want him to stand up for the temperance cause, and they fought against it, and then when he was up fairly they strenuously objected to his sitting down in them, and he had as much trouble as my Cousin Jerrymier Broady did with his'n.

Ida is just beginning to cut out and make the deacon's pantaloons, and, of course, she soon observed the belligerent breeches across the hall, and asked me what was wrong about them that they seemed so warped and twisted, and ill-natured, and at war with their wearer. I remembered that in my girlhood I had made pantaloons that seemed to be viciously inclined, and I said if you keep the edges even in making a pair of trousers, and sew up the outside seams first, they will draw, and the legs will be all awtist, like rails split out of timber that was winding. In making pantaloons always sew up the inside seams first.

It is a good plan, if trousers are cut out at home, to get a tailor to cut you a good paper pattern, and then do you write the owner's name on it, say "John Smith, his pattern," and always have one place for his pattern, too, that it may not be lost or mislaid.

A MEMORY.

BY ELEN E. REXFORD.

READ me some poem, child. Let it be sweet
With poet's memories of a time gone by,
When all the world seemed underneath his feet,
And his glad heart with hope beat fast and high.

No, no! not that, dear child. That poem thrills
My breast with pain, that is so fraught with bliss,
That I can hardly tell which feeling fills
The largest place. How sweet that poem is!

He read it to me in a summer fled;
His voice was sweet; I almost hear it now,
As in the sunset hushes, when he read
This little poem, with uncovered brow.

His eyes would turn away toward the West,
Bright with the glory of the dying day,
As if they yearned to catch a glimpse of rest,
On the far hills beyond the purple bay.

His face would fill with deep and tender awe,
The while he read this poem, quaint and sweet,
The purest, noblest face I ever saw,
I thought, while listening there at his feet.

And often, while he read, my soul has seemed
To reach its hands toward the infinite,
For things of which it often thought and dreamed,
As in the dark we grope toward the light.

And I remember when he said to me,
"Not life nor death can part us, oh, my love."
My path leads on along this earthly way,
While his climbs up the happy hills above.

But death could never part us, for my heart
Went with him when he left these earthly ways;
And I shall follow where my heart has gone,
And meet him there, in some glad day of days.

OUR CLUB.

BY ANNIE L. MUZZEY.

I.

WHAT OUGHT SHE TO DO?

WE had grown in such a habit, at our table and parlor gatherings, of discussing the moral and social bearings of every question which arose, and of every circumstance which came under our observation, that we had obtained the somewhat derivative appellation of the Templeton House Ethical Club.

"Very good," nodded Templeton, our genial host, when one of our circle brought home the nick-name. "Very good, indeed. We will add an explanatory clause—an association for the encouragement of right-thinking and true living."

"A little pretentious, isn't it?" mildly demurred his spouse.

"Not in the least, my dear Mrs. Templeton," affirmed Professor Engel, in his rapid, decisive way. "There is no limit to the good resulting from a candid exchange and comparison of opinions relating to the conduct of life."

"For my part, I think breath better spent in works than words," flashed bright Dell Falconer, who, whatever the question, always constitutes an independent wing of the opposition.

"That depends on the nature of the works, Miss Dell," returned the professor. "Idle talk is not so bad as wrong action. But wrong action is the effect of wrong thinking, and wrong thinking comes of a lack of free discussion and interchange of opinions, by which we are made to see, in the light of reason, the falseness of our position, and the distorted views it gives us of life and its relations."

"For all that, Professor Engel, there are people who are too pig-headed to get out of their old, worn ruts of thinking, but, blind and deaf alike to the light and voice of reason, will just go on grunting their senseless platitudes until they fall asleep in the peace of perfect self-satisfaction," broke forth Jeannette Marcotte, with a spirit which suggested that she had been tilting in her impetuous fashion against prejudices which had not yielded at the sharp point of her lance.

We turned to her with kindling interest. "What is it, Jean?" we asked, in a breath.

"Take now, for instance, the popular notion of a woman's duty," she went on; "what a multitude there are who never give it a moment's rational consideration; but with stolid indifference go on perpetuating its injustice to the end of their days, handing down to posterity their heirlooms of tradition and superstition regarding the matter."

"As—how?" questioned the professor, slowly, as if trying to feel his way to a solution of the difficulty but partially presented.

"We daren't any of us say anything, Jean, lest we should unwittingly number ourselves with the pig-headed, you know," volunteered Dell Falconer, in explanation of our silence.

"As a case in point, allow me to read you a page or two of a letter from one of the victims of this stupid theory respecting a woman's sphere of duty," said Jeannette, drawing from her pocket and unfolding a sheet, whose careful and delicate lettering indicated a character timid and conservative—a nature that would meekly submit to the torture of being stretched and cramped to the Procrustean measure of rule and precedent, rather than dare to assert its rights and powers, and be a law unto itself.

"I don't know what to do with my life," complained the letter. "It seems an utter failure, and it is too nearly spent, or rather, too helplessly fixed and fettered by the habit of years to be made the ground of hope for any future success. I wish I could lay it quietly away, and so be done with the trouble of it forever; but I suppose I must drag it on somehow to the end."

"Do you mark that?" said Jeannette, interrupting the letter. "Not to carry her life up to the glorious height to which she aspires, but—oh, the pity of that make-shift word!—to drag it on somehow to the end?"

"It is much the fate of all of us," sighed gentle Edna Templeton. "We fail, every one, to reach the mark at which we ambitiously aim, or long to aim, if we dared."

"Because we do not dare to aim, or aim with steady purpose," fired Jeannette. "Because we are fitful, wavering and uncertain, lured by pleasure and frightened by difficulty, loving our ease and shrinking from the toil and sacrifice of effort. If we were not such puny, feeble, wailing folk; if we would bring strong, brave, resolute, unflinching wills to the work we have to accomplish before the good we covet can be ours, we would never need to mourn the failure of our lives."

"That is not so certain, Miss Jeannette," said bitter, cynical Roy Sherwood; "for oftener than not, the good we have spent all the strength of our youth to gain, turns to Sodom apples in our grasp; and we hold but a handful of ashes."

"Like enough," responded Jeannette, dryly. "In sensual enjoyments one is pretty sure to find at last the bitter, ashen flavor of Dead Sea apples. That is not the kind of good that earnest natures strive after, and their failure is of quite another sort. But, to return to our letter."

And she read again—

"I don't know where I have missed my way, but I have certainly missed it, and I drift without aim or expectation of reaching any goal but the grave, which is one thing in the future that I know will not fail me. A dreary, pitiful confession, is it not? I wonder how many women there are who might make it if they were as frank as I? And could they tell any better where they have gone astray and missed their place in life? I am sure I have meant, and I believe I have been faithful to my duty, but even that is no merit of mine. It is nothing more than was expected and exacted of me. I could not have done otherwise without incurring censure and rousing opposition. My services were conceded to belong entirely to my family, and I never thought of seeking any other or wider field of usefulness than could be found in devotion to family interests. So the years slipped by so noiselessly I scarcely knew that they were past. But now my work, too, seems to have slipped from my hands, and my sphere of duties has narrowed down to a circle that far from satisfies my aspirations. The old folk have fallen asleep, and the others—well, they may make me useful, perhaps, but they do not need me sufficiently to remove from their favors a certain flavor of condescension which holds me under a constant and depressing sense of obligation. Yet, since I am jostled from my beaten track, I cannot, as I told you, find my way in life. All is so strange, perplexing, and I have not the bold, adventurous spirit of early youth which dares an untried path. What work waits for me out in the great awesome world of which I am afraid because I know nothing of its ways? Has it any place for me? What ought I to do? What ought I to have done?"

"Very clearly," interrupted Roy Sherwood, "she ought to have got married. Her 'way' would have been plain enough then."

"Judging from the wailing and rebellious cries which come up from the ranks of the married, that is not so absolutely certain, Mr. Roy," retorted Dell Falconer.

"Not from the married, but from the mismatched, Dell," corrected Jeannette. "And so marriage is your prescription for the ills of my correspondent, Mr. Sherwood?" she added, laying down the letter and turning to him.

"Most certainly, Miss Jeannette," he returned. "Marriage is not an incident, but the crown and completion of a woman's life."

"I don't dispute that if you mean marriage in its true sense," was the prompt response. "But suppose our friend had missed her opportunity of making a marriage that could satisfy both mind and heart?"

"She should have made one of some sort, whether it satisfied her or not," Sherwood answered. "There is a great deal of sentimental, moon-struck nonsense talked about these mothers. Sensible people don't expect to realize their first fond, foolish dreams and find a perfect and impossible happiness in marriage, but they do not remain single on that account."

"The host of ill-assorted unions that we see is abundant proof of the truth of your assertion, though whether the parties concerned are 'sensible' or not is a matter of opinion," said Jean, composedly. "But to reason with you on this point would carry us aside from the real question at issue—whether my correspondent in not choosing a life-work and pursuing it with steadfast purpose is not herself responsible for the unhappy state of affairs of which she complains."

"That question is settled by her own confession," said the professor. "And yet the power of established opinion is so strong that you can scarcely hold her responsible for her position."

"No, I suppose not. She simply waited with the rest of her pining sisterhood for somebody to come and open the doors of life to her instead of bravely putting forth her own hand, and steadily and serenely guiding herself to some high and worthy end."

"But if I understand the case, Jeannette," interposed Edna Templeton, "your friend has been engaged in the duty of ministering to those who, in the absence of a husband, have the first claim on her love and service; and in such pure, womanly offices she ought to have found happiness and content, reaping the reward of her self-sacrifices in the appreciation and affection of the domestic circle."

"My dear Edna," returned Jeannette, "It is not possible for any woman to serve her friends well and truly while she leaves half her powers and resources of help unused and undeveloped. Nor can she, with all her seeking, hope to find content under such conditions. To have an aim in life, and to pursue it with resolute and undaunted purpose, would confer more benefits, and command more respect, than this dawdling and frittering of one's energies in the effort to please everybody, which always results in the failure to please anybody. And one's family has no earthly right, that I can see, to exact the entire devotion and service of any of its members to the exclusion of individual interests, preferences and pleasures. It is the grossest selfishness and injustice to hold one in an attitude of perpetual thankfulness for the mere gift of an existence which is as often a burden as a blessing."

"I dare say, though, if your friend had wished to marry and make a home of her own, her family would have raised no objection, but would have cheerfully relinquished their claims," said Sherwood.

"That's the worst feature in the case, to my thinking," answered Jean, promptly. "Why could they not give her her freedom to do what she would with it? Does a woman only attain her majority at marriage? Has she no alternative but to mope out her days in a circumscribed and useless round of duties, or to take out of sheer desperation the first chance suitor who offers her a change of some sort, for worse or for better? What should we think of a man who clung through all the fresh years of his youth to the shelter of the roof-tree, waiting for somebody to come and marry him off, and, failing of that, going down the slope of life hanging piteously to his relations for support, and cringing for favors until all the spirit of independence and the pride of self-respect had oozed out of him, and he is only a limp, weak rag of a creature whom nobody minds, or would miss very much if he should drop out of the way."

"That is not a parallel case, by any means, Miss Jeannette," spoke Templeton. "We expect a man to go out bravely into the world and battle heroically for a position of usefulness and honor—indeed, we do not recognize him as a man and a brother without this test; but, as woman—the real, true woman of our worship—finds her life and mission in the sacred retreat and inner temple of Home, and only of necessity, I think, would she ever seek the rough work outside so illy adapted to her delicate, refined tastes and powers. And where is the necessity? Why, there is not a man of us but glories in the privilege of toiling for her, proud to be intrusted with the guardianship of her interests and happiness, and finding the highest and sweetest reward of our labor and our sacrifice in her loving approval. It grieves and hurts us when she assumes the prerogative of taking care of herself, and we feel defrauded of our most sacred rights, and robbed of our strongest incentive to action."

"That is very pretty, Friend Templeton," said Jeannette, with shining eyes. "I like to hear a man talk in that way. It shows his heart is right, if his head is not. But I have observed that when a woman is past her youth and prettiness, she fails to excite this beautiful enthusiasm and fervor of devotion in her friends of the other sex. Their favors are more coldly and grudgingly bestowed; they have less patience with her helplessness and timidity, and she grows to feel like my correspondent, here, as if she had lost her place in life, and to droop under a depressing, well-nigh crushing sense of her great weight of obligations which love had once so sweetly cancelled. And this brings us round again to the question which our friend puts forward for consideration—What, under the circumstances, ought she to do?"

"Why, do the only legitimate thing left for her—captivate the first disconsolate widower that crosses her way, and marry him without the loss of time," recommended Dell Falconer, whom seriousness in others always moved to lightness.

"A widower with a baker's dozen of children, neglected and unkempt, so that she may have plenty of employment for her wasting talents," subjoined Roy Sherwood.

"Let her learn patience and sweetness in her station, and put away the morbid fancies which are poisoning her peace," said Edna Templeton, who, herself so tenderly cherished, failed, like many another woman, kind-hearted, but narrow, to see a less favored woman's ground of complaint, and to sympathize with her discontent.

Templeton looked down at her with an indulgent smile. "Spoken like my sister Edna," he said. "Now, for myself, I hardly know what to advise in the case. I can understand the perplexities of the poor lady more clearly than I can see a way to remove them. I wish it were practicable to offer her my protection, Jeannette. If my house were only as large as my heart, I would take all the distressed fair ones in, and consider myself the honored and obliged party."

"In other words," laughed Sherwood, "Templeton would be a Mormon, if the law would allow."

"Or, if wife number one would not seriously object," added that lady, with an arch glance at her husband.

"The fact is, my friends, however good your motives, you are all wrong in your methods of help," said the professor, gravely. "It is exceedingly comfortable, no doubt, to be lifted up, and carried blindfold out of the troublesome and bewildering maze in which we have got lost and perplexed; but it is infinitely more invigorating and inspiring to walk bravely out on our own feet. Of course, being a highly chivalric gentleman, it would afford you great pleasure, Templeton, to assume the responsibilities of Jeannette's correspondent, but you would serve her much more effectually to help her to meet and bear them in her own way. True, she has, first of all, to battle with the difficulties and hindrances of a false education; but those, with any degree of encouragement, may be overcome, at least, in a manner, and if she have the will, she may plant her feet on the prejudices which now hold her inactive and unhappy, and find some work, however humble, which, faithfully performed, shall relieve her of her present wretched sense of dependence, and bring the content which only comes with the full employment of our powers."

"The trouble," said Templeton, "is probably with her as with the majority of women. She does not feel herself called to any special vocation, and is all at sea when she tries to think about it, and decide course."

"That, too, is a fault of her training," answered the professor. "If she had been educated, as all women should be, with a view to some pursuit adapted to her tastes and capacities, all this doubt, perplexity, and trouble as regards her place would have been avoided. But, even now, it is not too late to conquer and subdue in good part the evils from which she is suffering. A strong, earnest, unflinching purpose is what is needed first and chiefly. It is by will that miracles are wrought. Tell your friend, Jeannette, to choose her work—to choose it with affection and with faith in its use and fitness. Let her give herself to it as to a lover, heart and soul and life; let it be to her father, mother, husband, children; let her cling to it as though it were her one hope in this world, and her promise in the world to come; distracted from her allegiance by no pleasure or pain, shrinking from no sacrifice, faltering from no doubt, pressing always forward, minding only to be faithful, and leaving the issue with God. And, tell her to believe, however she may seem to herself to fail, her real success, her final triumph is as certain as the action of the Eternal laws."

Jeannette had risen to her feet. It was her hour for attending to her class in elocution, and she was unerring as the stars in her course. We had observed, however warm and vital the discussion, she would never vary the fraction of a second to hear it out.

Pushing back her dark, wavy hair from her glowing face, she reached out her hand impulsively to the professor as she passed.

"Thank you, from my heart," she said, warmly. "I shall make haste to deliver your message, trusting it may lose nothing in letter or spirit through the transmission. Such words make one's heart burn and soul pant for effort, and they will have more force and significance coming from you than from me, who am also a woman."

"But a brave, earnest woman," murmured Professor Engel, half to himself, as she went out. "A grand, noble woman. Would there were more like her."

And he sighed.

Was it the thrilling sweetness of her tribute to his self-love?

Or, are we going to have a romance in Our Club?

A SONG OF SUMMER.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

SUMMER days are long and bright,
 Summer clouds are soft and white,
 Summer sun above our heads with splendor now is beaming;
 Summer sky is clear and blue,
 Summer flowers of every hue
 Bend above the water's edge and watch its silver gleaming.
 Soft is the ground with its grasses and its clover blooms,
 Gay are the trees in their raiment wove on fairies' looms;
 The birds are taking holiday,
 And making loudest melody;
 So, come, Mary, come—and come, my little Nell.
 Seated on the flowery grass,
 Heeding not the hours that pass,
 Thus will curl with moistened lips the dandelion's stem;
 Gather from their dewy beds
 Daisies stars and clover heads—
 Make for my darling's brow a radiant diadem.
 Yes, little Nell, we will think that we are young again;
 Forget all the years—yes, forget both their joy and pain.
 Like butterflies and humming bees,
 We'll flit among the flowers and trees—
 We'll bridge across the years, and meet you, little Nell.

"CONSIDERING," says Mr. Trollope, "how much we are all given to discuss the character of others, and to discuss them often not in the strictest spirit of charity, it is singular how little we are inclined to think that others can speak ill-naturedly of us, and how angry and hurt we are when proof reaches us that they have done so. It is hardly too much to say that we all of us occasionally speak of our dearest friend in a manner which that dearest friend would very little like, and that we nevertheless expect that our dearest friends shall universally speak of us as though they were blind to all our faults, and keenly alive to every shade of our virtues."

In vain do they talk of happiness who never subdued an impulse in obedience to a principle. He who never sacrificed a present to a future good, or a personal to a general one, can speak of happiness only as the blind do of colors.—Horace Mann.

THE TEMPLE OF SEGESTA.

BY C.

THE City of Segesta, in the early periods of the Roman era, rivalled even Syracuse in grandeur; but three hundred years before the Christian era, Agathocles, a tyrant of Syracuse, to punish the inhabitants for taking part with the Carthaginians against him, destroyed it; the walls were overthrown, the people were massacred, and the term, "City of Vengeance," applied to its ruins. The Segestians had so many resources, that they soon effaced all traces of this calamity; a new city sprung up, and resumed its rank among the capitals of Italy. After a long prosperity, this city was again destroyed by fire and sword by the Saracens. This time the injury was irreparable, for Italy was then exhausted. Segesta was thirty six miles west of Palermo. On approaching its ruins the eye is fatigued by the barren rocks, and the absence of all picturesque beauty in the landscape.

Yet numerous blocks of stone and traces of human art can be discerned, but no signs of a habitation; when suddenly, on the summit of a distant hill, a majestic colonnade appears.

This building stands above Segesta, on a promontory; its form is that of a regular parallelogram, one hundred and seventy-five feet long, by seventy-three feet broad; it has thirty-six columns, twelve of which are placed on each of the sides, and six on each of the ends. These columns are of the Doric order, and gradually diminish toward the top; they are twenty-eight feet high, and six feet in diameter; they support the roof, which is about eight feet high, and is ornamented by a very prominent cornice. At the two ends the monument presents a front—but there is no reason to think that the space between the columns was ever closed, and there are no traces of a pavement.

The material used in the construction of this building is common limestone, incrustated with shells, and the color is bright-yellow, interspersed with veins—and when seen at a distance, the columns appear to be formed of marble. It is in a remarkable state of preservation; it is more ancient than any of the other monuments of Sicily, but more perfect.

This noble edifice must have been built at a very early period, probably by the descendants of the companions of Æneas, and, therefore, is three thousand years old. It was, doubtless, a religious edifice, but unknown to what god it was consecrated, and the monument is simply termed the "Temple of Segesta."

DUNELLEN, N. J.

EVERY man's past life should be his critic, his censor, his guide. He who lives, and is done with life the moment it drops, hour by hour, from his hands, is not half a man. He is like a plucked plant that stands in water without roots of its own, and can have no growth, and soon fades and passes away.—Beecher.

DAYS AT LEXINGTON.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

"A H, poor dupe," says Emerson, in that wonderful "Works and Days," where, if you once get to the real heart and meaning, you will be better furnished for all the works and days to come. "Ah, poor dupe, will you never slip out of the web of the master-juggler—never learn that, as soon as the irrecoverable years have woven their blue glory between to-day and us, these passing hours shall glitter and draw us as the wildest romance and the homes of beauty and poetry?"

So I suspect these "Days" of which I am to write did not seem to go over us with any wonderful rhythm or magic.

They held, as all days do, though they are "divine as to the first Aryans," their commonplace garb, their treadmill of routine and small perplexities, their teasing cares, their limitations and heartaches underlying all. Yet I am sure that young girls and women in their blossoming all over the land, look back and find these days shining with their own grace and enchantment beyond the half dozen years which have slipped noiselessly between.

Some of these girls and women, I am sure, too, would be glad to come to a halt, and go back into that time across which distance has woven its bewitching draperies; but the battle-cry of life is never "Turn." It is one stern, unvarying, eternal "Forward!"

It was the year after the war—what a long perspective that war is getting!—when Dr. Dio Lewis wrote to me: "Come to us at Lexington, and we will try to make you happy."

That was somewhere in the early June, and in the autumn I went.

Lexington has its historic place, as we all know by the time we have scaled the three-syllabled walls of the Primer, on the threshold of the American Revolution. It is a quiet, drowsing, old-world sort of town. A singular air of antiquity pervades its pleasant green fields, and its peaceful old roads, and the ancient, steep-roofed houses. The old town seems to have droned and dreamed along a century, content with that one historic morning which opened the great seven-years' drama of the Revolution.

On Lexington common stands a small granite monument. It has no claim to architectural grace or beauty or finished workmanship. Yet, on its shaft you shall read the names of the men who seized their powder-horns and firelocks just as the dawn of that fair nineteenth of April reddened over the sky, and fell "on the village greensward when the robins and blue-birds were beginning to sing."

Despite the drowsy old town, and the picturesque common, and the dreary bit of monument, one feels, standing here, that the ground is hallowed, while one's thoughts inevitably turn back to that April morning, with the red-coated soldiery trampling up the village street, fair with sprouting oaks and maples; and the smell of powder in the soft air, and the dead faces of those "first heroes" on the spring grass, and the mourning and terror in the quiet farm-houses around.

Lexington is only about twelve miles from Boston. It seems a thousand. No vibration of the great toiling city entered that still, Rip-Van-Winkle sort of atmosphere, until it was suddenly broken up as though by magic.

The green fields, the old, rambling roads, the silent wood-paths, bloomed out of a sudden with groups of fresh young girls in costumes far brighter and more picturesque than those in which the British companies tramped up the village street in the dew and sunshine of the sweet spring morning.

The old town, practically a suburb of Boston, with its high, wholesome altitude, its quiet, home-like atmosphere, had attracted the attention of Dr. Dio Lewis. It seemed to afford him just the kind of stage he needed to carry out some new ideas of physical and mental culture which had long been a favorite theory of his. What those ideas were, the doctor has told the world in his books, and lectures, and classes, far better than I can. With his almost superhuman energy, his great power of infecting others with his own enthusiasms, his executive ability on vast scales, Dr. Lewis is certain never to fail in any undertaking to which he heartily devotes himself.

The hotel at Lexington, happily, was vacant at this juncture. It was a large, handsome building, with pleasant, sunshiny rooms; the main building supplemented by a three-story "wing," and capable of accommodating several hundred people. The very walls, too, seemed fragrant with bright, spicy memories of sleighing-parties and suppers, in which the adjoining towns, and even the "Hub" itself, had participated.

The doctor purchased the hotel, furnished it elegantly, tore down, enlarged, supplemented, rebuilt, infused his marvellous vitality into everybody, almost into the inert material about him, and in an incredibly short time the "Lexington Hotel" was transformed into a Health Institution and Seminary for Young Ladies; thus having a double working and character, and carrying forward in parallel lines the doctor's theory of harmonious physical and mental development.

The rapidity with which all these changes were effected must have seemed a good deal like the working of Prospero's wand to the staid inhabitants; and among these were some whose memories must have gone back to the very edge of that sad, glorious morning, perhaps even touched it in a vague, doubtful way, as one's memory hovers dimly around a dream.

The doctor's theory was novel and beautiful. In an experiment of this kind no human skill or foresight could have prevented some friction in the details, but I believe that my own feeling of affectionate remembrance of these days only reflects that of hundreds gathered under the great roof at Lexington for several years.

This new idea of combining two kinds of culture, which the world, from its mediæval institutions down to our own time, has practically agreed to place at opposite poles, was likely to strike and attract people.

Young, delicate, blooming girls all over the land made sudden light and grace in the quaint, old streets where the loud British squadron had thundered along so many years before.

How the sweet, young faces and the dear, familiar names rise up before me, as I sit writing this to-day away off among the cool shadows of the New Hampshire hills!

It was in early October that I went to Lexington. The frosts had come and the oaks and birches were masses of rich gold and saffron, and the rock-maples wore their vivid maroons and glittering scarlets.

And all this outside splendor of color seemed the fit surrounding of that new life on which we were to enter, full of eager wonder and anticipation.

I may as well say here that the Seminary advantages, physical and mental, were not limited to students. There was a pleasant circle of ladies, invalids, graduates of other schools, friends of the doctor's, who came here to enter the "movement cure" or the "gymnastic classes" or attend some of the lectures, but in a large sense pupils and boarders were fused into one family.

But of all this bright, varied life there is only one phase which I can show you, and all that has gone before is only the necessary background of a picture in whose front there are a few figures to be set, with as clear outline and vivid coloring as lie in my pen.

One of the great attractive features at Lexington was the "Shakspeare classes," of which Theodore D. Weld was the teacher.

Years ago, I heard a young friend, just out of school, say: "I want to understand Shakspeare; but the most of his dramas are like a garden walled round and locked up to me; I know that inside are all rare blooms and fruits; but I cannot reach them; I stand on the outside, waiting for somebody to come with a golden key and unlock the gate."

"And now had the man come with the golden key to unlock my Shakspeare?" Thinking of what my friend had said I asked myself this question a great many times the summer before I entered Lexington.

Practically, Theodore D. Weld was a stranger to me; I had caught glimpses, in my occasional visits to Lexington, of the fine, intellectual face and the snowy hair and the "glittering gray beard," going altogether to make up a tender, patriarchal picture.

I knew something of the man's history; how that, in his youth, he had stood foremost amid the small band of men who had borne testimony against the wrong and shame of slavery, when to do this meant persecution and social ostracism; I knew, too, that Wendell Phillips—a quarter from which undue praise is certainly not to be anticipated—had once said of his friend: "Weld is the most eloquent man in America!"

I had also been told that loss of voice in his youth and a peculiar and rather morbid sensitiveness of temperament had largely prevented any display of his remarkable gifts to the world, and that the eloquent young orator's later life had been devoted, in the most quiet, unpretending way, to teaching young men and women.

Afterward, when I came to know Mr. Weld better, he seemed to me an almost solitary instance of a man without a spark of personal ambition, and that this was really the secret of his long abstinence from every sphere of public life.

I want to take you, now, reader, right into the heart of the buzzing, varied life at Lexington, a life differing in a good many respects from any other you could find in the world.

It is yet early in the forenoon and another "lesson bell" has rung. There is a swift hurrying of feet along the halls to the large, sunny room at the end.

Once inside, you seem to enter a charmed atmosphere. The autumn day shines in through the pale green, gold and buff of the oaks and birches. On the camp-chairs, ranged along the walls, are the fair, blooming, eager faces. Youth and beauty and intellect of no common promise are there; and names, too, which startle one, because they are world-wide and fragrant with a lineage not of gold or ancestry, but a better one, of letters.

No frigid "recitation" atmosphere pervades that room. A real home freedom is permitted each. There is no restraint except that of good breeding anywhere. If the pupils are tired of one position they are at liberty to choose another, and can stand or sit, as they like.

They come, too, from every State in the Union; fair Northern girls and blooming Southern ones, from coast and prairie, they sit side by side, bending over their text-books.

The room, too, was free as out-doors to anybody who chose to enter. Beside the members of the household, there were more or less visitors from abroad who came to hear the celebrated teacher, and learn his methods.

There he sits, the centre of that blooming group of maidens; over which his fine gray eyes wander with a thoughtful tenderness. The pale sunshine glimmers in the white hair, or the glistening beard. He takes his glasses and his well-thumbed Howe's Shakspeare, the margin crowded with his annotations. There is a hush of expectancy on every face, almost as though the prophet was about to speak.

Mr. Weld's methods of teaching Shakspeare were as original as everything else about him. He believed that the world's grandest poet, he who saw with such clear insight to the very springs of human life and action, was the best teacher of youth.

He believed, too, that the central aim of all teaching should be, not to crowd the mind with masses of facts, but to develop its own powers, to awaken its interest, kindle its imagination, stir its slumbering forces into life.

One of Mr. Weld's favorite expressions was: "We complain of the mistakes and failures we see on every hand and lay it all to the want of brains. The difficulty does not lie there. Almost all of us have brains enough. The trouble is we don't use them."

His plan was to make the girls "use" their brains.

Howe's Shakspeare contains excerpts from most of the principal dramas. Mr. Weld's rule, stated broadly, was to have each scholar carefully read over the lesson before entering the class, penetrating deeply into its spirit and meaning as she could, by herself. In the class each, in turn, read a few passages, and then came to quote his own favorite expression the "pulverizing."

This meant gathering out the beauties and difficulties of the great poet and talking them over in the most familiar, fireside fashion.

Whatever was beautiful or grand, humorous, quaint, obscure, was shaken out and held up to the light. It was all done in the most familiar conversational way. We talked precisely as we would, gathered some evening around the table under our home roofs, with the silver light instead of the pale gold of the autumn sunshine falling on the eager, upturned faces.

These were the times which brought out the peculiar genius of Mr. Weld.

I see now his kindling eyes, the flash of his fine, kindly face, as some grand conception, some splendid passage of the great poet shook the old man's soul.

Seized with a sudden inspiration he would spring from his chair, drop his glasses and then what a torrent of eloquence would burst from his lips. The very air seemed to throb and burn with it. What a light he would flash along each obsolete phrase of the old, sweet mother-tongue! How each obscure and turbid passage grew clear as crystal, as he held it up before us. How his fine insight used to penetrate to the spiritual essence of Shakspeare's words.

I used to think if the great magician could rise up from his slumber of two and a half centuries "by the old north chancel in the great church at Stratford," and enter among us, he would listen with pleased satisfaction to this interpreter of the hidden meanings that lurk and "sweetly invite" along his pages.

It was all done in so simple a way, too, a child might have understood the whole.

Mr. Weld vitalized Shakspeare's characters for us. They were no longer mere conceptions of the poet—fanciful creations that shone and glided along his dramas, but living, breathing men and women standing before us, palpitating with loves and griefs and living just such human lives as we did.

There was Miranda with her seraphic sweetness, and Ophelia with her loitering tenderness, and Rosalind with her sparkling grace, and Beatrice with her smiling irony, and Portia with her calm, lofty womanhood, and Cordelia with her purity and her tender, heroic loyalty, there, too, was Viola with her young love and her wonderful self-sacrifice, and there, also, was poor Juliet with the passionate heart of her too early blossomed southern girlhood.

One after another they came—these "women of Shakspeare," out from the drama, and stood before us in the shining garments of womanly grace and beauty, which he had woven around them.

There was Prospero, the mighty magician, whom sea and earth and air obeyed, grown tender and human, as he related to Miranda the story of their common wrongs; there was Hamlet with his lofty melancholy, and Polonius with his complacent pedantry; there was Horatio in his Roman loyalty, and Lear in his awful misery, and Macbeth in his dark guilt, and Othello in the wild tempest of his jealousy; there was the sparkling merriment of Bassanio, the delicate, airy grace of Mercutio, the broad, old English laughter of Falconbridge, the rapier-like flash of Hotspur's wit, and the quaint, delicious humor of old Gonsalo.

It seemed, too, that these lessons of Shakspeare left no lesson of human life untouched. They swept the whole gamut of living and duty. The most splendid bursts of eloquence were always inspired by some lofty, moral purpose. Duty, self-sacrifice, the highest ideals of living and working, a heroic loyalty under every test to truth and one's own soul, was the central aim of every lesson, to which everything else was always subordinated; indeed, I cannot better express the character of these talks than by quoting a remark of my friend, Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, who, coming out from Boston one morning, had gone into the class. As she left the room, she exclaimed fervently: "That, I consider, the very genius of teaching!"

There was Roxana Foote Beecher—I name her first for reasons which, should she ever chance to read this article, she will understand—who sometimes seized the margins of minutes around her German classes to drop in upon us. She was a fair, slender, graceful, young woman, and the story went that she resembled the dead grandmother whose name she bore, and who seems to have united a rare strength with great womanly loveliness of character, as we see her portrait, drawn by those who knew her best, in Dr. Lyman Beecher's biography.

The later Roxana, with her finely-poised head and its beautiful crown of golden curls, inherited the Beecher characteristics; the dash, the indomitable spirit, the keen love of fun. What a magnetic force she was in the school that year! I can never imagine how we could have got on without her. She was the soul and life of the charades and exhibitions. Her fine sense of harmony, her picturesque tastes were always in demand in those frequent dramatic entertainments with which we used to vary the evenings at Lexington.

One instance of her "Beecher vim" comes in so "pat" here that I cannot avoid relating it. Her class was to entertain us with a little German drama, in the vernacular of which they had been carefully drilled. On the night of the exhibition the hall was crowded with hundreds of strangers. Several days previously Miss Beecher had been taken seriously ill with some bronchial affection, which not only confined her to her bed but prevented her articulating a syllable. It had been arranged that she should furnish a little explanatory introduction for those of her audience to whom "Teutonic" was Greek, and, despite the vicinity of the "Hub," these formed, I suspect, a vast majority of the audience.

Of course that part of the programme had to be abandoned. The play was about to commence, when suddenly, before the curtain arose, there stood the slender girlish figure, and the pale face with the beautiful aureole of golden hair about it. She had dragged herself up from her bed to the hall. In a moment her voice rang with all its fresh clearness over the audience. When her brief speech was finished, she disappeared as quietly as she had entered.

To those who knew her real condition at the time it was a superhuman triumph of will over physical obstacles; but we settled it at last that it was all "Beecher pluck."

Into our "Shakspeare Class" there came also another young girl, with a singular grace and delicacy of temperament, and a corresponding fineness and finish of face and manner. She inherited a name honored and loved in both hemispheres, for it was Una Hawthorne. It seemed symbolic of herself, and that no other could have suited that spiritual, ethereal girl.

With great loveliness of character, she inherited her father's morbid delicacy of temperament. The wear and tear of life must inevitably jar and bruise that too finely organized nature. I see now, as I write, the finely-cut, half Greek profile, shaded by its bright masses of auburn hair. I used to like to sit still and watch it, as I would some picture, although I scarcely ever addressed the owner. I had a kind of feeling that even words, unless from voices she loved, would jar and wound the sensitive chords of that young soul.

Miss Hawthorne usually entered the class in company with her friend, Miss Haskell—now Mrs. Dr. Handy, of St. Louis. A strong affection existed between the two. The daughter of the great author inherited all her father's intense loyalty of nature. Yet the young women were totally unlike in temperament and character.

Miss Haskell, with her fair complexion and her bright rose-bloom, and her pleasant, expressive face, had a hearty, wholesome, generous vivacity of nature that gave itself out to everybody. One could not conceive of a morbid fibre in her whole organization.

There was something half pathetic in the entire devotion of the author's daughter to her friend; and when I saw them together, I used to think of Hawthorne's long friendship for his old college classmate, Franklin Pierce.

I remember one dreary winter's morning I stood at my window watching the few faded leaves of pale saffrons and browns which clung with a sad tenderness to some magnificent elms opposite the hotel. The winds rattled and cantered dismally among the branches, but of a sudden all other sounds were broken up by the shriek of the locomotive, which a moment later thundered into the little depot on our right.

Then the front door of the house opposite opened suddenly, and Una Hawthorne came out. She roomed here, for our own barracks overflowed, and we were obliged to levy on the quaint old houses for a wide circle around us.

I see the bareheaded girl standing there a moment against the cold, dismal background, in the soft, purplish-toned dress in which I remember her best, her face full of pleased expectancy; then she sprang down the steps, hurried across the road to the depot, and was out of sight.

But I waited, divining what was coming. In a short time I saw her again approaching the house. She was not alone now; Miss Haskell had joined her friend at the depot. What a glad, full content shone in that bareheaded girl's eyes, while the chilly winds plucked angrily at her bright masses of hair!

It was a very little thing, to be sure, to write about, but it lent some charm and grace to that sullen day which otherwise it would have missed.

Mrs. Handy was my friend also in some far less degree. I think I may relate here, without betraying any private confidences, an instance or two which she repeated to me of Miss Hawthorne's regard for herself, they so strikingly illustrate the fine quality of the young girl's affection.

"She never gave me a present," said Mrs. Handy; "that is, she never put it into my hands as other people would; but I would often find something—books, for instance, rare little volumes, with my name in them, lying on my dressing-table. And it was so with all her other gifts. Each came to me with some delicate flavor of surprise and secrecy clinging to it."

Then again: "I remember I had a dress-skirt to trim in some rather elaborate pattern, and my school duties pressed at the time, and I had talked all this over, more or less, in Una's presence. One morning, after I returned home, I conscientiously resolved that I would devote the day to the unwelcome task. I went about it with grim determination, and drew the fabric out of my trunk, when lo! it was all finished, daintily and completely as though some faerie had been at work upon it. But I knew whose fingers had set with loving thoughts every stitch in that garment. It was like Una."

And this was one instance among many of her thoughtful, loving service to her friend.

The great novelist's daughter had a swift, playful humor that twinkled about all her intercourse with those she loved. It darted, and glittered, and played charmingly, like summer lightning among heaps of silver cloud. I never heard that it thrust or hurt.

There came also into our Shakspeare class a little girl, measured by her birthdays, not by the singular depth and acuteness with which her young mind pierced to the central meanings of our lesson text.

She was the niece of Theodore Winthrop. Some soft, tender light shed down from that last heroic moment which closed so early the life of the author—soldier seemed always to linger about her in my eyes; and some fragment from that beautiful biographical sketch, in which Curtis has fitly embalmed the memory of his friend, would float in among my thoughts, like a sudden fragrance from outside when windows are flung open, or a robin's song is shaken out suddenly into the wide stillness.

Then there was Rachel Pomeroy, with her fine soul shining out of a fair girlish face, and the harp hidden and silent, from which was yet to arise such strong, sweet strains.

So the names come up, and the faces one after another; I see Garrison sitting in our midst, with his strong, kindly face, and his silvery speech, that was like an enchanter's wand. Summoning up the past before us, I see Mrs. Hawthorne, her fine profile framed in its widow's cap, as she occasionally came in from her quiet home at Concord to our evening entertainments.

A little later I was to read about that face, lying in its still peace, far away in the ancient English burial-ground, with a cluster of the world's great authors gathered around, and two lovely orphan-girls standing there, and one of them stepping forward, just as they were about to close up the grave, and scattering a handful of foreign dust on the casket which held the fond, silent heart of the wife and mother. Other faces and scenes from these days come up before me, but the canvas is full now.

Two years later, just as the evening shadows were gathering softly among the mountains, running my eyes over the paper, which had just come to us from the great world below, I read that the house at Lexington was—a heap of ashes! In the bright, still summer morning the flames had burst suddenly from chimney and window and walls.

They gathered up the wide pile in one swift, splendid banner of flame, that tossed its folds in awful defiance against the blue, peaceful sky.

In a little while there was nothing left but charred columns and blackened rafters, where, of late, the light feet, and the faces in the first rose-bloom of youth, had gone smiling past.

And reading, a sharp pang struck to my heart—it was striking other hearts; I am certain, all over the land, as they were repeating at that hour, with mournful voices the mournful words which told the whole story—

“Burned to the ground!”

THE OLD PINE CHURN

BY ROSELLA RICE.

I SIT here warming my feet—the ground is white with snow, and the bleak sky is covered with clouds of cold, dull gray. I take up the poker to draw out the red, red coals into full view, for I so love their cheery glow. As I lay the little stub of a wooden poker down, I involuntarily say, “Oh, dear! oh, dear!” just as if my frame was rent with pain. Strange, that touching the little, unseemly poker, should wrench that cry from me, and yet it did; and though it force a cry from me every day, I would not lay it on the fire, and see it turn to a little white surf of ashes that one puff of breath could scatter into air.

No, it does me good, as does yon grinning, bony skull, which was once as I am now; or yon rough cross, with the vine hiding the base—bold, hard symbol—two stern, yet kind reminders that I love to touch my cheek against, and lean my weary brow upon.

The little poker is one stave out of the old churn we had when I was a little girl, and every one who was ever a child, in a country-home, remembers the ban that came with the early sunshine on churning-day. The white-pine churn, large at the bottom and small at the top, was rolled out resolutely, and the sound it made seemed to say to me, “Hee! hee! hee! here I come! hee, hee, hee!” a confused babbling laugh, somewhere between a vicious, bantering giggle, and a mild kind of profane language—language too wicked for good folks to use, and too much diluted for downright swearers.

Oh, that churn! I wish I'd only known, “to such vile uses must ye come at last,” when I looked upon its white staves, and wondered how Adam ever did find out how to make churns out of separate staves, and make them fit closely enough to hold sour cream. I used to wish he'd not had such good, close tools; then, sometime, when a poor, little eight-years-old girl was churning away like a lady, and the honest sweat standing on her forehead, and sneaking down her neck, and stealing down into her bosom, why the churn would just fall apart, and the cream be spilled, in a way good enough for anybody's mamma.

How ominous the sound of the cream as it was poured in—what threats it did seem to make, as it shouted out, in a hoarse, laughy, guttural voice: “Ah-h-h, my little lady, little lady, ah-h-h!” Then the freshly-scalded dasher was put in, the drops wiped off, a few dashes taken by the maternal hand to see that it had the right tone, and it was wheeled into an out-of-the-way dark corner, away from doors and windows, and glimpses of blue sky, and dreamy hillsides, and like temptations. Then the little chair was placed beside the churn, and with clean hands and clean apron, I stepped up into it as one would march to the pillory or guillotine, and left alone in my glory.

And while I stood up there, stretched my very longest, I used to wonder how it happened that I was born the eldest—used to wonder how Eve came to invent the use of butter on such luscious fruits as Eden undoubtedly afforded—why cream wasn't better and healthier than butter, why I didn't get sick and die of gout like other children did, miraculously—why I never took scarlet fever or diphtheria and lay abed sick a long while, and not have to wash dishes or churn, but eat toast and tea and preserved plums, and be propped up in bed and feel my mother's tears drip, drip on my head, as I had often read in delightful story-books. Why was it that I was not favored, like many other little girls who had wee, slender claws of white hands, and whose thin mouths puckered romantically, and who had interesting hollows in their cheeks, and sunken blue places under their sad eyes, and fine pencillings of veinery in their pretty temples? I was sound and hard, and brown and ugly, and was always called Tom, because I liked to climb trees, and turn summersaults, and ride the farm-horses, and walk on stilts, and fly from high places so splendidly on my jumping-pole.

One June day the churning was unusually large—two jars of cream—and I had my orders not to leave it until it was ready to gather. My little chair was placed beside the churn, and I stood in it and tugged at the dasher until my arms ached so I could hardly use them. I knew I'd ought to rest, so I sat down mercifully and improved the time by reading how elephants were caught in the jungles of Africa. That led me on to read about lions, and tigers, and leopards, and after I'd finished them I went back to the churn with renewed vigor.

Just then a robin alighted in the top of the poplar, and sang so sweetly that it would have been irreverent to have plodded at the old dasher whose swashy sound of "choo-o-choo," had no music in it. So I shaded my eyes and leaned on the post by the porch and listened, and admired, and answered back softly so my mother wouldn't hear.

The dear little robbly stretched his mouth from ear to ear, and hung by his toes, and tipped his head down and seemed to sing: "Why, Rosie, why, Rosie! whee-o, whee-o, Rosie, heigho, heigho, Rosie, whee-o!"

I clapped my hands and replied, he darted down head foremost and alighted on the old mossy well-curb, and we chatted, and chirped, and chee'd, and laughed with each other royally. Then my mother heard us and reminded me of the churning. Oh, dear! I wished folks ate pumpkin-sauce on their bread instead of butter, but I seized hold of the heavy dasher and worked away until a shrill cackle informed me that there lay a fresh egg ready for the gleaner, so I ran out to get it, for didn't my mother say, bring in all the fresh eggs you can to make custards, and hadn't I ought to obey the mother who gave me birth, and who had cared for me during my helpless infancy when I didn't know but that even pins were good to eat and good to swallow.

While I was getting the egg I saw another hen walk off slyly, just as though she had a hidden nest, she acted kind of sneaking, looking back at me over her shoulder when she thought I didn't see her.

Of course I would not be outwitted by a hen, nobody would, so I followed her at a safe distance and looked just as innocent and unsuspecting as a little girl could.

But I found, after awhile, that she was only seeking her wallowing place in the cool, loose loam, so I sat down and pretended to be braiding grass and timothy, and watched her scratch the cool earth all up among her feathers, and tussle about and lave her sides, and breast, and thighs, and stretch out her unshapely legs and lie like a great ungainly, roasted fowl, with never a joint or hinge in her long, yellow limbs and horny feet.

I was just thinking that this must be to hens what swimming and diving and plouting about in the creek is to little girls, when I heard my poor mother's "hoo-hoo!" I answered "hoo!" and started to run back to the house to finish the churning, thinking I would appease my mother's just wrath with the nice fresh egg I had found, but, what had I done with that egg? Alas, I had put it in my pocket in my new linen dress and had lain down on that side while I was so leisurely watching the hen swim! I felt in cautiously, and withdrew my hand even more cautiously, as I sickened and wiped my fingers on the grass.

"See here, my lady," said my mother, "this churning will come in one half-hour if you work steadily, but if you trifle, it won't come to-day, and I am bound that you shall do it if it keeps you busy until you are eighteen years of age; so you know what to depend on."

"Oh, I'll bounce into it and soon have it done, mamma; you see I had to go out," said I, putting on a brave, bright face, but keeping just as far away from the dirty mias of a pocket as circumstances would allow.

She went back to her work in the third story of our high, rambling, picturesque old house, and I made a good deal of music on the churn until the click-clack of the loom warranted me in stopping. Then I took a basin of water, turned my pocket inside out and cleaned and washed it. It was a dirty job and sickened me for awhile after.

Then I turned my back resolutely and began counting the strokes of the dasher. That is the best plan I know to make one forget the tedium and insure steady work. I churned one hundred without stopping, then I sat down panting and rested awhile, and read Robinson Crusoe, a little book loaned me by a neighbor's son. For I might get hungry and feel too faint to work, I put a couple of potatoes in the hot ashes to roast. Then I began to churn again and to sing the old, familiar ditty of "Come, butter, come." I had on previous occasions found the result of this solicitation to be all that one could desire. But it did no good this time, though I sang it vigorously twenty times over, sang it with variations and additions and the most importunate invitations, but not one little speck was visible.

I had heard of butter being bewitched, but my mother said there were no witches now, and all such talk was folly and superstition, that the last witch on the face of the earth was the witch of Endor, the one who called Samuel up from the dead in Bible days.

Then I fell to wondering if any of Mrs. Endor's posterity yet lived, and, if they did, whether they looked like other folks, and if their little girls wore copperas and white check linen dresses, and if they ever broke eggs in their pockets, and if the Endors were fond of butter, and whether they made their own, or just bought it at haphazard, not knowing who made it, or whether it had hair in it or not, clean or dirty.

Then I leaned my hand and my forehead on the dasher and pondered, and thought it might be possible that old, old, old, old Mrs. Endor was one of our maternal ancestors.

While dreaming away, I heard a little "twitt! twitt!" in the chimney, and, looking up, saw a "twitt-bird" flitting about on the high-up rim of the chimney-top. "You little dear," I said; "how I wish I had your wings and your freedom!" And here I cried right out; for didn't mamma say she'd keep me at this until I was eighteen, if I didn't finish it? That must be a long, long while. I tried to count how many years, but I couldn't; so I got an ear of corn and picked off eighteen grains, and laid them down in a row, and then took eight away, and found I'd have to churn just ten years.

I thought it would be a nice thing to be eighteen years old, for all the girls in our neighborhood received a "setting out" at that age; a side-saddle and a heifer, a spinning-wheel and a bed, and something else, a broom, or a windmill, or some other article I couldn't exactly remember.

That would just suit me. I had often coaxed mamma to loan me her side-saddle to fasten on a log, or on top of the fence, and she just "hooted" at me; but now I'd show mistress mamma when I was eighteen. I would sell my heifer and buy red and white candy, and keep the bed to turn summersaults on, and trade the spinning-wheel for toy-books, and keep the side-saddle to ride on among the logs at the wood-pile; and the other thing, if it was a wind-mill, I'd present it to my poor old grandpapa, who had been confined to his bed for many years with paralysis; and if it was a broom, I'd keep it to ride on when we chaps played "keep house" evenings when our parents had gone to singing school.

But, oh, dear, I'd rather die than to churn that long! So I sat down and cried most heartily. If I had to stand at that old churn ten years, who would Johnny Greene give all his sweet apples to during the winter, if I wasn't at school? And Cal Wiggins would get all the head marks then. And to what girl would little Jim Chambers give his chew of pine gum after he was done with it, if Zelle wasn't there to get it?

Then I cried the harder, and said, now if I could only get sick, real sick, so as to lie in bed on mamma's pillow, and have her feel of my forehead, and give me nice tea and toast, that would be a good thing, and I wouldn't have to churn, and she'd pity me and be sorry, and 'fraid I was going to die, and I'd have a splendid time of it. I did wish I knew how to get sick. I stood and studied and studied, and suddenly I remembered seeing a little boy get deathly sick at school when a big fellow coaxed him to swallow a bit of tobacco. What hindered me from doing the same? Be sure there was no big boy to give me the dose, but didn't my papa's little linen tobacco-wallet hang just inside the cellar door? I could help myself. The result would be so interesting, too.

Ten years to do a churning just in the budding of my childhood! I'd show mistress mamma! I reached into the wallet and took out a long, black, sticky twist, and taking up the bread-knife cut off some bits and swallowed them, then mounted my little chair and began singing at the top of my voice:

"Broad is the road that leads to death."

I only knew that one line, but it was sufficient, and I thought rather appropriate for the momentous occasion.

In a few moments I felt so badly that I wished I'd not swallowed it. In a few moments more I thought I'd rather churn all day than feel so sick; it didn't seem so interesting.

Then I ran to the door and called: "Oh, mamma, come down, come down!"

She thrust her head out of the window and said blandly: "Has the butter come? Oh, child, what's the matter? You're as white as a sheet!"

I opened my mouth to speak, but I trembled all over, and mumbled out: "Wa-a-a-agh! a-a-h!!"

She ran down with the baby tucked under her arm like an umbrella, dropped it, and snatched me up so pale, and sick, and wilted, and laid me on her bed and began rubbing me.

"How do you feel? What made you sick? Where do you hurt? Are you poisoned? You're always handling and tasting strange things, and now I expect you've been and gone and killed yourself with some vile plant or other! Oh, my child! what will I do? Such a young 'un, so queer and strange! Oh, my poor Zelle!" and she wrung her hands in a paroxysm of grief.

Just then I sickened and threw up something, and she held my head and moaned. Oh, I was very, very sick; it was death almost; and I felt so feeble that I couldn't exert myself enough to tell her. Pretty soon she smelt the tobacco, and she said: "Why, seems to me I smell tobacco!" And she sniffed to the right, and sniffed to the left, but did not mistrust me. She did not find any link between my sudden illness and the loathsome smell.

After severe sickness I grew better, and my wish was gratified. I lay in her bed, my head on her pillow, her counterpane over me, and her kind hands made the toast and tea and propped me up and fed me.

I called for the little mirror, and was perfectly satisfied with the real face so nearly approximating to the interesting ideal face of my solicitous dreams.

I was propped up in bed, pale, and wan, and exhausted, when my father came to supper. My mother told him the doleful tale with a good deal of visible white in her scared eyes. He sat on the bedside, and said he was sorry, and hoped I would be well enough to ride old Jabez to water the next day.

I felt very serene and pleasant by this time, lying there, the chief point of attraction, and I had paid so dearly for the gratification that I didn't mind an occasional probe that my conscience gave me.

When my mother had supper ready, she said: "Zella, I don't see the bread-knife; do you know where it is?"

I started up scared, and hurriedly replied: "Maybe it's got in papa's tobacco-wallet; who knows?" Then I settled down, "and the subsequent proceedings interested me no more."

It just recurred to me that instant that I had slipped the bread knife away, side by side, with the huge black plug.

My mother looked at me strangely. I felt so drowsy just then, and closed my eyes immediately. She stepped inside the cellar door, and pretty soon she said in a soft tone, not meant for my ears: "Come here, Aleck."

Papa went, and I heard a low buzz of voices, a suppressed giggle, more whispering, some pleasant altercation, a little more laughter, then she said: "Well, that is the force of example; she thinks whatever you do is right, and manly, and she takes you for a pattern. Poor little thing, I'll never say a word about it to her; she's suffered enough. But, Aleck, you'd ought to be ashamed of your filthy habit after this."

It seems they gave me credit for wanting to learn to use tobacco because my papa did, and I was very willing they should believe it so.

That old churn was one of the clouds in my childhood's summer sky for many, many long years; but at last our father replaced it with one by which I could sit and read and churn, and make a pleasant and enjoyable pastime of this necessary item of housework. Then the rolls of butter seemed flavored with sweet poetry, and stories, and biography, and as I spread it on my bread I was reminded of this bit of descriptive scenery, and that thrilling narrative, and this rare poem—good things I had read while churning.

The old churn was used to keep nuts in for years, and then onions, and I was sad and sorry both when a boy ran his sled against it and it tumbled to pieces, an old shattered thing.

So it is with a very serious and thoughtful degree of revenge that I use one of the old staves for a poker for the little stove in my room. Still, I do somewhat enjoy punching it into the coals and allowing it to burn a little while, it gratifies me.

THE great blessings of mankind are within us, and within our reach, but we shut our eyes, and, like people in the dark, we fall foul upon the very thing we search for, without finding it.—Seneca.

BRIGHT EVENINGS.

BY J. E. M.

"DEAR me, Annie, I'll never marry an author. Why, you never see anything of Albert. He is in that old study every evening turning over his old books, if he isn't writing. When I marry I mean to have my husband sit in our sitting-room, and read aloud, and sing, and play the flute, and be at home to go out if I wish to. I should think you would be as dull as a mouse in a cage. Such a lively piece as you used to be, too."

Annie smiled as her gay friend rattled on.

"Now I suppose you will be surprised when I tell you," she said, "that some of our very pleasantest evenings are those which we spend in the study, both busy, and only occasionally speaking a word to each other, or now and then looking up at each other. Albert says he likes to have me sit there with my work or reading, that it helps rather than hinders him; so I usually spend my evenings there. It was Wieland who wrote in a sweet letter concerning his wife, 'If I but knew she was in the room, or if she but stepped in a moment and spoke a word or two, it was enough to gladden me.'

"Depend upon it, Kate, it is not so much the many attentions the husband pays that will go to make life happy, but the uniform loving spirit, which makes even the commonest words a blessing. Busy workers often have little time they can afford to spend in the pleasant manner you picture, but they generally lead the happiest lives. Cheerful, steady industry, joined with home love, will bring us as near to Eden as is permitted in this lower sphere."

THE EASE OF DEATH.

THE following is from an article in The Galaxy, entitled "The King of Terrors Decrowned."

"It has so happened that I have seen many men and women die. Without design or disposition on my part, I have very many times been present when sick persons were ebbing to eternity. I have seen men and women, young and old, cultivated and ignorant, orthodox and heterodox, in their last moments, and, as a rule, all of them passed away, if not without regret, at least with entire resignation. None of them showed dread of the future. Their thoughts were fixed on what they were quitting, not on what they were going to. I observed that some of them were troubled, perhaps distressed, when they first thought they could not recover, but that, the nearer their end came, the less apprehensive and the calmer they grew. Having once banished hope, tranquility seemed to descend upon them as a substitute, and afterward, if free from physical pain, there was unruffled peace. If encouraged to believe they might get well, or if they had a favorable turn, the old anxiety, with somewhat of the former apprehension returned, proving that their mental disquietude was born of their expectation of life, not their fear of death. Thus was established a clear analogy between material and spiritual anguish under the same circumstances.

LAY SERMONS.

"AND I WILL GIVE YOU REST."

BY RICHMOND.

"THE curse of labor!" exclaimed Mr. Albright, lifting himself wearily from the work over which he had been bending for hours—hard work, because chiefly brain-work—very hard work, because attended with care and anxiety.

"Labor is not a curse," said the friend who had just come into the private office of Mr. Albright. It was evening, work did not always end at sunset.

"You would think so," replied the merchant, "if we were to change places."

"It may be with those who labor, and are at the same time heavy laden," answered the friend. "Labor, rightly performed, is a blessing. To work is to be in God's order; and to be in His order is to be in the way of peace."

The merchant looked at his friend curiously.

"You make a new distinction," he said. "In my view, to labor is to be heavy laden. The very word involves the idea of burdens and weariness."

"It is only another word for employment, or useful work," was replied. "The labor is what the hands or brain perform; and if this is done from right ends, and under the government of reason and moral law, it will prove a blessing. It is the eager grasping—the unsatisfied greed for gain, or power, that gives the curse to labor. Only those are heavy laden who work for selfish and ignoble ends."

There was a flash in Mr. Albright's eyes. He felt the remark as a personal reflection.

"Do I work from selfish and ignoble ends?" he asked, with a little quiver of anger in his voice.

"None can know that but yourself—except God," replied the friend. He spoke quietly and impressively. "That there is something wrong in your ends of life is plain, from the fact that you labor, and are, at the same time, heavy laden. But this need not be of long continuance. You know the way of escape."

"I?"

"Yes; and have known it since you were a child. It was one of the first things you learned at home, in the Sunday-school, and at church. I wonder that you have forgotten it."

"Oh, I understand," and the half-eager, questioning look went out of the merchant's face, and was followed by one of disappointment, not unmingled with disgust.

"Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." The friend uttered aloud the divine word that he knew to be in the thought of Mr. Albright.

"Oh, yes. I have heard that ever since I was a child. I hear it in church almost every Sunday."

"And you believe it?"

"I would be a poor Christian if I did not believe the Word of Christ."

"Then, the way out of your care and anxiety—out of your fear and trouble—out of your weariness and exhaustion from labor, is plain. If you go to Him, he will give you rest."

"So I have heard the preacher say hundreds of times."

"Have you ever gone to Him?"

"I go to church. I say the prayers and take the communion. I give when called upon, and liberally, I think—trying to remember the poor and needy. But it is very difficult, as you must know, for a man so deeply involved in business as I am, and with so many interests at stake, to give much thought to religion. I do the best I can on Sunday. I always go to church, and take my part in the service."

"But the way to get rest is to go to Christ Himself. If this be not done, we who labor will continue to be heavy laden. The mere going to church, and giving of our substance to feed the poor and clothe the naked, will not help us."

"Going to Him in prayer, and religious meditation, you mean?"

"No; not that, specially; but rather going to Him in the purpose of our hearts, and believing in Him practically."

"Vague as too much preaching one hears. These stereotype phrases have come to mean very little to most of us."

"Let us see about that. God is good—goodness itself. He loves with unselfish desire to bless His creatures; and the blessing He would give them is love of doing good, which is an eternal spring of delight. The love of doing good to one's self alone is what separates us from God; and, to be separated from the source of all happiness, is to be wretched. Work, or service, is the means by which we can do good to others. If we work only for ourselves, that is, only with the thought of serving ourselves, can we hope to find Heavenly delight? Will we not labor and be heavy laden with disappointment? It is in new and unselfish purposes of the heart that we can alone go to Him."

Mr. Albright looked at his friend with an expression that said—"You speak to me in an unknown tongue. I fail to grasp your meaning."

The friend understood him—paused for some moments—and then asked: "Do you not believe that He who made us knows what is best for us?"

"Certainly," replied the merchant.

"Best for us in this world?"

"I do."

"And you believe that He is a being of infinite love—the love of doing good? Not of doing good to himself, but to the myriads of creatures whom He has made."

"Yes."

"And that he created us in His image and likeness."

"I read it in the Bible."

"If we had remained in the order of our creation, we would be unselfish, like God. But we did not remain in that order. We turned away, and narrowed all our feelings and all our interests meanly to self, and so we lost His likeness and His image. Can we hope for happiness in this inverted order of being? Is happiness possible in a world, where all work for themselves—where each antagonizes the other—where getting, and not giving, is the rule—where every one tries to get nearer to himself, and so farther and farther away from God and his neighbor? Think, my friend!"

Mr. Albright drew a deep sigh.

"It is only in the degree that we are able to put away the thought of self in our work, and to consider how much good others will derive from it, that we shall find a blessing and not a curse in labor. Our work will be none the less thorough under this higher life of the soul; nor will the just return be less. And any other return than a just one no man can take except in peril of his soul."

"I don't think," said Mr. Albright, speaking reflectively, "that, active and eager as I own myself to be in trade, I deal unjustly with any. I should condemn myself strongly, and, as a Christian man, repent before God, if I were conscious of having, in any case, done wrong to my neighbor. The temptations are great; but my skirts, I trust, are clear of sin in this particular."

"Self-love is blind," the friend remarked. "Let us go back to the beginning of our talk. You then called labor a curse; and admitted that you were heavy laden by your work. What was the special thing that troubled you so much?"

"It was this. A month ago, I saw signs of a rise in the market on a certain line of goods. We merchants have to be always on the alert, you know. Well, I went around and bought freely, looking up over twenty thousand dollars. Two or three others, seeing what I was after, went in also and bought largely. The market did not go up, but commenced receding. They got frightened and began to crowd their goods upon the auctions. This threw the market down. If I were to sell out to-day, I would lose three or four thousand dollars. Bad enough as it stands, and fruitful of wrong. But what makes it worse is the fact that it seriously embarrasses my financial affairs. I have been at my wits' end to-day. It was half past two before I was able to make my bank account good. The day's financiering left on my hands a good deal of correspondence, besides the work of adjusting some tangled accounts."

"And this is the labor you called accursed," said the friend, smiling. "I guess you were right about it. There is little blessing—except perhaps the blessing of discipline—in such labor. I am not surprised that in it you felt heavy laden. It was all for self—self that was unsatisfied with the fair returns of a good business, based on the wants of the people, and conducted on the legitimate basis of demand and supply. It is in this, and other outside ways—ways that lead men aside from the safe pursuits of useful trade and labor—that we are perpetually burdening ourselves and getting heavy laden with care and trouble. And, as I said at first, there is only one path leading out of these unhappy conditions. Men must heed the divine invitation, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest!'"

"There was a time," said Mr. Albright, "when that invitation of our Lord and Saviour had a sweet and comforting sound to my ears. I felt that I understood it; and that going to Him was a very simple and easy thing. But, somehow, it troubles instead of comforting me now. 'Come unto Me?' Where is He? How shall I get to Him? In prayer? I pray at home, and I pray in church; but He seems to be going farther and farther away from me."

"It may be that He really is," said the friend. "Or, to speak more correctly, that you are going farther and farther away from Him; for the Lord never turns Himself away—never departs from any one. 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock,' but He will not open the door. 'Come unto Me,' He calls to such as are afar off; but we will not come unto Him that we may have rest and peace."

"How are we to go to Him? How shall we, who labor and are heavy laden, find rest?" asked the merchant, almost with a cry of pain.

"We move through natural space by walking," was the reply. "But we cannot go to Christ in this way. He is not physically near or afar off. And yet he says 'Come.' Plainly, then, there is spiritual as well as natural walking; and can this be anything else than such changes in our states of mind, as bring us into sympathy with or nearness to those who have been far away from us through lack of sympathy? In the world in which our spirits dwell, change of state must be analogous to walking or to change of place in the world in which our bodies dwell. We are far away from God because our states of mind are the product of selfish and evil affections; and we will come near to Him in the degree that these are changed into better and more heavenly states. Prayer alone will not do this. There must be self-compulsion and self-restraint, helped by prayer. We must live in the world, in our homes, in our business, in society, obedient to the divine laws written in the Word of God. Self must be denied, and the good of the neighbor regarded as equal with our own. 'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,' must be the law ruling in all things."

"Is that possible?" asked Mr. Albright, with almost as much doubt and surprise in his manner as if he had heard this heavenly precept for the first time. Never before had he seen the rule laid so closely to his business life. To work by it in the common affairs of this world, was, in his view, to be driven to the wall.

"Can the divine law require of men what is impossible?" said the friend.

"Under this law, what hope is there for any one?" returned the merchant. "If I were to consider my neighbor in business, instead of myself, where do you think I would come out at the end of the year?"

"The law says nothing about considering your neighbor instead of yourself. You are only to act toward him as you would have him act toward you. That is, with a just regard to his rights and interests. You are not to seek gain in another's loss; for that would be doing what you would not have another do to you. You cannot, as a Christian man, enter into any combination to raise the price of goods in the market in order to get gain through a widespread loss to others; nor take part in gold and stock speculations, which disturb legitimate trade, and rob so many who are engaged in useful employment of their just returns in business. There is no spirit of honesty in these transactions. Honesty never takes from another, without an equivalent of service—except in case of gift, which does not come under the rule. Dishonesty is only another name for stealing. Is it any the less a theft to appropriate, by means of a "corner" in gold or stocks or produce, the wealth of others, than to take money from a till, or a coat from a gentleman's hall? Are the prayers of a man who does such things worth anything, even though out of his ill-gotten gains he give tens of thousands to build churches, establish mission schools and endow public charities?"

"The rule is too straight for our modern Christianity."

"And it is because Christians of to-day regard it as too straight, and refuse to live by it, that so many of them are heavy laden in their work. In all useful work, earnestly and honestly done, there is a Heavenly satisfaction. If any of us are heavy laden, it is because we have looked beyond the good effect of our work, and thought only of the gain to ourselves. We have not cared for the neighbor—whether he were benefitted or not. So that we got our reward, our work might perish, for all the concern it gave us after leaving our hands. But our loving Father in Heaven will not suffer us to be at ease under conditions of life, that, if continued, must end in spiritual death. He makes pain of mind as sure an attendant on all departure from divine laws, as He makes pain of body the sure attendant of all departures from natural laws. We labor, and are heavy laden, because we have turned away from God to self. We shall have rest only when we go home to Him. When His loving regard for others fills our souls. When we are more intent on doing good in our work than in seeking for a money reward."

"If a man," said Mr. Albright, "thinks only of doing good to others in his work, he will soon be out at the elbows—soon have nothing with which to do good."

"You mistake," said the friend. "A man must live by his work; and his highest service to his neighbor in his work, lies in the faithfulness with which it is done. The man who, in performing his work, gives to it the highest excellence possible in order that it may be of the highest use to his neighbor, worships God more truly than the most devout churchman in his Sunday service, if that churchman is indifferent to his neighbor in his weekday employment. The one will have perpetual delight in his work, the other will labor and be heavy laden. Which, think you, my friend, will get the most out of this life? Who's reward is best worth living for?"

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

A MOTHER'S TALK.

BY MRS. M. O. JOHNSON.

"CHILDREN are such a responsibility," sighed pretty little Mrs. Forrest, as she took up her work, and settled herself in her sewing-chair for a cosy chat with her friend, Mrs. Lawrence, having just equipped her noisy half dozen, and sent them off for an hour's coasting a bright winter afternoon.

"They are, indeed," was replied; "but all our blessings bring with them a responsibility, and one justly proportioned. There may be none greater in life than this, but there is no greater blessing; the ratio always holds good."

"Perhaps you are right," said Mrs. Forrest, doubtfully; "but to me the uncertainty seems fearful; the future so perilous, that I almost wish, at times, that motherhood had not fallen to my lot. Children of good parents go astray; and even when we try our best, how apt we are to make mistakes—how many dangers, physical and moral, lie in wait all the way along!"

Mrs. Lawrence's face wore a grave, sweet look, but she said nothing, till Mrs. Forrest paused in her sewing, and looked earnestly at her, as if awaiting a reply.

"Why is it, Carrie, that you are not troubled as I am? I knew how strong and tender is your love for your children; you do everything for them that lies in the power of mortal to do; but you have no anxiety, no foreboding thoughts. When your Charlie went to live in great, busy, bustling New York, where you well knew temptation waited at every turn, you were as cheerful and hopeful as now, when he has been tried and proved. I don't understand it."

The grave, sweet look deepened in Mrs. Lawrence's clear eyes as she answered gently: "Anna, you remember the story of the Grecian mother, who, when her little daughter lay in fearful extremity, bereft of reason, and beyond all mortal aid, pressed on through a toilsome journey, amid difficulties and dangers, opposition and reproach, to the very feet of Jesus, and besought His aid, urging her request even when He seemed inattentive, and when He gave that strange, trying reply, more disheartening than silence. You remember the final answer, after she had borne the severe test: 'Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt.' There is such a faith, Anna; rare it may be, but it is the mother's key-stone, that unlocks for her children the treasure-house of noble manhood and womanhood."

Mrs. Lawrence's face glowed as she spoke with the earnestness of deep conviction and strong feeling. Mrs. Forrest asked: "Do you mean to say that we can, in any absolute sense, take these words to ourselves?"

"I do. To such genuine faith is given this inheritance, this wealth of promise and benediction. But we must not forget it has one grand characteristic that proves it real. It is a faith not outside of life, but one with it. The Grecian mother did not sit idly praying and hoping that the Lord would bless her child; she drew near unto Him. A faith that springs out of nearness to Christ cannot fail of fruition. Only let us live near to Him, let His spirit permeate and mould all our intercourse with our children; and rest assured, His power will vivify, and His blessing crown, our every effort."

Mrs. Forrest was silent for some minutes, a more thoughtful expression on her brow than she was wont to wear; she was evidently pondering the idea her friend had suggested. Presently she said, a glad light breaking over her face: "Yes, I see it. You are right, Carrie, and I thank you. You have given me the secret of your constant cheerfulness and dauntless energy. You feel responsibility as much, perhaps more, than I do; but you are content to do your duty, and trust results in a better keeping than ours; I will try to do likewise."

THE MOTHER'S REVERY.

BY M. O. J.

IT is a dreary night without; the rain falls in torrents, and wild winds sweep round the house with roar and sob and moan, while ocean's swell, though distant, is audible to a listening ear. Little matters the storm to the pleasant homes thickly scattered over fair New England, save as thoughts of some who have gone out from those homes, or others like them, to cross the surging waters, press on heart and brain.

In one of the brightest and cheeriest of these, the mother has left the fireside group, and sought for a little while, her own room. This, too, is warm and cosy, and she places the lamp on the table, and draws up her light, cushioned rocking-chair before her bureau. She opens a drawer, and takes out a precious relic—something laid there more than twenty years ago, and which India's wealth could not buy—a pair of baby-socks, blue-and-white, with one tiny hole in the toe. Long she sits with them in her hand; she turns them over and over, ties and unties the bows of blue ribbon—and her thoughts are with the past. Well does she remember when her fingers shaped them for the little, untried, helpless feet. Her love guarded and guided them with watchful tenderness; and they were spared to ramble in childhood's sunny paths.

She rises, and takes from the closet a pair of little shoes, with well-worn toes and heels trodden down. Then the first pair of boots—and she smiles at the recollection of the joy and triumph they excited—smiles, too, at the noise and mud that used to come in the wake of those boots. What a treasure they were to the boy—and are to the mother! On many a little errand did they run for her; welcome even was their tread, noisy though it might be; and if they sometimes walked into mischief, her heart throbs in gratitude that manhood's feet have kept the path of integrity.

The little boots were long ago laid aside for a larger pair, another and another; and those now worn are farther from her side than her boy is from her thoughts. Ocean rolls between them, but she has entrusted him to a love mightier than hers, and believes he will return. She smiles again, as she recalls the stories she used to read to him, and in which he took dear delight, where the good fairy comes, offering to grant the most ardent wish. Ah! would she not choose quickly?

"Mother!" Is she dreaming? She springs to her feet, pale, eager, listening. A rustle, a stir down-stairs. She hears again that voice—none other like it—and she knows it is no fancy. Her boy has come, and is asking for her. She rushes to the stairway, and is clasped in his arms. Taller, stouter, browner than when he held her thus on the eve of sailing; but her boy, come home with the same honest heart, and life yet unspotted from the world.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

EVENING PASTIMES.

WE give our young readers some familiar plays and pastimes, for winter-evening recreation:

EARTH, AIR, FIRE AND WATER.

For this game the players sit round, and one stands in the midst of them, holding a handkerchief twisted into a ball.

She counts one, two, three, and then throws her handkerchief-ball into the lap of any one she chooses, crying at the same time, "Earth," "Air," "Fire" or "Water," as she pleases. If she cries, "Earth," the little girl into whose lap the ball falls must reply instantly by naming some animal living on the earth; if the word was "Water," some fish must be named; if "Fire," something that can exist in fire; if "Air," some bird or insect. If she hesitates so long as to allow the ball-thrower to count three, she pays a forfeit. Example:

Edith stands in the midst of a merry group with her handkerchief ready.

EDITH. One, two, three—EARTH.

ADA (into whose lap the ball falls). A lion.

Edith takes back the ball and pauses—one, two, three—then throws it at Jessy, crying, "FIRE."

Poor Jessy, very much startled, says, hurriedly, "Coals."

EDITH laughs, and replies, "Oh, Jessy, coals are not animals! Pay a forfeit."

ADA. But, Edith, I think really Jessy is right. The game says, "anything that exists in the fire," no animal can.

EDITH. No, it cannot; but coals get burned up. I think, too, we might say ashes, a stuff which fire does not consume, or a salamander, for "fire."

MARY. I don't know what a salamander is.

ADA. Only a make-believe creature, little Mary; a sort of spirit or fairy which was said to live in fire.

EDITH. Well, I will let Jessy off her forfeit, as it is so difficult. Now, prepare; I am going to throw the ball again. One, two, three—AIR.

MARY (catching it). An eagle.

EDITH. Very well; give me back the ball. Now, one, two, three—WATER.

ADA (hurriedly). Fish!

EDITH. No, that will not do; you must name some fish.

ADA. Salmon.

Thus the game goes on. Sometimes a little player has to pay a forfeit for hesitation and slowness in answering; sometimes for naming a wrong creature as living in the element named. It is by no means easy to mention a resident in earth, air, fire or water the moment you receive the ball.

HOW, WHEN AND WHERE.

The players are seated in a line or circle. One is chosen to ask the questions; she goes out of the room and closes the door, that she may not hear the word chosen. The players then select a word; if it has many meanings, so much the better; but for little girls an easy word with only one meaning does very well.

When they have fixed on it, they call the one who is outside the door into the room. She goes round the circle, asking first, "Why do you like it?" then she walks round a second time, asking, "When do you like it?" and a third time, asking, "Where do you like it?" From the answers she guesses what the word was. She is allowed to guess three times; if she fails each time, she pays a forfeit.

Example:

HELEN goes out of the room, and returns to guess. She asks Ada, "Why do you like it?"

ADA. Because it is pretty.

HELEN. Why do you like it, Jessy?

JESSY. Because it is so silent.

HELEN. Why do you like it, Jane?

JANE. Because mamma gave it to me.

HELEN. Why do you like it, Edith?

EDITH. Because it pleases baby.

HELEN then begins with, "When do you like it?"

ADA. When it is made of wax.

JESSY. When it is made of china.

JANE. When it is made of wood.

EDITH. When it is made of rags.

HELEN.—Where do you like it?

ADA. In the play room.

JESSY. In my lap.

JANE. In a cradle.

EDITH. In a shop.

HELEN. I can guess it, because I think only a DOLL would be made of wax, china, wood and rags.

EDITH. Yes; you are right. When did you guess what it was?

HELEN. When Ada said, "Made of wax."

EDITH. Then, as Ada told what it was, it is her turn to leave the room.

MUSICAL FRIGHT.

This is an excellent winter game, as it affords exercise and laughter for all ages.

A young lady is asked to take her place at the piano; some chairs are placed down the centre of the room, back to back, just one less in number than the players. Suppose there are twelve children to play, you place eleven chairs—ten back to back, one extra. Then the twelve children dance hand in hand round the chairs in time to the music. Suddenly—sometimes in the middle of a bar—always just when you do not expect it—the player lifts her hands off the piano. Everybody must then attempt to get a seat, and, as there are only eleven, one will, of course, be left out. She or he is then out of the game, and must sit down and watch it. Then a chair is taken away, ten being left. The players resume their dance as soon as the music begins; the moment it stops, they try to get a chair each, and one is, of course, again left out; then another chair is taken away, and the dance resumed. The game goes on, losing a player and a chair each time, till two players and one chair only are left.

Then the two dance wildly round the chair, and when the music suddenly stops, one sits down, and the other is out of the game like the rest.

To make this game more exciting, the "mamma," if it is a birthday or any special occasion, will have a box of bombons or some fruit to give to the winner—i. e., the last who gets a chair—and she will let it be sufficient for distribution by the victor.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

PER PACEM AD LUCEM.

BY ADELAIDE A. PROCTOR.

I DO not ask, oh, Lord! that life may be
A pleasant road;
I do not ask that Thou wouldst take from me
Aught of its load;
I do not ask that flowers should always spring
Beneath my feet;
I know too well the poison and the sting
Of things too sweet.
For one thing only, Lord, dear Lord! I plead:
Lead me aright—
Though strength should falter, and though heart should bleed—
Through Peace to Light.

I do not ask, oh, Lord! that Thou shouldst shed
Full radiance here;
Give me a ray of Peace, that I may tread
Without a fear.
I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see,—
Better in darkness just to feel Thy Hand,
And follow Thee.
Joy is like restless day, but peace divine
Like quiet night.
Lead me, oh, Lord! till perfect day shall shine
Through Peace to Light.

KNEELING AT THE THRESHOLD.

BY DR. THOMAS GUTHRIE.

I'M kneeling at the threshold, weary, faint and sore,
Waiting for the dawning, for the opening of the door;
Waiting till the Master shall bid me rise and come,
To the glory of His presence, to the gladness of His home!

A weary path I've travelled, 'mid darkness, storm and strife,
Bearing many a burden, struggling for my life;
But now the morn is breaking, my toil will soon be o'er;
I'm kneeling at the threshold, my hand is on the door!

Methinks I hear the voices of the blessed as they stand,
Singing in the sunshine in the far-off sinless land:
Oh, would that I were with them, amid their shining throng,
Mingling in their worship, joining in their song!

The friends that started with me have entered long ago;
One by one they left me, struggling with the foe;
Their pilgrimage was shorter, their triumph surer won,
How lovingly they'll hail me when all my toil is done!

With them the blessed angels, that know no grief or sin,
I see them by the portals, prepared to let me in;
Oh, Lord, I wait Thy pleasure; Thy time and way are best;
But I'm wasted, worn and weary; oh, Father bid me rest!

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

BY J. G. HOLLAND.

THERE'S a song in the air!
There's a star in the sky!
There's a mother's deep prayer
And a baby's low cry!
And the star reigns its fire while the Beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a king!

There's a tumult of joy
O'er the wonderful birth,
For the virgin's sweet boy
Is the Lord of the earth,
Ay! the star rains its fire and the Beautiful sing,
For the manger of Bethlehem cradles a king!

In the light of that star
Lie the ages impeared;
And the song from afar
Has swept over the world.
Every hearth is aflame, and the Beautiful sing
In the homes of the nations that Jesus is King!

We rejoice in the light,
And we echo the song
That comes down through the night
From the heavenly throng.
Ay! we shout to the lovely Evangel they bring.
And we greet in His cradle our Saviour and King!

THE OPEN WINDOW.

BY EDWARD R. SILL.

MY tower was grimly builded,
With many a bolt and bar,
"And here," I thought, "I will keep my life
From the bitter world afar."

Dark and chill was the stony floor,
Where never a sunbeam lay,
And the mould crept up on the dreary wall,
With its ghost touch, day by day.

One morn, in my sullen musings,
A flutter and cry I heard;
And close at the rusty casement
There clung a frightened bird.

Then back I flung the shutter
That was never before undone,
And I kept till its wings were rested,
The little weary one.

But in through the open window,
Which I had forgot to close,
There had burst a gush of sunshine,
And a summer scent of rose.

For all the while I had burrowed
There in my dingy tower,
Lo! the birds had sung and the leaves had danced
From hour to sunny hour.

And such balm and warmth and beauty
Come drifting in, since then,
That the window still stands open,
And shall never be shut again.—Christian Union.

LITTLE LUCY.

BY DR. WM. H. HOLCOMBE.

LITTLE Lucy, sweet and mild,
Half a fairy, half a child,
Slowly softly laid away
Underneath the fearful clay;
Kisses on her little brow;
Ah, the angels kiss her now!
Roses on her little bosom—
Her sweet self a broken blossom!

Oh, the world is cold and lone!
Little Lucy dead and gone!
Little playthings put away—
Things for tears, and not for play;
Little cradle rocked no more—
All the little prattling o'er.

Kiss her; leave her, laid away
Underneath the fearful clay;
Leave the roses on her bosom!
Kiss and leave the broken blossom!
Angel Lucy! sweet and mild!
Beauteous angels, love my child!

THE RIVER PATH.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

NO bird-song floated down the hill;
The tangled bank below was still;

No rustle from the birchen stem,
No ripple from the water's hem.

The dusk of twilight round us grew;
We felt the falling of the dew;

For, from us, ere the day was done,
The wooded hills shut out the sun.

But on the river's farthest side
We saw the hill-tops glorified—

A tender glow, exceeding fair,
A dream of day without its glare.

With us the damp, the chill, the gloom;
With them the sunset's rosy bloom;

While dark, through willowy vistas seen,
The river rolled in shade between.

From out the darkness where we trod,
We gazed upon those hills of God,

Whose light seemed not of moon or sun.
We spake not, but our thought was one.

We paused, as if from that bright shore
Beckoned our dear ones gone before;

And stilled our beating hearts to hear
The voices lost to mortal ear!

Sadden our pathway turned from night;
The hills swung open to the light;

Through their green gates the sunshine showed,
A long, slant splendor downward flowed.

Down glade and glen and bank it rolled;
It bridged the shaded streams with gold;

And, borne on piers of mist, allied
The shadowy with the sunlit side!

"So," prayed we, "when our feet draw near
The river, dark with mortal fear,

"And the night cometh ohill with dew, Oh, Father! let thy light break through!"

"So let the hills of doubt divide,
So bridge with faith the sunless tide!

"So let the eyes that fail on earth
On thy eternal hills look forth!

"And in thy beckoning angels know
The dear ones whom we loved below."

AFFECTION'S TRIBUTE.

BY E. P. SHILLABEE.

TWAS busy seed-time, yet in many a field
Labor was stayed, and those whose sturdy hands
Beckoned to thrift by timely ministries
Had left their calling, and, in decent garb,
Thronged onward where the melancholy bell
Proclaimed the doings of relentless Death,
To give their sympathy to those who mourned,
And shed, themselves, a tributary tear
For one among them who had bowed his head
To the stern summons, painfully delayed.
And then, amid the blooming sweets of spring—
The trees unfolding in the bright array
That clothes the joyous season—swept along
The sombre hearse; and the long train of those Who mourned, as relatives and friends, for him
Whose loving eyes had closed to scenes of earth
To open on the brighter ones of Heaven.
They came from far and near, tender and sad,
The last kind offices on earth to pay,
And Nature seemed to hush, and hold her breath,
As on the solemn pageant swept to where
The grave was waiting, and funeral rites.
It was no hero that they honored thus—
No statesman, scholar, bard, nor one whose voice
Had thrilled the public ear by trick of words;
Nor one who'd thrust himself before the gaze
Of crowds to win fame's meed by other means.
A simple farmer—this and nothing more—
An unpretending, plain and honest man,
With no ill brooding in his truthful heart,
And none to utter by his manly lips;
Loving the good and true, and doing good and true
In all his dealings with his fellow man.
I gazed upon the pageant, and of one
Who was of those that formed the waiting group,
I asked the meaning of the tribute shown—
Tempting the answer that I knew before:
"Why this display of grief," I said, "for him
Whose lot was cast in such a homely mould—
Why do the farmers leave their fields for this?"
He was a man uncouth—to sentiment unused—
But brushing off a tear that dimmed his eye,
He said, half sternly, "Why the fact is here;
We honor pay because we loved him so."
Ye grand and mighty, where is honor found
So glorious in its offerings as this,
That rests its giving on the simple claim
For honor's tribute that it loveth so?

THE HOME CIRCLE.

MAKING THE BEST OF THEM.

BY J. E. M'C.

"MOTHER," said Belle, "don't you ever get tired of your old things, and wish you could get something nice to wear?"

"Yes," said mother; "I saw a beautiful black grenadine go by this afternoon, plainly, but richly trimmed, with a binding of black satin on the edge of the flounce and the ruffle of the overskirt, and I thought, 'Oh, dear, if I could only afford such a dress for Sundays, how well I should like it.'"

"Did you, really, mother?" asked Belle, with a little incredulity in her tone. "I am very glad to hear it."

"Glad to know that your mother had a sinful, coveting, murmuring spirit come over her?"

"No, mother, but glad that you are tempted, as I am, and know how to appreciate it."

"It soon passed over with me."

"How did you get rid of it?"

"Prayed, my dear," said mother, in a low sweet voice.

Ah, that was mother's secret of content. It wasn't because she did not like nice, suitable clothing as well as anybody, that she wore so patiently her last year's things, and she knew it had been a hard year with the working-arm of the house, laid by for six long months. She only wondered they had got on as well as they had.

She felt she could be content with anything, now that her husband was well and able to take his old place again. But she was only human, and it was trying to live in a circle whose main business was dress, and yet feel that she must economize more closely in her own to make up their losses.

"But, come, my dear, if we cannot buy new suits, let us do the best we can with our old ones. They can be modernized and improved, until they will be at least respectable. I am glad this sensible fashion of wearing a white waist with colored skirts has come again. It is such a convenience for poor folks. We each of us have several skirts that may be made of service in this way."

A laid-off white dress was found, which made up nicely into simple Garibaldiis for home wear. The old skirts were remodelled, and came out looking very fresh and new.

"All the girls" had a pretty striped calico or percale polonaise for street wear, and as this was quite within Belle's means, she also procured a good pattern, and made up one on the sewing-machine in a single afternoon. It looked so tasteful and pretty over a dark underskirt, that both were delighted with it. Mother made up one for herself out of some plainer black-and-white striped goods, which gave an air of gentility to her dress, which is often wanting in the most costly fabrics. It is knack and good-fitting, more than expensive dresses, that makes a person look well-dressed. Mother's old black dress had a new deep flounce added to it, and the overskirt remade, and then no one could tell but it was a new dress. Old laces were looked up and freshened and brightened, until mother had the material for a handsome lace bonnet for herself and hat for Belle, with no outlay except for frames, and one simple tea-rose and buds for Belle's hat.

Nobody knew what a busy week mother and daughter had both had when they walked into church, so neatly attired, on Sabbath morning. Their minds, too, were at rest, for their work had been finished on Friday evening, so that the weariness of it should not creep over into Sunday, and spoil the day. They knew they were respectably dressed, even among their butterfly-neighbors, so they had no worrying thoughts to put them ill at ease.

"So much for making the best of what we have," thought Belle, as she returned her pretty hat to its box, and set it carefully away. "Mother is a jewel for contriving; I believe if we were rich it would take away half our pleasures."

No doubt you are right, Belle. Many have found that heaping up riches was only a heaping up of cares and sorrows.

Persons in the middle walks of life do see the most comfort. The prayer of Agur is one well worth our while to offer up every day.

A REPRESENTATIVE GIRL.

BY BIRDSEY.

THERE is a representative girl, who lives in our village, whose portrait I will try and give you. Alas, that she should be a representative girl! I think she would not, if others of the class could be made to "see themselves as others see them."

She is about sixteen, but it's not the sweet sixteen poets sing about. No poet ever put her in his verse, unless it was the one who does the grotesque valentines.

Her hair is of a strong sorrel sort, and when she goes to bed she braids it in tight plaits all over her head. In the morning she unweaves it and shakes out the snarls (combing would spoil it) and flings it to the winds. This is after breakfast. If you were to drop in at that hour you might see the young lady got up in a style that you would never forget. This is the appearance she makes for the eyes of father, brothers and sisters. Not much mention is made of mother at her home. Yet she is very useful in doing up the nice muslins and laces, and in making the most tedious parts of the many dresses needed to "go out in." Very few are required for home-wear, except there is company expected.

Her skin has a soiled look when at its freshest. She has powdered and touched it up so much with pink poisons, that a chemist could not put it right. Indeed, it would be dangerous for her to go to a chemical lecture. It might happen to her as to another young lady who attended such a place. The gases evolved turned the mineral powder she had used so plentifully, to a deep-black, to the great horror of her escort and those near her.

Her dress just now surpasses even the famous Grecian-bend. A dromedary should be proud of the distinction conferred upon him of setting this year's fashions, as the kangaroo did last. What shall it be next? Hasn't the stately elephant some good points, or the long-stepping ostrich, or maybe "our poor relation," the ourang-outang!

Still, our girl's outward appearance would be of little account, provided the mental and moral qualities were all we could desire. But that bold look ever present on her face, but most apparent of all, when in the company of strangers, gives little promise of a gentle, lovely, womanly nature.

It is this look that so astonishes, and I may say, repulses foreigners, accustomed to the modest demeanor of young girls in the higher walks of society. A brassen-faced woman is thought, across the seas, to be only of the fish-monger, or still more disreputable class. Our girls are fast degenerating in this regard. An affectation of delicacy would be even preferable to this insufferable self-assertion and disgusting boldness.

Our representative girl has sadly-unfurnished apartments in her head, for all she has been sent to school so much. Her reading is mostly of sensational newspaper stories, or even worse, and the marks of the vile type shows itself in the very expressions of her face. You cannot touch pitch, and not have the blackness betray itself.

She is coldly selfish, and looks upon little brothers and sisters as "awful plagues." She grudges money spent on them as something wrongfully taken from her; and the new baby puts her in such a huff, that she isn't pleasant for a week. She doats on beaux, and the little animation she ever shows, is in connection with some little amatory scene. Will a red revolution be needful before our girls can shake themselves from their trammels, and come out deep-hearted and noble and true as American girls once were? Let us be thankful for the noble exceptions, and pray that their numbers may be a thousand-fold increased.

A GOOD WORD.

BY J. M.

MR. SIMMONS entered the dining-room one frosty morning, with a frown on his brow. His business perplexed him, and various other worries had disturbed his sleep. He did not feel very well satisfied with himself, or any one else.

Now, because he slammed the hall-door, do you suppose his wife rattled the tea-things snappishly? Such things often follow, I know. But Mrs. Simmons had learned a more excellent way from an old-fashioned book she loved to read daily. She had tried the magic of soft answers so many times, that she knew well their powers. So she poured out the coffee cheerfully, and when the nice breakfast had begun to warm the heart as well as the frame, she said, "I am so glad you fixed that step at the back porch, Robert; it is a great convenience, and so much safer. That drain, too, from the pump, is a great deal more convenient."

It was only a little thing to say, but the appreciation made Robert's brow relax, and he spoke in a pleasanter tone, as he said, "I am glad it suits you, Hannah. I hope I shall get another half-day soon, and then I can attend to a number of other little matters about the place, that need looking after."

How small a thing had changed the current of his thoughts and feelings. Truly, "heaviness in the heart of man causeth it to stoop, but a good word maketh it glad."

Robert Simmons went about his work with a lighter heart, and a more energetic spirit for that little "good word" from the lips of his wife.

Very different would have been the case in many homes. The quick retort is there sure to follow a hasty word or act. A spark of ill-temper is quickly fanned into a flame of passion, that consumes all that makes home fair and lovely. Instead of the good word which maketh glad, all efforts to oblige are followed by fault-finding. No pleasure or gratitude is expressed or felt, but where one favor is granted, a dozen more are demanded.

Ah, any one who has even taken a peep into such a home, must agree with Solomon, that "it is better to dwell on a corner of a house-top alone" than there.

Be lavish of good words in your household, and you will add largely to the sum of the world's happiness. You will, doubtless, prolong your own life, and, certainly, you will make your presence a blessing and a joy wherever you are.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

ECONOMY AND FRUGALITY IN HOUSE-KEEPING.

WHEN frequently hear loud complaints of the cost of living, and people with all grades of incomes, the highest as well as the lowest, confess that they can only with difficulty make both ends meet. Where the trouble is it is not always possible to determine. Still there can be certain plain rules laid down which will simplify affairs. The first and most important of these is that it is not what a man earns, but what he spends, that determines whether he shall be rich or poor. The man with an income of ten thousand dollars per annum—which amount seems to a poor man a little fortune in itself—will always remain poor if his expenses run up to twelve thousand dollars, and he thus finds a balance against himself at the end of the year.

On the other hand, the man who in the weekly receipt of fifteen dollars manages to lay aside five or seven dollars, will find a competence slowly yet surely accumulating against old age or misfortune.

The French and Germans far exceed us in the art of economical living. A French family would find no difficulty in living well on the mere waste of many a single kitchen. The shreds of uncooked meat which here are considered only fit for the dogs and cats, would be transformed into delicious soup, in which waste pieces of bread would be served up. The remains of cold joints and bits of cooked meat—the refuse of the table—would appear again in appetizing croquette and paes (English, pie).

Our vanity stands quite as much in the way as our education (or rather want of education), in the matter of economical living. There are many people whose means do not really justify an extended outlay in marketing, but who would sooner confess to breaking one of the commandments than to any necessity for cheap living; and would almost as soon be caught with a stolen sheep on their backs as at a butcher's stall inquiring for low-priced pieces of beef or mutton. Yet these low-priced pieces of meat, properly prepared, are quite as nutritious and palatable as the more expensive ones.

Dr. Dio Lewis, who has recently written an article on cheap living, says that certain pieces of beef can be obtained for two cents per pound. If Dr. Lewis is correct in his statement, Boston prices must range lower than Philadelphia prices, for in this city six cents per pound is the lowest rate at which we have been able to obtain the cheapest cuts of beef. However, at the higher rate, a piece of beef weighing perhaps seven pounds, and costing forty-two cents, will make three good dinners for a family of six persons. This makes an average cost of fourteen cents per dinner for the most expensive article of the meal, or from three to six times less than a dinner of sirloin roast or broil.

Dio Lewis reduces the actually necessary cost of living down to "not much more than two dollars for ten persons for a week." He made the trial with himself for a week, and, after indulging in occasional luxuries in the way of lobster salad and Leicestershire sauce, he found the week's living cost him fifty-four and one-quarter cents. His food during the week of trial consisted largely of hulled corn, oatmeal porridge, bean porridge, soup, cracked wheat, brown bread, etc., with a little milk, molasses and sugar. He ate no butter, and indulged in but two meals a day.

We fancy his estimate of the cost of some articles is too small. Thus he talks of milk by the cent's worth and a half cent's worth. With milk at ten cents per quart, as it is with us, a cent's worth of milk would scarcely suffice a baby; so what amount would it be for a strong working man or active child?

Then, to a man weighing, on his own confession, two hundred and twelve pounds, butter may not be an essential. But with most people, and especially with growing children, butter is an important and necessary article of diet, and cannot be omitted without injury to the health. Thus in this and certain other particulars Dio Lewis's prescribed diet is one we can hardly recommend housekeepers to adopt for their families. Don Piatt, speaking of its meeting the needs of the poorly-paid clerks at Washington, says: "Here is what can be done practically where health and comfort are alone consulted. But we must add, however, that the man capable of putting this into practical operation would not be a clerk in Washington. He would have murdered the head of a bureau, and gone West to grow up with the country long since."

Speaking of cheap living for poor people, we are reminded of the remark of a working man who had given him a recipe for a "poor man's pie," which was rather insipid and unappetizing. "Poor men," said he, "like good pies as well as rich men."

Nevertheless, there are many legitimate ways, in which the cost of living may be materially reduced. If we used more unbolted flour and cornmeal in making bread and breakfast cakes, a greater variety might be given to our diet, as well as economy consulted. Eggs are often used when they might easily be omitted. Fresh, clean sweet lard is just as good as butter for cakes and pastry. Cakes and pastry might indeed be made much less frequently than they are, and fruit substituted in their stead. Soup might occasionally take the place of the boil, the roast and the broil. There is nothing so nutritious or so palatable as carefully-made soup, and it is the most economical form in which meat can be eaten. The cheapest and boniest parts of beef or mutton will do for soup, or it can be made from the liquor in which ham or fresh or salt beef has been boiled. These are a few of the many ways in which a frugal housewife can reduce the table expenses without sacrificing the health or appetites of her family.

No doubt some day we shall learn how to utilize labor and expense in housekeeping on the co-operative plan. But so far all attempts at co-operative housekeeping in this country have, we believe, proved failures. No doubt the pride to which reference was made in the early part of this article has something to do with its want of success so far as economy is concerned. Mrs. Smith would not like to send into the common kitchen the remains of yesterday's dinner to made over into pates or croquets for to-day's dinner, the bones still reserved for soup for tomorrow, while Mrs. Brown, who lived on roast beef yesterday, has roast mutton to-day, and may possibly have roast fowl to-morrow. These economies must for the present be conducted in the privacy of our own kitchens, and on days when we do not expect company, until frugality shall come into fashion.

Co-operation in all the departments of living is carried into perfect and practical operation in Germany. A recent writer speaking of that country says:

"One part of it is this, that frugality has been wonderfully systematized here; everybody helps every other to make small means go far. A German town is, so to speak, in a perpetual, unconscious conspiracy to keep prices at a low average, and to reduce at once the labor and expense of housekeeping. One kitchen fire, with perhaps a single cook, serves for thirty or more families; one housemaid for half-a-dozen; bread is not made in private houses; cooked meats, cold, are offered for sale all over the city. The scale of profits is very low, and the rate the same whether one buys one ounce or ten pounds. But it may be best to take an example in household economy: Here is a widow lady with a bright little son who goes to school. Her means are very small. She hires a flat of six rooms and a kitchen—on the fourth floor, in a well-built, handsome house, situated upon a fine street—and lets three rooms to lodgers. A servant comes in for an hour or two a day to do the chamber-work, run of errands, mop the floor of a Saturday, etc. In the morning the lady makes a cup of coffee over a spirit lamp, and with bread from the baker—good, honest bread—has a light breakfast, after the German fashion. At noon she procures a dinner ready cooked and hot from an establishment in the same building which makes a business of supplying families in that way. At this place just one dinner, but large enough to be divided among many families, is prepared each day. All who purchase there on a given day have the same fare, but something different the next day, and so on. In this way the business is simplified to the utmost; the least amount of labor is required; there is no waste of food, prepared for all supposable tastes, and left uncalled for. At supper our widow may supply herself with bread and butter, a slice or two of cold meat, a tart or the like, etc., at a very light expense. So she lives respectably, in clean, well-kept rooms; has no fire in the kitchen for a week; enjoys much leisure each day, and pays for all by a bit of money. It is to be observed, too, that she is not to be banished to some obscure, disagreeable part of the town, but lives on a handsome street, elevated, and airy, among the pleasantest in the whole city.

"It is this kind of thing which renders German civilization possible. The fact is not merely that the art of household economy has been studied, but no one is left to practice it alone; the whole community is one great alliance to render housekeeping easy and inexpensive, and thereby to enhance the practical value of small means. And perhaps this is one of the chief reasons—to judge from my observation thus far—there is less of abject, soul-crushing poverty in all the German cities put together than in a single ward of London or New York."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE MARBLE PROPHET, and other Poems. By J. G. Holland, author of "Bitter-Sweet," etc. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co.

This volume is a collection of short poems by one of our best American essayists and poets. The first, from which the volume takes its name, describes the Laocoon, and calls it

"A voice from out the world's experience,
Speaking of all the generations past
To all the generations yet to come
Of the long struggle, the sublime despair,
The wild and weary agony of men!"

The volume is in every respect such as will gratify a refined and critical taste.

PRIZES PAID TO EXPERIENCE. Incidents in my Business Life. By Edward Garrett, author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead.

Sensational novels and novels of lax morality are so the order of the day, that some of our best writers even feel themselves bound to pander to the false taste of the public, which demands this class of literature. Therefore, it is especially refreshing to one who has read to satiety works of this character, to be able to take up a volume which shall possess in no degree any of these characteristics, but which still ranks among the very highest in point of literary excellence and interest. It is a story of Scotch people, written in an autobiographical form, and in a plain, straightforward manner, and is full of lessons of practical wisdom.

TRAVELS IN SOUTH AFRICA. Compiled and arranged by Bayard Taylor. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co.

The "Library of Travel, Exploration and Adventure," in the course of publication by Scribner, Armstrong & Co., is one of exceeding value. It brings into form for popular reading, a great deal of information that is contained in more ponderous volumes, and which, for lack of time or means, is beyond the reach of the ordinary reader. In this volume are condensed the narratives of Moffat, Livingstone, Anderson and Magyon, whose travels extended through different sections of the southern part of Africa.

GAVROCHE. The Gamin of Paris. From "Les Misérables" of Victor Hugo. Translated and adapted by M. C. Pyle, author of "Minna in Wonderland," etc. Philadelphia: Porter & Coates.

One of the most interesting characters in Hugo's masterpiece is little Gavroche, the gamin of Paris. It is a happy thought to rescue this character from the numerous company among which he plays a comparatively insignificant part, and makes his story a continuous and complete one. The translating is done with tolerable ability, though now and then it might be somewhat improved.

THE LITTLE SANCTUARY, and other Meditations. By Alexander Raleigh, D.D., author of "Quiet Resting-Places," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead.

This volume is a collection of sermons and essays—meditations, their author has pleased to call them—for which certain passages of Scripture furnish the subjects. They are written in a finished style, and are both pleasant and profitable religious reading.

DRIPS OF WATER. Poems. By Ella Wheeler. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House.

This is a collection of stirring Temperance poems, by an author whose name is already familiar to the public through the medium of newspapers and periodicals. Some of these poems have already appeared in the public prints, while others now see the light for the first time. The publishers of this work suggest that this volume is "peculiarly adapted to public readings in lodge-rooms, divisions, and other meetings, and will afford greater variety of entertainment under the 'Good of the Order' than was before offered by the same money." For sale in Philadelphia by Garrigue & Co.

THE FIRE-FIGHTERS. By Mrs. J. E. McConaughey, author of "The Hard Master." New York: The National Temperance Society and Publishing House.

This is an excellent Temperance story, by one of our best moral and domestic writers. Mrs. McConaughey is a woman who sees people and things from a common-sense and practical point of view, and a work from her pen should be productive of much good. For sale in Philadelphia by Garrigue & Co.

PICKED UP ADRIFT. By Prof. James de Mille, author of "The B. O. W. C." Boston: Lee & Shepard.

THE CHILD OF THE ISLAND GLEN. By Elijah Kellogg, author of "Lion Ban of Elm Island," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

The first of these two books is the fifth volume of the "B. O. W. C." series, and the second the fourth volume of the "Pleasant Cove" series, two sets of juvenile books, intended especially for boys, but read by a large number of maturer age. They are both entertaining and profitable reading.

EVA'S ENGAGEMENT-RING. By Margaret E. Wilmer. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House.

Most Temperance stories deal especially with drunkenness and its immediate results. This story attempts to show the evils and dangers of moderate drinkers, which is the first stage of drunkenness. It is a book which should be widely circulated by Temperance people. For sale in Philadelphia by Garrigue & Co.

OLIVE VARCOE. By Francis Dorrick. Boston: Loring.

An English novel of no special merit or demerit, which may serve to while away an idle evening.

TOTAL ABSTAINER'S DAILY WITNESS AND BIBLE VERDICT. Compiled by W. C. Greene. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House.

This is intended to hang upon the walls of either lodge-rooms or private houses. It contains pages corresponding in number to the days in a month, each page containing a number of texts of Scripture, relating to some special phase of Temperance question.—It is all ready for hanging, being fastened on a stick, with a cord attached.

THE STANDARD. A collection of Sacred and Secular Music for Choirs, Conventions, Singing-schools, etc. By L. O. Emerson and H. R. Palmer. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

It is but a few years since Mr. L. O. Emerson appeared before the public with his "Harp of Judah," a Church Music Book, that speedily found its way to church choirs and singing-schools. The "Harp" was a great success, and was followed in due time by "The Jubilate" and "The Choral Tribute," both popular books. In the meantime another genius of somewhat similar experience had arisen in the West, and the two were naturally attracted, by mutual taste and interest, toward the compilation of a book that should represent their united capacity. Such a book is the "Standard," by L. O. Emerson, of Boston, and H. R. Palmer, of Chicago. It has, in addition to sacred music, quite a large collection of easy glees and songs, suitable for practice in schools and rehearsals. The "Standard" has four hundred pages, and being so large and well-filled, is cheap at $1.15 (the price by the dozen), or at $1.25, the price for which specimen copies are mailed, post paid.

HOBBS'S ARCHITECTURE. By Isaac H. Hobbs and Son, Architects. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

There is probably no study more neglected, and no one which, at the same time, deserves more general attention than that of architecture. The rude, unsightly and inconvenient houses, which are to be seen all over the country, attest to this fact. We do not ask or expect that every man and woman should master the science of Architecture in all its branches and departments, but that every one should render him or herself familiar with its elementary principles, so that he or she, if occasion presents, shall be able to design a house in which there shall be no glaring incongruities either in inside construction or outside appearance. Beauty is not a thing of price. The humblest dwelling in the land can be made attractive if its builders and inmates possess a properly cultivated taste. There is no surer method of acquiring this taste than by the study of books of architectural drawings. The book before us is one that we can recommend to the general reader, no less than to the professional builder. It contains a great number of designs and ground-plans for suburban and rural villas and cottages, prefaced by general rules for correct architecture. It is not every one who would care to build so expensive a house as the most of those illustrated in the book are. Nevertheless, the plans and drawings may be studied with profit, as their study will surely result in a knowledge of general principles, and in a familiarity with and appreciation of the beautiful.

SPARKLING RUMORS. A choice collection of new Sunday-school Music. By Asa Hull and H. Saunders. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

Mr. Hull, one of the editors of this little work, has previously appeared before the public as compiler of "Casket No. 1" and "Casket No. 2," very acceptable Sunday-school Song Books. These names, perhaps, suggested the pretty title above, as "Rubies" may very properly belong with "Caskets" of gems. The book contains one hundred and sixty pages, and about one hundred and forty songs.

GENS OF STRAUSS. A choice collection of Dance Music. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

The Boston Globe says of this fine book: "Its remarkably low price, and the effective, but by no means difficult arrangement of the music, will render it a lively and welcome companion." There are in the collection perhaps seventy-five pieces, including the new and favorite Manhattan Waltzes, and the New Annen, Lovely Vienna, Morgenblätter, Marriage-Bells, and other waltzes, polkas, quadrilles, etc., which have risen to increased popularity in consequence of the perfect performances of them, under the direction of the great director and composer.

THE PILGRIM'S HARP. A choice collection of Sacred Music, for Social and Family Worship. By Asa Hull. Boston: Oliver Ditson & Co.

We have received from the publishers the above little work, which seems to be well adapted for use in social and family worship. Its peculiar merit is in its size and skillful arrangement. It may easily be carried in the pocket, yet it contains about two hundred and fifty tunes and hymns. The department of Spiritual Songs is very rich and complete, and yet there is room for more than a hundred metrical tunes, including, it would seem, nearly all in common use for congregational singing.

THE YOUNG DODGE CLUB. The Seven Hills. By Prof. James de Mille, author of "The B. O. W. C.," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

The four lads who compose the Young Dodge Club become acquainted with Rome; its people, with their habits and customs, its ruins, and its wonders of all sorts. In the volume the reader learns many a lesson in geography, disguised in narrative and adventure.

MRS. FOLLEN'S TWILIGHT STORIES. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

We have received twelve volumes of juvenile books, neatly inclosed in a box, called "Mrs. Follen's Twilight Stories." There could be no prettier set of stories and poems for the little ones than these. The titles of the different volumes are: "About Dogs and Cats," "Made-up Stories," "Peddler of Dust-Sticks," "When I was a Girl," "Who Spoke Next?" "The Talkative Pig," "Travellers' Stories," "What Animals Do and Say," "Two Festivals," "Conscience," "Pecioliasimo," and "Little Songs."

THE POLYPHONIC. A collection of Music for Schools, Classes and Clubs. Compiled and written by U. C. Burnap and Dr. W. J. Wetmore. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.

THE ATHENÆUM. A collection of Part-Songs, for Ladies' Voices. Arranged and written by U. C. Burnap and Dr. W. J. Wetmore. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co.

These two volumes are among the best for popular, school and family use we have ever had the pleasure of examining. In many cases the airs are adapted from the opera, and set to appropriate words. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

THE CHILDREN'S TREASURE. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

THE INFANT'S DELINQUENCY. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

Two very pretty little books, filled with plain and colored pictures, the latter just suited to the needs and tastes of children just learning to read; the former intended for those of somewhat larger growth.

PACKINGTON PARISH, and What Happened In It; and the Diver's Daughter. By M. A. Paull, author of "Tim's Troubles," etc. New York: The National Temperance Society and Publication House.

This story should do good service in the Temperance cause. It describes a parish without an ale-house, and its subsequent condition when, with the approval of the clergyman and other leading men, one was established. It shows the evil effects of rum-selling and rum-drinking in their most favorable aspects, when every guard has been thrown around them to prevent, as far as possible, the harm which usually arises from them. This book is for sale in Philadelphia by J. C. Garrigues & Co.

COMFORTED. By the Author of "Talks with a Child on the Beatitudes," and "Talk with a Philosopher on the Ways of God to Man." Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

This little book, written for the comfort of those who have lost children, first appeared in the "HOME MAGAZINE." It is now issued in a very neat volume.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH. Illustrated. With a Biographical Memoir and Notes on the Poems. Edited by Bolton Corney. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

A handsome illustrated volume in green and gold, just suited for a gift-book. Goldsmith will always be a favorite with lovers of poetry.

WONDERS OF THE MOON. Illustrated with forty-three engravings. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co.

WONDERS OF THE YELLOWSTONE. Edited by James Richardson. Illustrated with seventeen engravings. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co.

Two more volumes in the publisher's valuable series of books known as "The Illustrated Library of Exploration and Adventure," and "The Illustrated Library of Wonders." In the first of these books, all that astronomy has revealed in regard to the moon's surface is given to the reader in popular language. In the other, we have full descriptions, with pictorial illustrations, of that marvellous Yellowstone region, which has recently attracted so much attention. The two volumes will make acceptable additions to every home and school library.

JOHNSON'S PHILOSOPHY, and Keys to Philosophical Charts. Illustrated with 500 cuts—being reduced photographic copies of all the Diagrams contained in the Author's Philosophical Series of Indestructible School Charts. For the use of Schools and Families. By Frank G. Johnson, A.M., M.D. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co. 494 pp.

In the special study of natural philosophy, we know of no manual more useful to the student than this. The author seems to have left no question unanswered, no problem without an illustration. A copious and well-arranged table of contents enables the reader to consult the volume on any subject with ease and certainty. To give an idea of the completeness of the table as a means of reference, we make from it a single extract, only omitting the pages and number of paragraphs and illustrations. There are nearly a thousand paragraphs, each embracing a distinct subject, or branch of a subject. Let us take, under the head of "Acoustics," the "Production and Propagation of Sound." The table of contents reads: "Definition—Sonorous or Sounding bodies—Mediums—Sound or Sensation—Different Sounds—Sonorous difference of bodies—Time is required for the transmission of Sound—Calculation of distances by Sound—Velocity of all sounds the same—Velocity of Sound in air—Velocity of Sound in different gases and vapors—Velocity of Sound in liquids—Velocity of Sound in solids—Time required to distinguish Sound."

DOLLINGER'S FABLES AND PROPHECIES OF THE MIDDLE AGES. Edited by Prof. H. B. Smith, D.D. New York: Dodd & Mead.

This is a work of great research, and throws light on some interesting questions of Church history. Perhaps the most important essay in it is that in which Dr. Dollinger demonstrates the purely fabulous character of the story of a female pope. Thus, like Pocahontas, Pope Joan is remorselessly consigned to the realm of myth, and Protestants are compelled to own that, in their war against the dogma of the Apostolic Succession, this story of shame is no longer available. Skeptical as we are concerning the dogma, we rejoice that it is relieved of the odium of this revolting fable.

We have received a little pamphlet by an anonymous author, entitled "The Most Holy Hebrew Law. The Only Righteous Standard of Morals." It seems composed mainly of selections from both the Old and New Testament.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

MISS EMILY FAITHFUL.

AMONG the foreign celebrities who are now visiting us, there is no one who is deserving of, or who will receive a heartier welcome than Miss Emily Faithful. Though this lady can scarcely be considered a typical English woman—as she probably possesses more intelligence, energy and independence than the generality of her sisters—she may yet be called a representative woman of the day.

Miss Faithful's life and efforts have been given to the amelioration of the condition of laboring women. A number of years ago she established the Victoria Printing Press, with the intention of furnishing employment to women as compositors. The excellence of her work as a printer won her a medal at the International Exhibition. It was also recognized by the queen, and she was appointed "Printer and Publisher in Ordinary" to her majesty. A few years later, the press passing into other hands, she established the Victoria Magazine, which she still publishes, and in which the needs of women are earnestly advocated, and their wrongs as earnestly denounced.

Miss Faithful's visit to this country has a semi-official character. She comes for the purpose of examining into the condition of the laboring women and children of America, especially those employed in factories. This undertaking, without being actually authorized by the English Government, is yet approved by it; and she brings with her a letter from Lord Granville to the British Minister at Washington, asking him to do all he can to assist her in her purpose.

We are glad to see that the press generally, irrespective of political or social creeds, are giving Miss Faithful a hearty welcome. A New York paper speaks of her as "one of those rare women who have the ability to plan and execute a business." This is rather hard on women in general, seeing that when they possess the same opportunities, which education and capital give, they usually succeed quite as well in business as men. But, in recognising the desire to compliment Miss Faithful, we are willing to overlook the, no doubt, unintentional slight to other business women.

Miss Faithful has come prepared to lecture before the American people. She is an exceedingly pleasing speaker, and the subjects of her lectures are of a character likely to interest and instruct her hearers. Among them are the following: "The English Aristocracy—its Position, Influence and Habits," "Middle Classes in England, Past and Present," "The Telling Masses of the Old Country," "Queen Victoria and the Royal Family."

The lecture, however, which is probably her favorite one, as it touches closely matters she has so much at heart, is "Movements Relating to Women." In this lecture she argues that the old boundary-lines which divided women from men in fields of labor, must be done away with. Science, in the invention and construction of machinery, has deprived women of most employments, which they could consider as exclusively their own. Therefore, as women must live, if they would live honestly, they must not shrink from coming in competition with men. If it ever was intended that women were to be dependent upon men, that state of society has passed away, as any one who examines the census returns will at once discover, in the superabundance of women over men in all old-settled countries. And, as the relations of the two sexes have altered, and are altering still more, it is necessary that the conditions of female life should alter also. Her lecture is a very able one—its whole spirit being an earnest protest against idleness and frivolity in women, and an equally earnest plea that the doors of remunerative employment shall be opened wide for her.

OUR NOBLE COMMONWEALTH!

IN its last Presentment, the Grand Inquest of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, "inquiring in and for the City and County of Philadelphia," says:

"The Grand Inquest also avails this opportunity for seriously urging a thorough revision and alteration of the laws of the Commonwealth regulating the licensing of taverns, inns, restaurants, and the sale of spirituous and fermented liquors.

"The good old time is within the recollection of some of us when the practice of licensing the sale of intoxicating beverages was confined to taverns and inns, for the accommodation of travellers; but now it has become the settled policy of the State to grant licenses to all applicants, without much discrimination, and it is made the source of a large revenue to the Commonwealth—the number of licensed and unlicensed houses in the city being nearly ten thousand—the half of which are called tipping shops, and the fees or tax paid to the Commonwealth ranging from fifty dollars to five hundred dollars each. Thus this State, standing as she is presumed to be, in loco parentis, becomes the most unnatural parent to her citizens by creating and fostering the most prolific source of demoralization, disease, debauchery and crime. What a thrilling sensation it might occasion among the audiences, and how appalling it might be to the nerves of a thoughtful and sensitive legislator, who accidentally presented himself in court while a criminal was being arraigned, and called upon to plead to an indictment for murder, if he were heard to mutter from his pallid lips a tremulous cry—'Licensed liquor—the Commonwealth is my accuser, my judge, and the accomplice of my crime—be the Commonwealth my avenger!'"

Comment on this is needless. Let every citizen of our noble Commonwealth (?) take it to heart, and ponder it well. The responsibility lies at the door of each man who does not do his best for the suppression of an evil that has grown, under the sanction of law, to a frightful magnitude.

A FACT CONTAINING A SUGGESTION.

IN several of the large cities of our country an active benevolence led, during the summer, to the conveyance of large numbers of poor children out into the open country for a day's holiday. By this means vast number of little ones, who otherwise might not have been able to set foot outside the city streets, were enabled to breathe fresh air, and spend at least one day in the season in delightful, healthful, harmless recreation.

But in Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, they have gone further than this. When the hot weather sets in the railways and lines of steamers are filled with young travellers, who receive free passages to various points in the country, where mansions, rectories and farm-houses are thrown open to receive them, and where they are made welcome guests. In these snug country-places they remain two or three weeks, living on the best of country fare and taking part in active rustic sports. And when the end of their holiday is reached, they go back to their crowded city-homes ruddy and sunburnt, and with renewed life and vigor, bearing grateful and pleasant memories in their hearts, and, no doubt, eagerly looking forward to the next summer for a return of the only bright spot the year affords them.

For fifteen or twenty years this giving a lengthened summer holiday to the poor children of Copenhagen has been a regular thing, and all concerned in it have vied each with another in making it successful. The suggestion which this fact conveys we leave to our readers.

SELF-CULTURE.

DR. H. C. WOOD, in an address made on the occasion of laying the corner-stone for the new buildings about to be erected in this city for the Academy of Natural Sciences, gave utterance to a few sentences that are full of significance. He said

There has been made recently, in this city, and, indeed, there is still being made, an effort to put the University of Pennsylvania on a wider footing. Far be it from us to dampen the ardor or throw aught in the way of those who are carrying out this work, feeling, as we do, to the very heart, that our city has now a university the peer of any in the land. But none the less do we assert that there is a deeper, a higher, a more profound culture than any university can give.

This is the self-culture of the true scholar, to which a university at best can but lay the foundation. The highest culture must be forever self-culture. A man may be aided by others up to a certain point—into the unknown he must travel alone. Aye, more than this, before he reaches that unknown he must for himself trace out the obscure, unfrequented paths which mark the outlying regions of uncertainty in knowledge.

It is to afford opportunity for this self-culture that the Academy of Natural Sciences exists. There are but few men whom destiny has marked for such a course. The study halls of the academy must always be for the few—but the work of the few is the life of the nation. I must assert, then, the pre-eminent claims for such institutions as our academy. Why, the old academy is the gymnasium in which men train themselves for professorships in the universities. There is a class of medical men who are, I believe, almost exclusively of Anglo-Saxon parentage—men who, in their early professional life, study deeply the natural sciences, and who often through life add to the practical duties of their profession of investigations of natural history. I do not remember a single great name of such a character in Continental Europe.

Yet, in England, the brightest lights of the profession—the Hunters, Coopers, Brodies, Reids, Billes, Beales, Pagets, etc.—the foremost medical thinkers, leaders and practitioners of their days, have been of this character—students of natural history who have applied the methods and facts of their sister science to their profession, and thereby climbed to their proud pre-eminence. In our own city the names of Rush, Morton, Harlan, Wood, and some about us, mark our Anglo-Saxon origin. And, indeed, it is chiefly through such men that the great renown of our city, as a medical centre, was acquired. Speaking for this class of men, I would say to the citizens of Philadelphia, as they value the fair name of their city, as they respect and honor that profession into whose keeping they place all that is dearest to them, as they hope for skilful rescue when life is in peril, to see to it that men of this character are not deprived of their opportunities for culture and growth.

"THE RASCALS OF WALL STREET."

THIS is the appropriate title of an article in Scribner for December, in which the editor deals with certain money-gamblers of Wall street in no uncertain way. We hail such an article as another of the good signs of the times. Rings, and combinations to swindle the public are attracting more and more attention, and honest men will not much longer tolerate them. They exist only through the timidity, venality or indifference of the press. As long as the press was tolerant or silent, the great "Tammany Ring" of New York went on robbing the people out of millions annually. But when the press told the people the real truth, they aroused themselves, and the Ring was broken. So it will be in all other cases. If the press does its duty fearlessly, wrong must go down.

Let language like the following, spoken of a few Wall street gamblers who recently created a money panic in order to rob the weak and unfortunate, be everywhere used by the press, and public sentiment will become an irresistible power. We quote from the article referred to above:

"Now, what are we to say of these men, and how are they to be regarded? That they have committed a great and unprovoked outrage upon the community, there is no question. They have robbed the rich, they have destroyed the weak, they have distressed the poor, they have obstructed the public prosperity, they have clogged the wheels of the national industry, and all for the purpose of forcing an unearned current of profit into their own pockets, already gorged by gains questionably gotten.

"If this is not an outrage and robbery in the eyes of the law, it is not because it is not both of these in the eyes of all honest men through whose pure, clear vision God sends his own look through the world. In a community where tricks of this sort are not uncommon, the tendency is to become blind to their moral aspects. Indeed, there is a kind of admiration of these gigantic swindles, and the bold, bad men who stand behind them. Instead of turning the back upon them as rascals, who have hopelessly disgraced and blackened themselves, a very low bow is made to them, or to the power they bear. Instead of counting them out of respectable society, affiliation with them is deemed desirable, and their position is regarded as one to be coveted. Wall street holds a thousand men who would be glad to do just what these men have done. We are having all the time corners in money, corners in stocks, corners in grain, corners in everything. The largest and worst gambling-hell in the United States is Wall street, and the games played there—not one whit better than those which are played at Baden, or Monaco, or Saratoga—are more dangerous than all, because they are carried on under the protection of the law. We have no protection from them except in arousing the moral sense of the community against them, and in the social proscription of all engaged in them. These men are not beyond shame. They do not like to stand alone; but so long as their power is courted, and their society sought by those who lay claim to decency—so long as their acuteness is admired, and their success coveted, the whole community is at their mercy, whose tenderest quality is unmitigated cruelty."

A COMMENDABLE WORK.

IN the following item there is an excellent suggestion of means and ways by which great good can be accomplished in a quiet and unostentatious manner. In every community there are neglected children, both girls and boys, who might, in a similar manner, be brought under good influences, and, if not trained to ways of usefulness and virtue, at least, have implanted in their hearts a desire for something in life nobler and better than that which they already know:

"A lady in one of the cities of this State has been quietly engaged in a novel piece of usefulness. Noting the disorderly Irish boys of the vicinity, she organized them to the number of some fifty or more in two classes, or clubs, for improvement. The object is not so much study as the improvement of character and conduct. They meet on stated evenings of each week. They have certain improving exercises, and regular organization, privileges of books, sight-seeing, and the favor of the teacher, and the penalties of exclusion from the charmed circle, constitute the staple of governing the little association. They meet and have a genuinely good time. The voice and presence of their charming teacher make alone a high school of real progress. The experiment works like a charm. The applicants are more than can be admitted. Already order, decorum, respect, and an appetite for improvement have seized the once brutal neighborhood, and the seeds of a noble manhood are fast being sown in many a sensitive heart."

TEA-PARTIES vs. POLITICS.

MRS. MIRIAM M. COLE, who writes very readable letters to the Woman's Journal, expresses her opinion regarding the harmlessness of tea-parties in picking to pieces and destroying personal character, when compared with the capacity of political meetings in that direction. She writes in the following pertinent and lively strain:

"It has been said of old that one tea-party is quite sufficient to destroy all the characters in the neighborhood. Its legitimate use in social life being to suspect the virtuous, to ferret out past follies: in short, to dissect soul and body. Men have grown self-righteous when commenting upon this peculiar feminine institution, the tea-party—they have been as thankful as a certain Pharisee, when frowning upon the malicious gossip supposed to make those assemblies lively and interesting. In consequence of this, I, for one, have been extremely sensitive about the feminine festivity, and, when fortune favored me with an invitation to one, I mentioned the fact apologetically, with eyes cast down. But I lift them now and forever, and say to the universal man that all the tea-drinkings, quiltings and sewing-circles that ever happened in the world, simmered down into one, would not, could not contain the venom, the falsehood, the misinterpretations that one political meeting has developed during this campaign! It is doubtful if the Angel Gabriel could go through this siege without serious damage to his pinions! It did not occur to Milton, but it does to me, that possibly it was a presidential contest that unseated Lucifer!"

DISAGREEABLE PEOPLE.

THEIR name is legion; but all are narrow and selfish. They are ill-natured, or have some weak habit to indulge. Petty tyrants often, who take pleasure in opposition, exaction and annoyance. Among these may be classed the "objection-maker." You can propose nothing, no matter how simple or unimportant, to which opposition is not made. To live with one of these is to have all the heart taken out of you. "It may be observed," says Arthur Help, "that those persons have a more worn, jaded and dispirited look than any others, who have to live with people who make difficulties on every occasion, great or small. It is astonishing to see how this practice of making difficulties grows into a confirmed habit of mind, and what disheartenment it occasions. The savor of life is taken out of it when you know that nothing you propose, or do, or suggest—hope for or endeavor—will meet with any response but an enumeration of the difficulties that will lie in the path you wish to travel."

"PIPSISSIWAY POTTS."

"THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD," Pipsissway's new series of articles, opens in the old vein, and we do not see that her failure to get "Deacon Skiles" has in anything taken the vim out of the dear old spinster. Indeed, both our readers and ourselves feel specially indebted to "that old one-sided, cross-eyed, homely Rhoda Bowles, the arid mink!" for marrying the deacon, and so taking temptation out of Pipssey's way. Human nature is weak—and Pipssey is human.

A letter from Pipssey looks up at us from the table, and says, "Don't keep everything she has been saying to you all to yourself. Tell a little of what she has been telling you to her thousands of friends. They will like to hear it."

Well, Pipssey is human, as we have just said, and here is a touch of her humanity—which is very sweet and tender and loving and strong—a glimpse of her real self:

"Oh, I get such good letters from everywhere, loving and blessing and thanking me, until I cry right out. Letters from women who are my superiors in every respect, saying that the 'Windows' have comforted and cheered them, and done them so much good, and begging of me not to stop writing them. 'Brother Jenkins' called early this morning with a message from the 'Reserve,' where he has been preaching—good words from women who used to pat my white head thirty years ago at church. He said he saw a 'pile of ARTHUR's three feet high' where he tarried. Last week a letter from a middle-aged and practical woman, a subscriber of your's for twelve years—a letter of eight full pages, with never a mistake in it—asking questions on subjects that I could not touch publicly, giving suggestions that are invaluable, telling me many things, and cheering me wonderfully."

When a chord of human nature is struck, how quickly the answering chords respond! If we were to send Pipssey half the letters we receive about her, we fear there would be no more "Windows" nor "Deacon's Households" for our readers, for they would keep her crying or laughing all the while. We have a long letter about the "Windows," from a lady out West, that we tried to get in this month and last, but could not find the room. We'll make a place for it next month, if other good things don't crowd it out again.

DON'T MAKE ENEMIES.

"NEVER make an enemy even of a dog," is a wise admonition. Too many young men, just starting in life, who feel great self-confidence, are apt to do, or resent disagreeable things. To be quick to give or take offence—enmities thus created are often life-long injuries. Many a man's prospects have been sadly marred by such things. There is a mutual independence and a community of good offices, that cannot be ignored. He who does so puts hindrances in his own way—hindrances that may, in some after-crisis of his affairs rise up into impassable mountains. Make all the friends you can, but beware of enemies—so long as one exists you are in danger.

DO METALS GROW?

RECENT chemical experiments in England favor the theory that metals are in the continual process of formation; that chemical action and vital forces are all the time at work, eliminating metals and depositing them in the form of ores. Corroborative evidence is claimed to be found in the abandoned silver mines of Mexico and Peru. The long-disused galleries of the workings are frequently found encrusted with filiated threads of silver, which it is certain could not have been there when the mines were abandoned. According to this new idea of the constant creation of metallic substances, the earth is a vast laboratory, constantly at work and constantly producing. It is now believed that these late English experiments will demonstrate that low grades of ochre may be so treated as to be made to yield up their treasures by new processes, into which electricity will largely enter.

"THE CHILDREN'S HOUR."

WE call the attention of such of our readers as have children from "five to fifteen" to our Magazine for the younger members of the family. We claim for it an excellence, a moral purpose, and an adaptation to young minds, peculiarly its own. We are sure that it will not only deeply interest your children, but do them good. See prospectus.

VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND

MISS TOWNSEND, who has for so many years delighted the readers of the HOME MAGAZINE, gives, in this number, the first of a series of articles on social and literary topics connected with American life and celebrity, that promise to be of unusual spirit and interest. Don't fail to read "DAYS AT LEXINGTON," the initial paper of the series.

PUBLISHER'S DEPARTMENT.

The HOME MAGAZINE takes, with this number, its "new departure" for a higher level and a broader field. For twenty years, as we said in closing the last volume, it has been visiting the people all over the land, and seeking to establish itself in their homes as a power for good—seeking to make hearts purer and happier. But it had limitations, which are now pushed aside. Hereafter it will take the form of our own kind of what a magazine for American homes should be.

Our readers will find the present number one of great excellence and interest, a promise of the good things to come.

FREE TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER FOR 1873!

If anything sweeter, lovelier, or more attractive than "THE CHRISTIAN GRACES" has yet appeared in this particular field of art it has not been our good fortune to see it. There have been innumerable single figures of Faith, Hope and Charity, and groups of Faith and Hope; but this is, we believe, the only first-class picture in which CHARITY, "the greatest of these," comes in as the central figure, and in a group of ideal faces of the loveliest type, shines sweetest and loveliest of them all—a fitting representative of our time, when Charity is coming forward and taking her true place as the first and greatest of Christian virtues.

How it is Received.—Every day brings us letters expressing delight and satisfaction with this charming picture. We make a few extracts:

A subscriber writes: "I have received your picture, and consider it a marvel of beauty."

From an editor who received a copy, we have the following: "I have received the exquisitely beautiful picture, 'The Christian Graces,' but I am sorry to say that, unfortunately, in taking it from the roller, not knowing what it was, and hence less careful than I would have been, I tore it badly; indeed, ruined it for framing. The girls mourned almost to tears at the mishap. Send me another, and I will give it as handsome a notice as the English language will admit of." Another copy has been sent.

A lady writes: "Allow me the pleasure of thanking you for the beautiful picture, 'The Christian Graces.' It is a far nicer picture than I expected, and is worthy a place in every home in the land. I am anxious to procure another copy."

From another: "Owing to the kindness of some friend, we are in receipt of one of your beautiful engravings, 'The Christian Graces.' Desiring that others may become the possessor of such a fine and exquisite work of art, we would like you to send your 'agents' confidential circular."

A subscriber at Catasauque, Pa., writes: "Please accept my thanks for the beautiful present, 'The Christian Graces,' this day received. The picture surpasses my expectations, and your kindness will be gratefully remembered."

"Simply exquisite," says another, a lady of fine taste, an author of wide celebrity.

Another lady, writing to the editor, says: "And now what shall I say to you respecting the picture you sent me? The design and execution are faultless. Its beauty grows upon one, while the perfection of the grouping of the figures, the inimitable lightness and transparency of the graceful drapery, and the loveliness of the lilies that have sprung up under their feet, make of this picture of the 'Christian Graces' one of the most desirable ornaments for the house that I have ever seen. In this day of gaudy chromos, so fine an engraving is a positive rest to the eye."

Rosella Rice says: "Every one is delighted with the 'Graces.' It is the finest picture I ever saw."

To Club-Getters.

Some of our club-getters have written to ask if "THE ANGEL OF PEACE," "BED-TIME" or "THE WEAR OF IMMORTALS," would be sent free to subscribers, in place of "THE CHRISTIAN GRACES," if desired. We answer yes. A choice of either of these pictures can be made.

ADVERTISERS' DEPARTMENT.

CARPETINGS.—Take notice of advertisement of G. B. Snyder & Co., on first page of this issue. We can recommend this house to parties wishing to purchase goods in their line. They will always be waited upon courteously, whether purchasing or not. They have always on hand a large and well-selected stock of the newest and best patterns of rich colors, and the goods will be as represented. They also give a liberal discount to churches and clergymen.

CONSCIENCE OR NO CONSCIENCE.—You can sleep comfortably if you have The People's Spring Bed-Bottom. This is guaranteed to purchasers. Read advertisement on fifth page, front of this Magazine, and then, if you still hesitate to send an order, send for a circular, and see how the leading furniture dealers of Philadelphia and their customers commend it.

THE SOLAR GAS GENERATOR. We believe to be the best apparatus for making Gas from Gasoline now in use. There is scarcely any want in our suburban and rural districts more universally and more deeply felt than that of a cheap and safe illuminating gas. The use of kerosene lamps has come to be considered a perpetual menace to life and property. The apparatus now offered to the public is simple, durable, and entirely and unquestionably safe. Insurance companies reduce their rates upon the substitution of this method of lighting for kerosene lamps. The Generators are in all cases placed outside of the building to be lighted—generally in an underground vault—the air-pump only being within the house for convenience of winding. The reservoir does not require replenishing more than once or twice a year. This apparatus is specially adapted to dwelling-houses, hotels, manufactories and public buildings, ranging in capacity from ten to one thousand or more lights.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS, no better Holiday Present could be selected than a Microscope, with a box of prepared specimens, illustrating the wonders of the vegetable and animal kingdoms. JAMES W. QUINN & Co., 324 Chestnut Street, have them in great variety, and so simple as to be adapted to the comprehension of the smallest child, costing but a trifle, and affording an endless source of amusement and instruction. For those of riper years a Stereoscope, with views of our own and foreign lands; or the New Graphoscope, with very large photographs from every clime; or a fine Opera Glass, or Gold Spectacles, or Eye Glasses, will form a very appropriate and desirable present. An hour or two cannot be more profitably or pleasantly spent than in examining the immense and varied stock of Messrs. QUINN & Co.; and they cordially invite all whether intending purchases or not, to call and look over their goods now displayed for the Holiday season.

NUTRINA, the cheapest and best preparation of wheat extant. Far more digestible, palatable, and nutritious than wheaten grits or crushed wheat. Can be cooked in one-fourth the time, and is warranted to keep fresh and sweet in all seasons and climates. Sold by all first-class Grocers. Manufactured only by the Nutrie Manufacturing Co., 1520 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.—We take pleasure in calling the attention of our readers to William Mann's advertisement in this number. Having lately removed to his new store, 523 Market Street, he has greatly increased facilities for furnishing everything in the Blank Book, Stationery, Printing or Engraving line. At present he has a large variety of useful and beautiful goods, suitable for Holiday Presents, such as Jewel Boxes, Handkerchief Boxes, Glove Boxes, Chess and Backgammon Boards, Travelling Satchels, and a thousand and one articles desirable. Selling price marked on all goods in plain figures.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING GOODS.—We notice that Mr. B. G. Atkinson, No. 521 Chestnut Street, is selling out his large and choice stock of Gentlemen's Furnishing Goods, at prices below cost. He is about retiring from business, and intends closing out his entire stock by the 1st of January. All who desire goods in his line will do well to call and get their supply, at low rates. An opportunity like this does not often occur. Mr. Atkinson has been a long time in the business, and his goods have been carefully selected.

SCHENCK'S PULMONIC SYRUP, SEAWEED TONIC, AND MANDRAKE PILLS.—These are the only medicines that will cure Pulmonary Consumption. Dr. Schenck has been in constant practice over thirty years, continually examining lungs, and knows his medicines, if properly taken, will cure consumption. His Mandrake Pills cleanse the liver and stomach; his Seaweed Tonic dissolves the food, stimulates the coating of the stomach and aids digestion; his Pulmonic Syrup ripens the matter, and nature throws it off without any exertion. Prepared and for sale by J. H. Schenck & Son, N. E. cor. Sixth and Arch Sts., Philadelphia, and by Druggists and Dealers generally.

THE APPROACH TO DORMILHOUSE.

THE VAUX AND THE VAUDOIS.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

IN a remote corner of France, on the borders of Italy, lies the province of Dauphiny, a section of country entirely unknown to the tourist, the scenery of which rivals that of Switzerland. Its people have borne a not unimportant part in the religious history of the world. They are known as the Vandois, literally the Valley people, as they live in the narrow and barren vauux or valleys of the mountains. They are also known in religious history as the Waldenses, having probably taken that name from one Pierre Waldensis, who died a martyr to his faith in the twelfth century.

Very early in the Christian era the Vandois became converted to Christianity. It is certain that in the second century, if not earlier, they had embraced that faith, and it is even surmised that St. Paul himself may have journeyed from Rome to Spain through their country. Living in their valleys, secluded from the outer world, they clung to the simplicity of their religion, and as forms and ceremonies crept into the Christian church, they refused to recognize or observe them. When the Roman bishop claimed supremacy over all others, the Vandois refused to acknowledge his claim, and thenceforth a never-ending struggle was carried on between these simple and faithful people and the countries to which they were subject. The Church, finding all its arguments fail with them, handed them over to the secular powers—which, in those times, meant officers of state approved by and doing the will of the Church—to be coerced into submission. History has told us over and over again what is the result when men, blinded by bigotry, ignorance and superstition, are left to wreak their will, in the name of whatsoever religion, on the weak and defenceless.

We have records, dating back as far as the eleventh century, of the persecution of these people. The Val Louise, then called Vallis Gyroniana, from the torrent of Gyr, was described by Pope Urban II., as "infested with heresy." In 1496 the head of the Church promised a free pardon to all manner of criminals who should take part in a crusade against the Vandois, and a remission of sins to any one who should slay a heretic.

Constant were the collisions between the Church and those it claimed as rebellious subjects. Sometimes the papal soldiery made sudden descents upon these people, and destroyed them in their houses. Sometimes battles were fought; and sometimes the Vandois, warned of their danger, managed to escape in safety to their mountain fastnesses. In 1655, the "Easter massacre" made a sensation throughout Europe, and excited a general feeling of horror, especially in England. A treaty known as "the Patents of Grace," was forced by Cromwell from the Church, which was observed, however, only so long as Cromwell lived. As late as 1767 the Parliament of Grenoble condemned the pastor Berenger to death for continuing to preach to congregations in this desert country.

The Vandois are scattered through Dauphiny, Provence and the mountains of Piedmont, and they have been, from time to time, subject both to France and to Savoy, now to one, then to the other, and again, as now, divided between them. They live in the recesses of the Cottian Alps and of the spurs thrown out from the main ridge of mountains. Their homes are found on narrow strips of pasturage and still narrower cultivable ground which sparsely shelve the mountain sides. They are a poor, hardworking, simple and virtuous people; and, owing to the difficulties which the face of their country throws in the way of intercourse with the outer world or even with each other, far behind the times in point of civilization and its conveniences. Railroads are unknown, inns scarce, and only suited to the needs of neighborhood travel; and the tourist, if he would see this wonderful country, must perform much of the journey over toilsome foot and bridle-paths.

It is only by the most incessant industry that these poor people are enabled to obtain a scanty livelihood from the sterile soil of their native valleys and hill-sides. They seldom take a holiday. Even Sunday—which, in Continental Europe, is nowhere observed as with us—differs from the weekday only by a morning religious service. Every available patch of ground is carefully cleared of stones and cultivated, only, perhaps, some day to be swept away or hopelessly filled with debris by an avalanche of snow in winter or of stones in spring. These avalanches are one of the greatest sources of dread to the poor mountaineer. Not only may his little field crumble away or be hidden under them, but his home and family become victims to the general destruction. Second to these in point of devastation are the torrents which, at certain seasons of the year, rush down the valleys, carrying all before them. Sometimes one of these torrents gradually deposits rocks and debris and forms a sort of reservoir, which enlarges as each succeeding season builds the walls higher and higher and increases the depth of water. Then comes a terrible time when, some spring, the reservoir bursts through its banks, and, rushing headlong through the country, obliterates all old landmarks, and leaves only ruin behind it.

The rough and precipitous sides of the mountains, the numerous waterfalls and the torrents, all combine to make the scenery grand and wild in the extreme. We are told by a recent traveller that one part of the road from Bourg d'Oisans to Briançon "is not perhaps surpassed even by the famous Via Mala leading up to the Splügen." "The route follows the profile of the mountain, winding in and out along its rugged face, scarped and blasted so as to form the road: At one place it passes through a gallery about six hundred feet long, cut through a precipitous rock overhanging the river, which dashes, roaring and foaming, more than a thousand feet below, through the rocky abyss of the Gorge de l'Infernet."

In the Combe de Malavel (cursed valley) is the Cascade de la Pisse, which falls from a height of over six hundred feet, first in one jet, which becomes split by a projecting rock into two, and finally reaches the ground in a shower of spray.

The little hamlet of Villard d'Arenne, in this neighborhood, though some five thousand feet above the level of the sea, is so walled in by lofty mountains that the sun does not shine upon it for months together. Waterfalls, streams and springs abound everywhere throughout the valleys, fed by the immense glaciers that rest upon the mountain sides, "sometimes bounding from the heights, in jets, in rivulets, in masses, leaping from rock to rock, and reaching the ground only in white clouds of spray, or bursting directly from the ground in a continuous spring."

The country is everywhere full of historical and traditional interest. Every pass and valley has its name, every ruin its story. Here is where a great battle was fought or a massacre perpetrated; yonder on the mountain side a cave perhaps, discovered full of the bones of refugees who have perished while hiding from persecution.

The Vandois do not seem to have been a warlike race. When their persecutors fell upon them, they fled to the mountains, and left their homes and herds to be devastated by the invaders. Still there are accounts of their having turned upon their pursuers and driven them back, their ranks broken and almost annihilated. Sometimes their exile was so prolonged that they made themselves homes in the wild and barren places where they had sought for refuge. Thus settlements are found on the very verge of the glaciers, at the farthest limits of vegetation.

"The Valley of Fressinière," writes one who has recently visited this country, "joins the Valley of the Durance, nearly opposite the little hamlet of La taining a narrow strip of arable land lying at the bottom, with occasional patches up the mountain sides. But its very inhospitality, inaccessibility and sterility have combined to make it one of the most secure places of refuge for the Vaudois in the middle ages. It could neither be easily entered by an armed force, nor permanently occupied by one; while its encircling hills afforded points of look-out to discover the enemy's approach.

In the neighborhood of Palons, a little hamlet in Roche. There we leave the high road from Briançon to Ft. Dauphin, and, crossing the river by a timber bridge, ascend the steep mountain side by a mule path, in order to reach the entrance to the valley, the level of which is high above that of the Durance. Not many years since, the higher valley could only be approached from this point by a very difficult mountain path amidst rocks and stones, called the Leclier, or Pas de l'Eschelle."

This valley is about twelve miles in extent, containing a narrow strip of arable land lying at the bottom, with occasional patches up the mountain sides. But its very inhospitality, inaccessibility and sterility have combined to make it one of the most secure places of refuge for the Vaudois in the middle ages. It could neither be easily entered by an armed force, nor permanently occupied by one; while its encircling hills afforded points of look-out to discover the enemy's approach.

In the neighborhood of Palons, a little hamlet in frightful precipice. Palons is the most genial and fertile spot in the whole valley. It looks like a little oasis in the desert.

The hamlet of Mursals, situated in the uppermost part of the valley, is so shut in that the sun shines upon it but three months in the year, and during several months in the winter it lies buried in snow. It is a wretched hamlet, built of mud and stone, without windows and chimneys, the people and cattle living in one common room for sake of warmth.

After a journey of about ten miles up the Valley of Freasinières, the road ceases. Steep rocks shut in on every side, and only a footpath, providing a hazard-

While it is summer in the valley, it may be winter in Dormilhouse, with snow and sleet. It is a dreary, barren spot, and seemingly the last place on earth that any people would settle through choice. Yet its present inhabitants are so attached to it that they will not leave it, while some of them walk twelve miles of a morning to their labor in the Valley of the Durance, returning the same distance at night.

The cottages, about forty in number, and poor and mean in construction, are built in tiers upon ledges on the mountain side. There is little soil capable of cultivation, and pasturage is scarce and almost inaccessible. Goats' milk and unsifted rye form the ous and zig-zag route up the face of what appears to be a sheer precipice, leads the traveller to Dormilhouse. Far up the mountain the footpath crosses the foot of a lofty cascade. La Pisse du Dormilhouse, which leaps from the summit of the precipice, and sometimes dashes over the path itself. The Biasse winds like a thread through the hollow of the mountains below.

Dormilhouse was the last resort and the stronghold of the fleeing Vaudois. If the valley did not afford them the protection and shelter they needed, the fugitives took their way up the precipice side, and in Dormilhouse found safe shelter from persecution. For no soldier would undertake the perils of ascent.

food of the people. The rye is baked into cakes in the fall, and preserved in that form during the year. Uncooked, the rye is liable to mold. Besides, it is necessary to economize in the matter of cooking. Coal there is none, and the wood used for fuel is brought on the backs of donkeys over steep mountain paths for a distance of twelve miles. As in other hamlets of the region, people and cattle are housed in common. Barren, cold and desolate in summer, in winter Dormilhouse is completely shut in by ice and snow, while the tourmente or ice-wind occasionally swoops up the valley, and tears the roofs from the huts, or the avalanche buries them in its depths.

Yet here, in this rocky, barren place, perched like an eagle's nest up among the cliffs of the mountain side, Felix Neff, the missionary and apostle to the High Alps, loved most to labor. Felix Neff, a young Swiss, came in 1823, to minister to the spiritual wants of these people. While he was still a soldier he had read the life of Oberlin, and subsequently became inspired with an ambition to do for the Vaudois of the High Alps what Oberlin had done for the poor Protestants of Ban de la Roche. The churches to which he ministered were, in some cases, eighty miles apart, separated by gorges and mountain passes. When winter came, and the roads were all but impassable, then he stationed himself at Dormilhouse, because their destitution seemed greater than that of any other people in his charge. For the short space of three years he labored unresting and indefatigable for the people of his choice. He preached, he taught; he shared their homes with their aqualor and smoke, and showed them how to make them more comfortable and healthful. He introduced improvements in agriculture, irrigation and draining. He built them churches and schools, himself the foremost one in using the trowel and hammer. Whatever was to be done he did with a whole heart and a ready hand. Finally an accident disabled him which obliged him to return to his home in Geneva, which he reached only in time to die.

The Valley of the Durance is exceedingly picturesque. It is hemmed in by high mountains, whose precipitous sides reach down almost to the river's edge. The fortress of Mount Dauphin was constructed in the latter part of the seventeenth century. Victor Amadeus II., when invading the province with a Piedmontese army, at sight of the plateau commanding both valleys, exclaimed, "There is a pass to fortify." The French subsequently carried out this idea. It is a very strong place, commanding the valley of the Durance, while it is the key of the passage into Italy by the Guil and the Col de la Croix.

The valley of the Guil is one of the wildest and deepest gorges in Europe. The road winds in the bottom of the gorge by the river side, a ledge being cut in the rock for it, as otherwise the gorge is too narrow. The road is often partly washed away in winter, or covered by rocks and debris brought down by the torrent. Several miles up the gorge opens into the Combe des Queyras, and presently the Castle of Queyras comes in sight, built upon a high, steep rock in the middle of the valley. It used to be a saying among the Catholics of this valley that Protestantism was as dead as a certain old tree-stump which had been burned, and would only reappear when that dead stump came to life. Strange to say, after Felix Neff's mission, that stump sent out green shoots, and is now a vigorous tree.

San Vran, a town some distance up the mountain-side overlooking the Valley of Queyras, is 6,692 feet above the level of the sea. There is a provincial saying, that "it is the highest spot in Europe in which bread is eaten." Neff used to say of this town: "It is the highest, and consequently the most pious village in the Valley of Queyras."

The Italian vau, or valleys, present a different aspect from those on the French side of the mountains. There are here picturesquely wooded hills, green pastures and fertile fields. Yet, in these valleys the same deadly struggles have taken place between Roman Catholicism and Protestantism. On the face of the rock of Castelluzzo, a bold and perpendicular precipice found on the road between Villar and La Tour, a cavern is still pointed out where the Vaudois used to hide their women and children in time of war. This cavern is difficult to find, and can only be approached by a precipitous descent of fifty feet, accomplished by means of a rope-ladder; while it is far distant and entirely inaccessible from the base of the rock.

The Valley of Augroga, on the Piedmontese side of the Alps, used to afford to the Vaudois a tolerably secure asylum from persecuting armies. It is a lovely valley, abounding in groves, fields, pastures, vineyards and cascades, entirely enclosed by mountains. In this retreat the Vaudois more than once successfully withstood the assaults of the papal army. In this valley is found the famous stronghold of Pra du Tour, or meadow of the tower, which has been the scene of repeated combat, with victory, on the Vaudois side. The entrance into the Pra du Tour is by a footpath along a rocky ledge, with huge boulders overhanging from above, and yawning chasms beneath the feet. This pass might well be called the Thermopylae of the Vaudois. Into this pra, or meadow, the people retreated in time of peril, and here they made themselves permanent homes.

The day of persecutions for the Protestant Vaudois is passed. War, famine, the inquisition, the rigorous climate, and the privations which they were forced to endure, alike failed to crush out of their hearts their faith in their inherited religion. They are still a poor, laborious and illiterate people, but the name of the Waldenses may still be considered to imply unwavering fidelity.

ANTS AND THEIR WAYS.

BY J. B. DUFFEY.

"GO to the ant, thou sluggard," says Solomon; "consider her ways and be wise: which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest."

Though modern investigations have shown that the ant is no provider "of meat in the summer" for the contingencies of the winter, but rather that she lives in a somewhat hand-to-mouth manner on what she can pick up from day to day; nevertheless, her ways are full of marvel, and well worthy the consideration, not of the sluggard only, but of every active and observant lover of nature.

Meanwhile, we must not overlook the great truth embodied in the words of the Hebrew philosopher and king—"having no guide, overseer, or ruler." For, says a modern observer, in speaking of the ants, it is wonderful we do not find among them anything like that which seems unavoidable in human society

NEST OF THE RED ANT.

—a hierarchy of individuals who command and of individuals who obey. The most perfect equality prevails. All share equally in the management of authority, or, rather, there is no authority, each doing what is to be done from an instinct of duty.

Yet, ants are known to capture and hold slaves. The blood-red or sanguineous ant, a species common to our own land and to Europe, makes raids on the nests of a smaller black ant, in order to obtain the larvæ and pupæ, which they bring up in their own nests. When they reach maturity, these "negroes," as they have been termed, take the entire charge of the colony. Frequently outnumbering their masters, they yet live with them most amicably, showing them all submission and paying them every attention. They lick them, brush them, caress them, carry them on their backs, feed them, and even nurse their young. They never think of abandoning them.

The russet, or rufescent ants, common in most European countries, are also slave-makers. They are necessarily so. They are physically incapable of preparing a home for their young, and of providing food either for themselves or for their offspring. The sole duty of the workers if they may be called workers who do no work—seems to be to capture slaves. Unless waited upon and fed by their slaves, they die of starvation.

The blood-red ants are not so helpless. They help their slaves in their work. When threatened by an enemy, they show their regard for these faithful servants by carrying them to the lowest apartments of the nest, as to a place of the greatest security. When removing to a new habitation, they carry their slaves along, showing them the utmost care and tenderness.

The rufescent ants, on the other hand, are, in like circumstances, actually carried by their slaves. In their case, indeed, the so-called slaves are really the masters. As an experiment, Huber shut up a number of rufescent ants with larvæ and pupæ of their own kind, and several of the slave pupæ. They made no attempt to feed themselves, and soon lost all care for their young. Most of them died of hunger in two days. Pitying the few that remained alive, Huber admitted a single slave ant. This active little creature began at once to re-establish order. He made a cell in the earth, collected the larvæ and placed them in it, assisted the pupæ that were ready to be developed, and by feeding the surviving rufescent preserved their lives.

Francis Huber, the son of that Peter Huber, who, though blind, won a world-wide celebrity as the historian of the bees, has left on record very minute accounts of his observations on the habits of ants. His descriptions of their battles, though rendered a little suspicious by the military terms used in them, are very circumstantial. Though originating some of the disputes about the possession of a flock of glanis, these battles most frequently have for their object the procuring of slaves. One afternoon in 1793, says Huber, as I was walking in the environs of Grenchen, I saw a legion of largish russet ants crossing the road. Marching with rapidity in a compact array, they occupied a space of from eight to ten feet long, by three or four inches wide. Leaving the road, and passing through a dense hedge, they went into a meadow, where they wound their way along the turf, their column remaining always unbroken, in spite of the obstacles they had to surmount. Presently they arrived near a nest of ashy-black ants, whose dome rose out of the grass. As soon as the sentinels of the menaced fortress descried the advancing army, they threw themselves boldly against it. At the same time the alarm spread to the interior of the nest, the inmates of which rushed out in crowds. Simultaneously the invading army moved forward to the attack, knocking the ashy-black ants head over heels, climbing up the sides of the hillock, flocking on its summit, and forcing a way into the first avenues. Other parties worked with their teeth, making an opening in the side. They soon succeeded in making a breach, through which the rest of the army penetrated into the beleaguered fortress. They did not make a long stay there. In three or four minutes they came out again in great haste, each one carrying in its mouth a pupæ or larvæ belonging to the conquered. They again took the same road by which they had come, following each other in a straggling manner. It was easy to distinguish their line on the grass by the appearance which their innumerable white cocoons and larvæ presented, as they were borne along by their russet-hued captors.

A recent writer, in a Missouri paper, gives a lively account of a battle between two bodies of ants. "My school-house," he says, "had been infested for several months by a species of large black ants, much to the annoyance of the little barefooted scholars. But what was my astonishment a few mornings since on coming into my school-house, to find the floor literally strewn with dead and dying ants, and upon a closer examination to find that a most sanguinary and fatal battle was then raging among them. A much larger number were lying dead than were left engaged, and I thereby concluded that the battle had raged all night. Most of the combatants engaged were grappled in a deadly embrace, while others but recently commenced were standing erect on their hind legs and striving for the advantage with all the science of the most experienced swordsmen or pugilists. The most fatal point of attack, and the one for which it seemed all contended, was the ligament which joined the body with the head. This vital point once seized by the powerful nippers, death ensued without a struggle.

No undue advantage was taken by either party, and no two would endeavor to overpower a single one; nor was there any flinching or wavering in a single instance. Whenever two belligerents met it was certain death to one or both. Never, perhaps, were two armies more equally matched in numbers, strength and valor; and, consequently, at the close of the battle, which lasted two nights and a day, as new recruits continued to arrive at every moment, there were but few left, and probably none of the vanquished army. Observing closely I could see a slight difference in the appearance of the contestants, one set being perfectly black, with a large head, while the other was nearer brown, with a smaller head, though both about equally matched in size and strength. Disembodied legs were numerous, and many an unfortunate though valiant hero, being entirely deprived of his supporters, was thus left, hors de combat, to die on the field. The next morning I swept up the dead and dying of both armies, amounting to thousands.

The nests of ants vary much both in form and material. The turf ant, a small dusky-brown species, common in gardens and fields, usually selects a tuft of long grass, the stems of which serve to support the dome-like top and the walls, while the blades wave above. The structure of this tenement is slight, usually consisting almost wholly of grains of sand piled up so skilfully as to retain their position without cement of any kind. The red ant, one of the commonest of European species, builds up a small rounded hillock with fragments of wood, bits of straw, dry leaves and the like. This hillock, however, is but the outer shell of the nest, which is carried deep into the ground. It contains corridors, landings, chambers and spacious apartments. All the corridors lead to a large central room, loftier than the rest, and supported by pillars. Here the majority of the inhabitants are to be found congregated.

The mason ants, of which there are many varieties, including our own little yellow ant, use a more or less fine mortar in erecting the domes that surmount their subterranean habitations. The fuliginous or jet ants, the European representative of the common black ant of Pennsylvania, hollows out, in the trunks of old oaks or willows, horizontal galleries, with thin partitions between, and communicating with each other. Rising story above story, these galleries frequently look like halls supported by pillars, and present the appearance of carved work of the most delicate and elaborate pattern.

In the tropics, we find wonderful ant structures. In Guiana, ant-hills have been seen from fifteen to twenty feet in height, and from thirty to forty feet around the base. Stedman, when in Surinam, passed an ants' nest—being afraid to go up to it—six feet in height, and one hundred in circumference.

The Coushie ant, says Bates, is one of the most important animals of Brazil. It oftentimes takes forcible possession of the land. Well-beaten paths branch off in every direction through the forests, upon which broad columns of these ants may be seen marching along, each individual burdened with a circular piece of green leaf, often larger than itself. From a fancy that the insect carries these leaves as a protection from the sun, it is sometimes called the parasol ant. The real use of the leaves, however, is to thatch the huge domes, sometimes forty feet in diameter, of their curious edifices. In gathering leaves, the Coushie ants invariably give the preference to cultivated trees, such as the orange and coffee, of which they frequently defoliate and destroy, or greatly injure, whole plantations. It has been noticed as a singular fact that one set of workers ascends the trees and cuts away the leaves, while another carries them to the nest. The underground galleries formed by these creatures are of almost incredible extent. Sulphur smoke, having been blown into a nest, was seen to issue from an outlet seventy yards distant. Ditches are no protection against them. It is stated that they have even carried galleries under the great River Paraiha. They are great well-diggers, and excavate deep holes in search of water, which seems to be a necessity with them. One of their wells, twelve inches in diameter, was followed to a depth of thirty feet, when water was reached.

An Australian ant builds a curious nest in the trees, by bending down several adjacent leaves and fastening them together by silken threads so as to form a sort of purse. A person disturbing one of these nests, hears at first a pattering like rain-drops, and in an instant finds his hair and neck covered with fiery, stinging creatures, of which he finds it almost impossible to rid himself.

The inhabitants of an ants' nest usually consist of winged males and females, and wingless neuters or workers. The workers sometimes are of two forms, one of which, having a large cubical head, has been called a soldier.

The domestic life of the different species of ants, says Figuer, is nearly the same. The females fly together in harmony, never ceasing to lay, whilst walking about, their minute, cylindrical white eggs. These the workers pick up and carry to special rooms, where, in about a fortnight, they hatch into larvæ. A troop of nurses take charge of the larvæ, gathering them sugary liquids for food, and airing them every sunny day. Watchers, placed just under the roof, as soon as they see the sun shining on the hill, go to tell the nurses. In a few seconds every door is crowded with these latter carrying out the young, to put them on the top of the hill, where they will receive the benefit of the sun's rays. When the warmth becomes too great, the watchful nurses convey their charges to more protected chambers.

When the larvæ are about to change into pupæ, the nurses brush them clean, and stretch their skins, thus preparing them for the approaching metamorphosis. The larvæ then spin for themselves a silky cocoon, of a close texture, and of a gray or yellowish hue. In this stage of their existence the young ants remain apparently lifeless. When ready to emerge from their silky prison, the nurses again come to their assistance, and tear away the covering. The new-born ant is now carefully tended and fed, and taught to walk, till in a few days it is able to take care of itself.

Toward the close of August, if an ants' nest be watched some warm, sunshiny day, thousands of winged ants will be seen issuing forth. These are the males and females, that have just broken from the pupal shell, starting on their wedding journey into the air. Wonderful clouds of these have frequently been observed. The swarms of a whole district seem to flock together, whirling and twisting up into the sky like smoke-wreaths. From this bridal tour, the bridegrooms never return. Ere their brief honeymoon is over they perish. The brides either come back to their old homes, or found new colonies, with the help of a few workers who have been their escort. No longer needing wings, the workers hasten to cut them off, or, as most frequently happens, they themselves cut them off. Chambers are set apart for them, where they are watched and tended with constant care and solicitude. Guards attend them night and day, caressing them, licking them, brushing them and offering them food. On the slightest apprehension of danger, these prospective mothers are first of all carried to the securest retreat. In the course of time they begin to lay eggs, as did their mothers before them, and the circle of ant-life is complete.

As has already been stated, ants, with the exception, perhaps, of a few species, do not lay up provisions for the winter. Indeed, during that period, in cold climates, they sleep at the bottom of their nests. A small number of species only hold out through the severe season by shutting themselves up in their hills with a number of plant-lice, or aphides.

No person, perhaps, who has had the misfortune to have a favorite tree or shrub infested with plant-lice, but has noticed the ants always accompanying those troublesome little pests. In fact, the plant-lice are the cows of the ants, to whom they willingly submit themselves to be milked of their liquid honey. Sometimes the ants inclose a flock of them on a branch in a miniature earthen stable. Our common yellow ant is a famous keeper of these herds. It collects in its nest a number of plant-lice, especially those kinds living on the roots of grass and other plants, paying them, and, above all, their eggs, as much attention as it does to its young. For the possession of a flock of plant-lice, wars have arisen between neighboring ant colonies, quite as terrible in their way as have been waged between nations of men, for something to which neither of the contestants had any just claim.

Livingstone, speaking of the ants of Africa, declares that a gift, analagous to that of language, has not been withheld from them. "We tried," he says, "to sleep one rainy night in a native hut, but could not, because of attacks by the fighting battalions of a very small species of ant. It soon became obvious that they were under regular discipline. Our hands and necks were the first objects of attack. Large bodies were massed in silence around the point to be assailed. We could hear the sharp, shrill word of command two or three times repeated, though, until then, we had not believed in the vocal power of an ant. The instant after, we felt the storming hosts rage over head and neck, biting the tender skin, clinging with a death-grip to the hair, and parting with their jaws rather than quit their hold. On our lying down again in the hope of their having been driven off, no sooner was the light out and all still, than the manœuvre was repeated. Clear and audible orders were issued, and the assault renewed. It was as hard to sleep in that hut as in the trenches before Sebastopol."

In the wilds of Africa are found vast numbers of ants, some species so terrible to man and beast, that, says Du Chaillu, they may well be called lords of the forest.

Of these African plagues, the most to be feared, and, perhaps, the most terrible of insects, are the driver ants, so called from the fact that they drive every living creature before them. Though found in vast numbers, neither the male nor the female have as yet been discovered. Du Chaillu doubts whether they build any nest, though other travellers speak of them as a matter of course. One thing is certain, they are most frequently encountered during their terrible marches. These marches are scenes of terror and destruction. The ants do not disturb vegetation, but every living creature that does not fly before them perishes. Villages are deserted as they approach, the inhabitants seeking safety in the rivers. Fire, that will frighten almost any creature, has no terrors for them. A driver ant will dash at a glowing coal, fix its jaws in the burning mass, and straitway shrivel up in the heat. Their marches are generally made by night, as they cannot well endure the heat of the sun. If forced to march during a sunny day, they construct covered ways of earth through which they pass. When compelled to cross a stream, they do so in a singular manner. Crawling to the end of a bough overhanging the water, they form themselves into a living chain. Ant after ant lengthens out the chain, till the free end reaches the water, and, floating away, link after link still being added, it is swept by the current to the opposite bank. The ant at that end then fastens upon some object, and the rest then pass over their companions as over a suspension bridge. Du Chaillu says that these living bridges are tubular, and that the army of ants marches through them.

When overtaken by a flood, the driver ants are said to save themselves from destruction by forming themselves into a ball, the feebler insects in the centre, and the larger and more powerful on the outside. These balls, a specimen of which is in the British Museum, are about the size of a common cricket ball. Being much lighter than the water, they float upon the surface until the flood subsides.

Very similar in their habits, but not so much dreaded by man, are the foraging ants of Brazil. Like the driver ants they march in great armies, devouring everything of an animal nature, living or dead, that falls in their way. "Vegetation they do not touch. As soon as their advance is heralded by the flocks of pittas, or thrushes, who accompany them, the inhabitants of such houses as come within their line of march, throwing open every box and drawer, quit the premises. The ant army then pours in. Not a crack or cranny is left unvisited. Every living thing—rats, mice, cockroaches, scorpions, centipedes and all the disagreeable vermin common to a tropical climate—is destroyed in a wonderfully short time. The turmoil then ceases, the ants resume their march, and the owner of the house returns in great glee to a renovated home, where he need no longer fear a centipede in his shoe, or a scorpion in his head-covering.

But it is within our own borders that two of the most singular species of ant are to be found. Reference is here made to the honey and agricultural ants of Texas, the latter of which has been comparatively unknown till within a recent period.

"The honey ant," says a naturalist, who has studied their habits, "has two kinds of workers of very distinct forms—one of the usual shape, and performing the active duties of the formicarium; the other and larger worker is inactive and does not quit the nest, its sole purpose, apparently, being to elaborate a kind of honey, which they are said to discharge into prepared receptacles, and which constitutes the food of the entire population of the community. In the honey-secreting workers the abdomen is distended into a large globose bladder-like form. From this honey an agreeable drink is made by the Mexicans."

From an abstract of an account of its habits, furnished by Dr. Lincecum to the Linnean Society in 1861, we gather the following facts in reference to the agricultural ant, which undoubtedly show it to be worthy of being regarded as one of most curious of known insects.

It is a large, brownish ant, dwelling in what may be called paved cities. Like a thrifty, diligent, provident farmer, it makes suitable and timely arrangements for the changing seasons. On ordinary dry ground, it bores a hole, around which it raises the surface three and sometimes six inches, forming a low, circular mound, the outer edge of which is some three or four feet from the central entrance. On low, flat ground, liable to inundation, the hill rises sharper and to the height of fifteen or twenty inches, with the entrance near the summit. In either case, the ant clears the ground around the hill of all obstructions, and levels and smoothes the surface to the distance of three or four feet, forming a handsome pavement. Within this paved area not a green thing is allowed to grow, except a single species of grain-bearing grass. Having planted this crop in a circle around, and two or three feet from the centre of the mound, the insect tends and cultivates it, keeping it free from grass and weeds. The cultivated grass grows luxuriantly, and produces a heavy crop of small, white, flinty seeds, which, under the microscope, very closely resemble ordinary rice. When ripe, it is carefully harvested, and carried by the workers, chaff and all, into the granary cells, where it is cleansed of the chaff and packed away. The chaff is taken out and thrown beyond the limits of the paved area.

During protracted wet weather, it sometimes happens that the provision stores become damp, and are liable to sprout and spoil. In this case, on the first fine day, the ants bring out the damp and damaged grain, put it in the sun to dry, and then carry back and pack away all the sound seed.

BAY-WINDOW AND MANSARD ROOF.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"It would be such an easy thing for him," said Job Maxwell to his wife. "Such an easy thing! He would never miss a comfort, and we would be lifted out of so much trouble."

Mrs. Maxwell did not remove her eyes from the floor, nor make any reply to her husband's remark.

"Not a chick nor a child to look after—only himself and wife—and I've got a houseful," continued Mr. Maxwell. "I've never asked him for a dollar in my life, though I've been in many tight places."

"And you've always got through them," Mrs. Maxwell said, in a tender voice, leaning toward her husband as she spoke. "The mountains have looked very high, and the valleys very deep, but you have always passed them safely."

"Yes; but no mountain like this one has ever crossed my way before. I cannot get over it without a helping-hand."

"Maybe not. We never overcome any difficulty without help." Then lowering her voice, and speaking with reverence, Mrs. Maxwell added: "God is our helper. In the future, as in the past—to-day, as yesterday, He will be a present help in time of trouble."

"All very true," returned her husband; "but He helps by human agency."

To this Mrs. Maxwell did not reply. She loved her husband, and never liked to oppose him in anything. It would have saved him from many of the tight places to which he had just referred, if she had done so often. His present trouble had come about in this wise:

Mr. Maxwell owned the house in which he lived. He had bought it several years before, and until within a year it was burdened with a mortgage. To pay off this mortgage had been long and hard work. Twice there had been a foreclosure, and a narrow escape from being sold out by the sheriff. His home was saved only through the intervention of neighbors and friends. But, at last, through industry and economy, the mortgage was paid off, and Job Maxwell rejoiced in the ownership of a house free from all incumbrance. He had never in his life felt so rich and so much at ease in his mind.

But, with most of us, permanent satisfaction does not come with full possession. We soon tire of what we have, and begin to look away to something new, and, as it seems to us, more desirable. It was not long before Mr. Maxwell began to note the difference between the outside appearance of his house and that of some of his neighbors'. He had been too much interested in paying off the debt to think of making such contrasts before. But now they were continually pressing themselves upon him.

All at once he discovered that the white palings which enclosed the little flower-garden, in front of the house, had a very common look—being flat and pointed at the top. He saw nothing but palings for a week afterward, and was so fully posted in regard to them that he could tell every style in the neighborhood.

"I don't think I can stand these palings any longer," said Mr. Maxwell, coming in one day. "They're a perfect eyesore!"

He was really excited.

"What's wrong about the palings, Job?" asked his wife, in her mild way. "I always thought them very pretty."

"Pretty! They're the meanest in the whole neighborhood. Even Peter Jones has nicer ones. I was looking at them this morning."

Mrs. Maxwell was satisfied; they were neat and tasteful in her eyes. But they had so lost their good looks for Job, after he had compared them with his neighbors', that he could see no comeliness in them. So, nothing would do but he must have new palings.

"Let us wait a little longer," urged Mrs. Maxwell.

"What's the use of waiting. If we are going to have them, the sooner the better. I'm positively ashamed of the old, poor-looking things, and wonder how I could have endured them so long."

Mrs. Maxwell understood her husband too well to make any decided opposition. She knew there would be no rest with him until he had his new palings, now that his mind was set on them.

"How much are they going to cost?" she inquired.

"I got an estimate from Malcolm this morning," replied Job. "He says he doesn't think it will cost over twenty dollars for a fence just like 'Squire Morton's, and that is, by all odds, the handsomest one in town."

Twenty dollars! How much that would buy for the children! Their clothes were very much run down; and it took half the mother's time to alter, patch and mend. But she did not utter what was in her thought. Job divined it, perhaps, for he said: "Malcolm doesn't want the money. I can pay any time that it is convenient."

On the next day the old fence, sound in every paling, and well-covered with paint, disappeared from the front of Mr. Maxwell's house, where it had stood and done as good service as the prettiest one in town for over seven years, and in due time another of more stylish pattern and more costly workmanship took its place.

The ornamental always costs more than the simply useful. The "desire of the eye" is not satisfied with cheapness. Before the fence was completed many changes from the first idea were made; and when the work was at last completed, Mr. Malcolm's bill, instead of being but twenty dollars, according to the first estimate, footed up forty-six dollars. It's reception was a wet blanket to Mr. Maxwell's enjoyment. He took no more real pleasure in the handsome new fence; for he could not look at it without thinking of the forty-six dollars he should have to pay.

After the fence some better shrubbery had to come. He began to look more closely at his neighbors' gardens, and to see, by contrast, the meagreness of his own. He had few, if any, choice plants. So this must be remedied—his garden must be fixed up. It would only cost a trifle.

But the trifle did not fall short of twelve dollars. It need not have been half if he had been content with fitness and beauty. But he must have costly exotics because some of his neighbors had them.

So it went on. The new fence was only the beginning of change and improvement. He fixed up here, and he fixed up there—made this little change, and that little addition; all of which added to the comfort and good looks of his house, but added also to the burden of debt he had taken up so soon after the old wearisome burden of years had been laid off.

One day, as he stood at a window, Job Maxwell saw the carpenter in earnest conversation with Mr. Fowler, his neighbor opposite. They were in front of Mr. Fowler's house, looking up at the building, and talking about it, as was evident from their gestures. Maxwell became interested at once, and crossed the street to find out what Mr. Fowler was going to do. He was soon enlightened. His neighbor had caught the bay-window and Mansard roof fever, and was consulting with Dr. Malcolm, who was diagnosing the case. Maxwell listened with great interest; and as he listened, his eyes wandered across the street, and he saw, in imagination, a bay window swelling out from the second story of his house, and a Mansard taking the place of its slant shingle roof.

Mr. Maxwell was unusually quiet and thoughtful all that day. The fever was getting hold of him—creeping into his blood, and making its insidious advances upon the very citadel of his life. He dreamed all night of bay-windows and Mansard roofs, and awoke at daydawn unrefreshed. He fought against the disease; for he knew that if it got fairly hold of him he would have an exhausting struggle, and might not survive the attack.

The first thing Maxwell saw on looking out next morning was the carpenter at work in front of his neighbor's house. Two of his men were with him. Scaffold poles were already on the ground. A little pang of envy shot through Job Maxwell's heart. Why couldn't he have a bay-window and a Mansard roof as well as Mr. Fowler? He sighed, and turned away.

Day after day he watched the carpenters at work on his neighbor's house with scarcely less interest than the neighbor himself; and when, at last, the window was completed, and the new roof lifted above the old dwelling its bold proportions, all the attractions of his own modest home faded away from Mr. Maxwell's sight, and it became mean and common in his eyes.

The bay-window and Mansard roof fever did not let go its hold on our friend, but continued to increase, until it had consumed all discretion and prudence. Then he held almost daily conferences with Mr. Malcolm, the carpenter, who made for him a drawing of his house, with the desired improvements, and and so helped on the disease to its crisis.

Blindly, and against all his wife could say, Mr. Maxwell told the carpenter to go to work and make the coveted additions to his house. The question of ways and means had been settled. The new window and roof would cost, according to the carpenter's estimate, about twelve hundred dollars, and the money to pay for them was to be raised by a new mortgage on the property.

"Only a matter of seventy or eighty dollars a year in interest," said Mr. Maxwell, lightly, in answer to his wife's mildly-urged objections. "And see how much more room we shall have; and how elegant the house will look."

They had already all the room they needed, and the house was as neat and genteel as most of their neighbors'.

It took nearly four months to put in the window and build up the new roof; during most of which time the family suffered many discomforts. The work was begun in August, and it was nearly Christmas before its completion. Mrs. Maxwell took a severe cold in consequence of the exposed condition of the house, from the effects of which she did not recover all winter.

On the first of January Mr. Malcolm rendered his bill. It was two thousand dollars. In addition to the new roof and bay-window, other improvements were made in the house, which "might as well be done while they were at it;" and the cost of these footed up far beyond what Mr. Maxwell had imagined. A mortgage was executed, and the bill paid. Another mortgage! Through years of patience, and hope, and self-denial, Job Maxwell had worked to get free from the burden of one mortgage, and now he had taken up the burden of another!

Was he any happier for his Mansard roof and bay-window? Did the mortgage set any the lighter upon him for these? Not a whit; they made the burden heavier, for he was self-convicted of weakness and folly.

And now it happened that a great depression came in Maxwell's line of business. Trade ceased for awhile, and bills could not be collected. A failure in his collections made it impossible for him to meet his own business accounts. Harassments followed, and then suits. If it had not been for the mortgage already on his house, Mr. Maxwell could have raised enough money to tide him over his difficulties. But a second mortgage no one would take.

The depression in trade continued, and things went on from bad to worse, until poor Maxwell was at his wit's end, and almost harassed to death.

It was in this extremity that he said to his wife: "It would be such an easy thing for him. Such an easy thing! He would never miss a comfort, and we would be lifted out of so much trouble."

He spoke of a wealthy relative who lived in a large city a few hundred miles away, to whom he proposed to write and ask the loan of a few thousand dollars. But the proposition, as we have seen, was not favored by his wife, who believed more in God's help, when it flowed into self-help, than in any other kind. She understood her husband better than he understood himself, and felt sure that a loan from his rich relative would only add in the end to their embarrassment, and leave them, most probably, under the life-long humiliation of a debt that could not be exacted, and for the payment of which her husband would not use the needed self-denial.

"All very true," he had replied to her exhortation to look upward for help; "but He helps by human agency."

It was some time before Mrs. Maxwell replied. Then she said: "God works in our affairs more in us and by us than through others. When we come into difficult places, it is better to call into effort our own strength, and to draw upon our own resources, small though they be, than to give up and call to others for help."

"But I have no resources," replied Mr. Maxwell, with a distressed look and tone. "I can neither sell goods nor collect what is due me. I am on the verge of ruin. Without outside help, all is lost. If it wasn't for this wretched mortgage on our house, I could get along; but no one will lend on a second mortgage. I was a fool ever to have put it there! But I'm never willing to let well enough alone."

He struck the key-note there, and well his wife knew it. But she did not add to his self reproaches by a confirmatory word.

"Let us give up this house," said Mrs. Maxwell, abruptly.

Her husband started as if he had heard the roof fall in.

"Give up the house!" he exclaimed.

"Yes; bay-window, Mansard roof and all! We shall never have any more comfort here. It is spoiled for our use. Let us sell it, and take a cheaper home."

"Why, wife! What are you driving at?"

"At the solution of our difficulty. The mountain that stands across our path to-day has been reared by our own hands. It is not well for us to ask another to lift us over it. We built it up. Let us pull it down."

Mr. Maxwell drooped his head, and sat in deep thought for a long time. Looking up at length, he said in a subdued voice: "Not our hands, wife. We did not rear the mountain. It was builded by me. But I cannot take it down alone. You will have to endure like toil and privation. Ah! that is the bitterest thought."

With a tender smile, Mrs. Maxwell drew her arm about her husband's neck and kissed him.

"The labor will be sweet," she answered; "for I shall know that its end will be peace and rest for you. That it will make the way plain, and the trouble light."

And it did. The house was sold for a liberal price, and, after paying off the mortgage, Mr. Maxwell had enough over to clear his business of all embarrassment, and to give him a comfortable surplus. A pleasant little home was taken at an annual rent considerably below the interest on the property sold, and into this the family drew closer together.

sons," he said one day. "A man so well advanced in years should have known better."

"What lessons?" asked his wife.

And he replied: "That self-help is the surest dependence; that a thing not easily afforded is never truly enjoyed; and that to be in debt is to be in purgatory."

The heavy lines that so often marred the brow of Mr. Maxwell; the expression of care that had taken the old sweetness from his mouth; the fixed, absent look shadowing his eyes so long, were all absent now, and in their places were cheerfulness, hope and confidence.

"It has taken me a long time to learn these les-

SHARKS.

BY MARIAN KNOWLES.

THERE are few things more surprising and disappointing to the landsman," writes a recent traveller, "than to discover, when he goes to sea, that he obtains no fresh fish for breakfast or dinner, and in a multitude of cases rarely ever sees a fish. It is true that the monsters of the deep may be seen at times, and shoals of porpoises, schools of whales, a grampus, and a few dolphins be by no means uncommon sights; but it is only near the shore, on sand-banks or coral-reefs that fish abound, whilst the ocean itself is but thinly tenanted."

Yet, the ocean is not entirely devoid of game, which, though unfit for culinary purposes, may be useful in some other manner, or the destruction of which, at least, is desirable. These fish, which afford both labor and sport, are magnificent in their proportions, and require more formidable tackle than the hair-lines and silken flies used in catching salmon and trout.

Among the creatures which are fished for at sea, we may specify the whale, the capture of which has been and still is an important branch of industry. But it is not our purpose now to speak of whale fisheries. There is another fish, in the killing of which every sailor takes a yet keener pleasure.

"Everybody," continues the writer above quoted, "connected in any way with the sea is always delighted when a shark is killed. A shark is the great water-enemy of mankind; the delightful bath is either impossible or bereft of half its pleasures when sharks are known to be near. A boat that is upset causes a fatal accident in shark-frequented waters, whereas, it might produce only a ducking under other circumstances. Thus, a sailor believes that he who kills a shark deserves well of his country and companions.

"The shark dies a craven; he affords very little of that sport which renders trout and salmon fishing so attractive; his first rush, as he feels himself hooked, is usually powerful enough, but after that he exhibits little but sullenness. A young shark is usually more vigorous and determined in his resistance than is one of larger growth, and with these we have had good sport. In most rivers of tropical countries shark will be found near the mouths of rivers especially at high-tide, and those who are disposed for sport only, will find ample in such localities. The plan we adopted was to procure two pieces of copper wire, twist these firmly together, and lash a hook on to the end. A stout piece of cord was then made fast to the wire, and a bladder attached to the cord. About a hundred and fifty yards of cord were coiled upon the bank in order to play the hooked fish, a piece of meat was then fastened on the hook, and the bait flung out seaward. The hands, for this work, ought to be protected by a stout pair of leather or India-rubber gloves, so that a check may be given to the cord as the fish runs out with it.

"Having made our preparations in this way, we cast our line, and had scarcely secured the end, than we saw the bladder that indicated the position of our hook and bait travel rapidly up stream, bob under water, and again appear. A rapid tug at the cord was resisted, and immediately afterward the line flew through our hands, nearly a hundred yards being paid out without check. Then we, however, obtained a pull at our captive, and brought him near the shore, sighted him, and saw he was a shark about five feet long. When the young cannibal saw us he struggled hard to escape, but his ravenous appetite had been his ruin, as the hook was deeply buried in his throat, and in ten minutes from the time of his being hooked he was dragged, snapping and wriggling, on to dry land.

"On more than one occasion, however, the fish we thus hooked was too much for us, and carried out and off the whole of our line, and had we not resigned the end, we ourselves would have been dragged into the sea, our efforts being feeble in comparison to the power of the monster who had swallowed our bait, and was equally capable, apparently, of swallowing us."

There are several varieties of shark, all of them more or less to be dreaded. The Hammer-headed Shark is so named on account of the hammer-like shape of its head. This shark grows to the length of ten or twelve feet.

The Blue Shark inhabits the Mediterranean Sea, but periodically visits other coasts. It does great injury to the Cornish fishermen. An English gentleman, Mr. Couch, gives the following description of this shark: "The Blue Shark is migratory, and I have never known it to arrive on the Coast of Cornwall before the middle of June; but afterward it becomes so abundant that I have known eleven taken in one boat, and nine in another, in one day. The injury they inflict on the fishermen is great, as they hover about the boats, watch the lines, which they sometimes cut asunder without any obvious motive, and pursue the fish that are drawn up. This, indeed, often leads to their own destruction; but when their teeth do not deliver them from their difficulty, they have a singular method of proceeding, which is, by rolling the body round, so as to twist the line about them throughout its whole length, and sometimes this is done in such a complicated manner that I have known a fisherman give up any attempt to unroll it as a hopeless task. To the Pitchard drift-net the shark is a still more dangerous enemy, and it is common for it to pass in succession along the whole length of the net, cutting out, as with shears, the fish and the net that holds them, and swallowing both together." The Blue Shark is remarkable for the extreme slenderness of its body.

The White Shark is one of the most ferocious of its tribe. It grows to the enormous length of thirty feet, is numerous in tropical seas, and is always on the look-out for prey. It is also frequently found in the Mediterranean, especially in the spring and autumn.

A frequent companion of both the White and the Blue Shark is the Pilot fish, a small fish between whom and the shark a singular friendship seems to exist. This fish will sometimes interpose between its friend and a baited hook, and, running against the muzzle of the shark, turn him from it. It will also lead him to his prey when there is no accompanying danger; and so close is their friendship that it will sometimes cling to the shark as it is captured and hoisted on deck. These singular fish sometimes attend vessels for months together, and from this fact they obtained their name, as the ancients held them sacred as pilots to the doubtful navigator. The Pilot fish belongs to the mackerel family, to which it bears a strong resemblance.

The teeth of a shark, unlike those of any other creature, are set in both jaws three or four deep, and are set in muscles instead of bone, so that they can be raised or lowered at pleasure. When at rest the teeth are turned inward toward the throat. These teeth are so sharp, and the jaws so powerful, that a man can be bitten in two without difficulty.

Sharks show themselves more frequently in fair than in stormy weather. The presence of a shark can always be discovered by a fin above water, or if at too great a distance to discern the fin, by a ripple upon the water's surface, as sharks always swim so near the surface that the large fin upon their back is well out of the water. Cases are on record when they have made slight springs out of the water to seize their prey.

Numerous are the tragedies in which the shark plays a prominent part. In shark-infested seas, the fishermen and bathers sometimes attack and vanquish their formidable marine foe with knives, and in rare instances a bold counter attack on the part of the man will temporarily frighten the monster. But it is, we believe, generally conceded that in dealing with these creatures "discretion is the better part of valor."

GRANDFATHER'S DARLING.

Twining above him the woodbine and rose

All their rich odor
Lost on his senses—
Sitting and thinking and waiting alone;
Time passes slowly
Under the arbor.
Hark! 'Tis his singing-bird's ravishing tone.

Breaks from the window
Sweetest of music.

"Darling!"—how tender with heart-throbs the word!

"Darling! Oh, darling!

Grandfather's precious one!

Voice of more melody ear hath not heard."

Up to the chamber
Quickly ascending;
Grandfather moves with the step of a boy,
All the bright sunshine
Lost in the arbor
Flooding his features with beauty and joy.

To his arms spring-
ing,
Round his neck clinging,
Lovely and loving, and sweet as a rose;
Laughing and kissing,
And glad with the life
Only our being in baby-hood knows;
Dear little birdie
From Dreamland returns,
Flushed with new beauty to Grandfather's heart.
White locks and golden,
Sere leaf and blossom, Mingling, though seventy summers
apart.

NURSING TROUBLE.—Some people are as careful of their troubles as mothers are of their babies; they cuddle them, and rock them, and hug them, and cry over them, and fly into a passion with you if you try to take them away from them; they want you to fret with them, and to help them to believe that they have been worse treated than anybody else. If they could, they would have a picture of their griefs in a gold frame, hung over the mantel-shelf for everybody to look at. And their griefs ordinarily make them selfish—they think more of their dear little trouble in the basket and in the cradle than they do of all the world besides.

To understand the world is wiser than to condemn it; to study the world is better than to shun it; to use the world is nobler than to abuse it; to make the world better, lovelier and happier is the highest work of man.

IN DREAMLAND.

BY IRENE L.—

I'M waiting, baby, darling,
Your eyes again to see;
Lift up the soft white curtain,
And show their blue to me.
Oh, lift the soft white curtain,
For I have waited long
Since sleep shut down your eyelids,
And hushed your baby-song.
I feel so very lovely,
My eyes are full of tears—
Strange voices whisper round me,
And fill my soul with fears.

Then waken baby, darling!
Come back to me, my dove;
Come back to me from dreamland,
For I am sick for love.
A quivering of eyelids;
A tender baby-sigh;
A motion of the finger;
A low, half-frightened cry.
Oh, blue eyes, full of brightness!
Oh, mouth so sweet to kiss!
Oh, baby back from dreamland!
I am wild with new-born bliss.

MY NEW ALPACA DRESS.

BY ROSSELLA RICE.

"THERE it lies, my new alpaca dress, and beautiful basque, neatly trimmed with folds of the same; well, spread a newspaper over it, and let's leave it. I feel as though I never wanted to wear it—it's neat and pretty, and in good taste, but I don't like to look at it, it makes me sad, for a 'tale hangs thereby,'" and I, Callie Ross, sighed and closed the bed-room door as my girl-friend, Lottie, laughed and looked up in my face, as much as to say, "Did I ever!"

In the evening Lottie and Lide and my own girls were popping corn and snapping apple-seeds on the stove, and hurling parings over their heads to see what letter of the alphabet they would form in falling, and all these silly, funny, little enjoyable things that girls have done from time immemorial.

I sat reading Dr. Bushnell's "Moral Uses of Dark Things," but somehow his best sentences would entangle themselves in with the girls' capers, and at last I laid the book away and drew my chair nearer the stove.

I observed the girls whispering to each other, and occasionally I heard one say, "Oh, you do it," "No, you, I don't like to." At last Lottie said, "Aunt Callie, won't you tell us a story, it would be better than anything else. Your stories are so good, just like they are in novels."

I had to laugh at this, because I so dislike and dread and fear novels, that the compliment was anything else than Lottie intended it should be.

"Tell us why you don't like your new dress, Callie, that's a dearie; if it does make you sad, why you'll sleep it all away before morning, with that clear conscience of yours, and you'll wake up as bright as—as a new tin dipper," and the girl, Lottie, little witch, laughed and smoothed and patted her pinky palms together.

"Well, I'll tell you girls in my own way, then, and you mustn't interrupt me, or laugh or make remarks. I'll tell the whole story, from beginning to ending, why I don't like my new alpaca dress.

"I was only fourteen years old when my mother died, and I had only one dress, a gay chintz, like curtain calico, with big leaves and full-blossomed roses. I never liked that dress, but it was all I had at that time; and, with a ruffled calico apron, and somebody's thin black shawl, I was fixed up to attend my mother's funeral. I had always gone barefooted from April until November, and my feet had spread out so that they could not be squeezed into my last winter's shoes, on that memorable occasion. I remember a cousin brought me here to wear—calfskin, 'lined and bound,' she said, soft, nice ones, the like of which I had never owned. My shoes was always heavy leather, like men's coarse boots. I managed to crowd my overgrown feet into cousin's shoes, but they almost split over the sides; they were low, and the binding at the top cut into my heels so that they bled, and at night the coarse homemade cotton stockings had to be soaked in warm water before they would come off.

"In a week or so I hinted to my father that I would be glad if my sister and I could have black dresses—just plain ninepence calico would do; but he said it would be wrong to wear black; that he disapproved of such things, and we'd better look after the interest of our immortal souls before the adorning of our dying bodies.

"This was sensible talk, and we tried to believe it and act upon it, but it was hard work for growing little girls who loved pretty things.

"We used to talk it over, and try to make ourselves abide by his wise decision, after we had gone to bed at night, but it generally ended with an uncontrollable fit of weeping down under the quilts, and the smothered cry of 'Mother, mother!' as we lay there, lone little things, trying to comfort each other.

"As soon as harvest was over our grain was hauled in wagons to Lake Erie, and exchanged for money, salt, coffee, fish, muslin and boots. One night the loaded wagons stood in the street, with white covers, freshly filled tar-boxes, and everything in good order ready for an early start the next morning.

"We girls listened and heard father making out his bill of goods and groceries—but never a word said about two dress-patterns. I was very anxious, and trembled, but dared not run the risk of a refusal. My sister was bolder, and ventured further than I dared. I was fiery and impetuous, and would say cutting things, while she would coax and cry, and say, 'Oh, do now!'

"'This is our last chance,' I said. 'I'll take the baby and go out into the orchard and look for some apples, while you coax—and, sis, don't give up; mind, it's our last chance, and we do look so ugly and clownish in our best. I just think it's mean, when we do all we can toward keeping house and making 'em comfortable, to be used this way. Why, the poorest girl in town dresses better'n we do,' and, taking up the big baby on my back, I bent over, and started off through the wet grass, whimpering, 'Just wait until I can get a certificate in arithmetic, and I'll see the end to this hard work and no pay!'

"Baby leaned his ear down on my neck, and said, 'Thum day I'll buy you a gold horthe.' Little dear! I had to laugh as I replied, 'Bless your heart, little man! I'll knock him in the head, and cut him up and melt him into doubloons in no time,' and then I had to fling him around in my arms and give him a good hug for his generosity.

"I'd give more for genuine baby condolence any time, or for the touch of their little hands, wiping my tears in their bungling way, than I would for the cold, formal sympathy of the worldly-wise.

"Pretty soon my sister came out to where I was wading around in the dewy grass, and I hailed, 'well, tell me what luck you had.' 'Oh, I don't know whether we'd ought to be glad or not,' said she, and her face was set for both laugh and cry. 'I coaxed him, I said, "oh, come now, dad, let each of your housekeepers have new dresses, and if you don't want us to have black, why let us choose the kind, some quiet gray, or brown with a dot or sprig in it," and don't you think he wouldn't give up, but told Lu to get a whole web of deep blue, that sort old women's aprons are made of. Plague on it! I've a mind to tear mine all to gibles and use it for kindlings.'

"I abominate blue," said I; 'but let's pretend we like it, and make the best of it; maybe we'd be proud if we had our own way, but, dear me, I do hate to go about looking worse than an old washer-woman. If I had the chance I'd work out and earn something. It sticks to me what Fred Stanley said, that he'd rather have me for a partner at a concert or party, than any girl about here, only that I dressed so shabbily, but I'll study, and learn, and read, and think, and I'll show Mr. Fred Stanley that it's not the dress that makes the woman—I'd rather have my soul well dressed than my body any time.'

"And so we patched up our poor little longing desires with this ill-fitting theory, and we made our father proud of us in his way. He had good sense, and his judgment was correct, although he was ignorant of human nature, and had no knowledge of how to deal with those who could not see clearly as he did.

"So we made suits of the hated blue calico, even to sun-bonnets, little, corded starched ones. We had entirely outgrown our chip bonnets with the pink bows, they hardly covered decently the great, frizzly twists of reddish-brown hair that piled up on our big, round heads.

"Before I was sixteen our father married, and then I began to think I would like to work away from home and earn something for myself. Next to books my highest ambition was a lustrous black alpaca dress. All the girls of my acquaintance could afford them, and they all looked so pretty in them.

"I said nothing about it, however, but as I sat one day sewing, making what my eldest brother had long desired, 'a coat with two tails to it,' I resolved that the very next man who came along in a carriage, sleigh, wagon or bob-sled, on the hunt of a hired girl, I would really go.

"About eleven o'clock that same day there was a gruff rap at the door by a sturdy hand in a mitten, and a little, red-faced man asked, in a fine, squeaky voice, if we could tell him of any family in the neighborhood whose daughters worked out.

"I said, 'well, I don't know, sit down and warm while I think about it.' On inquiry, he proved to be a Mr. Burns, who had married Johnny Dike's sister, and lived about three miles distant, on the Sunset hills, we called them, because they were away to the west of us and at night the sun seemed to go right down into them.

"I said, 'maybe I would suit you, Mr. Burns.'

'Of course you would,' said he, 'but you don't want to work out; you're making fun.' I replied, 'I don't want to work out; I would hate to be separated from the children; I don't know how to do many kinds of work, either, but I do so want a new alpaca dress, and, Mr. Burns, if you'll take me, I'll go with you,' and my voice trembled and the tears choked me.

"Well, I'll cheerfully take you, my child, and you shall have a silver dollar every Saturday night, and I'll fetch you home on old Gray every time, too. I'll warrant you know to do our little common bit of housework.'

"He stayed till after dinner, and had his horse fed, and when I began to get ready to start I had to cry, because I loved my home and the poor children so much. But I pulled my hood down over my face, and tied up my few clothes in a little bundle and jumped on the old white horse behind him and held to his 'sheep's gray' overcoat, and, with my family all standing around the block grinning joyfully, sorrowfully and mischievously, I started.

"Now mind," said father, 'this is Thursday, try and stay away until Saturday,' and he laughed, and thought the parting shot was such a good one.

"We had to go through the village. Oh, I did hope none of the boys and girls would see me, but just as we passed the cabinet-shop who should come out but Fred Stanley, whistling along cheerily. He stopped instantly and stepped back and looked amazed. I felt my cheeks glow and the tears come to my eyes, but I held my bundle in my lap and hung on to Mr. Burns's overcoat, and talked away as though I did not see Fred at all. The old horse must have enjoyed my discomfiture, for he poked along very slowly with his head down.

"Can't you go faster, please," I gasped, through my gathering tears.

"Oh, yees; yip! here Gray! yip! yip!" said he, digging the horse with his heels.

"Just then the corner of my home-made barred shawl touched Gray on the flank, and he plunged forward, and I screamed and let go of my bundle, and flung the other arm around my employer. He howled out, 'whoa there! what y' about? whoa there,' in a voice loud enough to rouse the whole village population. He pulled back on the reins and nearly crowded me off over the flowing tail. In the trouble my employer's large white hat tipped forward and slid down over his eyes, and he drew the beast blindly up against the fence.

"Fred gallantly came to the rescue and picked up my bundle and a pair of blue yarn stockings that had fallen out of it, and reached them up to me, saying, 'the horse became frightened, I presume.' Fred never looked so pretty, only that his beautiful white teeth showed over much. I thanked him with assumed cheerfulness and put a smile upon the face, that, glowing like a poppy, wished itself six feet under the snow.

"The woman was delighted to see me, she had a baby two weeks old, and four or five children besides.

The father and the older children had been doing the work for a few days, and the little log house looked like it, too.

"She called me 'Miss' whenever she spoke to me, and she thanked me for everything I did. As soon as I warmed my feet, I turned back my sleeves and asked what was needed to be done worst of all. She said a little washing—some baby clothes, a shirt apiece for the children, and some bed and table linen.

"While the water heated, I made beds, and swept, and put the house in order, and I must say that I economized time to a very good advantage. I had cried occasionally behind her husband's back all the way there; but now that I was really earning the coveted alpaca dress, I made myself believe that I was quite happy.

"When the washing fluttered on the line, I rolled down my sleeves and said: 'What next?'

"Make the wee baby a slip of a dress and a petticoat.

"With her help they were made before sunset; and then came the milking. Our men always milked at home, and I didn't know how very well, and didn't even know our own cows. She told me they were kept in the lot below the barn, both dark red, and quiet-looking cows that were easy and safe to milk. With a little twinge of homesickness, I put my shawl over my head and ran down to the lot, and found and brought them up to the milking-yard in my careless, hurried way, when, behold, I had driven up the oxen! Their sober, quiet cow-faces had misled me. I looked all around to see if any one was in sight, and I was thankful to know that there had been no spectator. I brought up the cows then, and after a good deal of trouble, with one hand at a time, and with the milk working back the other way, I succeeded in finishing the job, but I was very tired, and perspiring at every pore.

"By the time the milk was strained I was crying. I did wish I could only get the dress without going away from home to earn it. I resolved to make a cheap one answer; and before an hour passed I resolved to make a very cheap one suffice.

"As the sun set, its golden glory shone upon the eastern hills, and I knew my own dear home was bathed in its light. I grew more and more homesick, and I thought if I stayed a month I couldn't eat anything. Oh, I knew the children would miss me when they played 'blind man's buff' and 'hide and seek' in the evenings at home!

"You may get supper now whenever you are ready, Miss Callie," said the woman; "and, if you please, I'd rather have mush and milk for supper. You may make tea for yourself if you prefer, and there are all kinds of fruits and preserves in the cellar—just get whatever you like best. You've worked so hard since you came, that you'd be better off to have a cup of hot tea, I think."

"We sipped our mush and milk at home; we didn't call it food; and I detested it; and then I had never made mush in my life, but I knew the form to go through while making it. I boiled water in the teakettle and poured into a clean kettle, and put in salt, and was getting ready to thicken it, when the woman crept up softly with a light in her hand, and looked sharply into the kettle.

"Is there not water enough?" I asked.

"Oh, yes. I was looking to see if everything was perfectly clean; some girls are so careless; and I do like my mush to be marvellously clean; but there's not a speck in that kettle. Oh, I know I'll like you, Miss Callie," she said, warmly; and then for the first time I saw that she had beautiful brown eyes of a ripe, nutty color.

"When supper was ready, I dallied with my spoon, but I was so sick for my home that I could not swallow. I resolved to try and stay until Saturday night, anyhow, and then to get some girl to take my place. Alpaca was too dear for me to buy; blue calico was a very good substitute, and I began to rather like it.

"The brown-eyed woman said she never ate such good mush, and the little boys said, 'More, more yet!' while the father looked over at me patronizingly, as much as to say, 'It takes me to find the good hired girls.'

"The little boys went to bed early; the mother occupied a bed at the farthest end of the kitchen, and she lay there cooing over the little baby; I sat and read, and Mr. Burns looked over his account book.

"I was very sorrowful and uneasy. It did seem that all the little arms at home were reaching out pleadingly for my return. I felt too badly to cry—crying wasn't half expressive or strong enough.

"I looked out of the eastern window, and the full moon was just rising over the peaked tops of the eastern hills beyond my home. The very face of the moon looked over at me sadly, pityingly, understandingly. I couldn't endure the torture any longer. I went into the other room and dropped my bundle and things out of the window.

"Fiddlesticks! Who cared for alpaca! It would soon crease and grow dingy and old, and it wouldn't stand washing; and wasn't an intelligent girl clad in the commonest blue calico richer and more of a queen than a frivolous, silly, ignorant one rustling in silks? Wasn't a contented mind wealth? Wasn't the companionship of one's little brothers and sisters at home better than all the fading finery in the world? If Fred Stanley cared for a girl's clothes, was he the snob worth caring for? No, I didn't want an ell of alpaca until I was well educated, and could teach and earn it without such heart-breaking privations as this!

"I wrote a little note, saying: 'I'll die here; I must run home; I am so sorry for all of you, and for the trouble I've caused you; but I can't endure this; you must forgive me.' And then I signed it 'Callie,' and slipped it in my pocket slyly, yawned and said it was quite bedtime. Then I went to the door, remarking, 'Oh, what a glorious evening!' and carelessly stepped out and twisted the note about the door-latch, and tiptoed around to the window, and put on my hood and shawl and stole cautiously out to the road.

"I didn't know the way home, but knew the right direction after I had run half a mile. The night was cold, and a deep snow lay on the ground; it was between Christmas and New Year's, and the moon was full. I ran with all my might, occasionally looking back over my shoulder, fearing to see an angry man in full pursuit on a poky-headed white horse.

"A few rods from home, and I could not restrain the jubilant shout of joy that would come out. I stole in softly at the back door and crept into bed, laughing hysterically, while the tears ran down my cheeks. I was so happy I couldn't sleep for crying, until nearly midnight. I had ran those three miles without stopping. I was awakened in the morning early by a dazzling light in my eyes, and there stood all the children, bent over, around my bed, laughing uproariously and feeling of me, and questioning and congratulating me, just as glad as though I had returned after an absence of a year.

"My employer, surprised at my long absence, went out to see if I had not slipped and fallen; he called me in vain, but when he opened the door to go in, he found the note, and it explained all to his own satisfaction, and that of his cooing wife.

"It changed her coo to a moan of—'What will we do now for a girl?'

"Mr. Burns laughed in spite of himself, and was very sorry, and said he would have taken me home on old Gray that very night, had he known my anxiety and home-sickness.

"And, girls, this is the reason I don't like my new alpaca dress—it brings up from the grave of the dead years remembrances of my dwarfed girlhood, that are too painful to think of, realities I try to forget."

CHAPTER VI.

HARRY WESTBROOK.

AS a matter of course, Hatty had lovers. It took Mrs. Harvey another inward struggle to accept the plain facts of this epoch of her children's lives. Seeing what they were and where they were, whom would they be likely to marry? Ordinary workmen and an ordinary workingwoman? No, not Milly, at least, Mrs. Harvey felt almost sure. As for the other two, she was not a fool to think that in their present circumstances, they had any claim to aught higher. If George was fit, in mind and even manner, for any lady, the mother could impartially own that his surroundings were not. His wife must be prepared to wash and scrub and cook, without any thought of wrong done to her. His soul and his life had different claims, and one or the other must miss something in the future.

Hatty took everything quite equably, and did not feel in the least abashed or angered that her first offer of marriage came from a working shoemaker.

"Only I'm sorry when a decent man makes a fool of himself," she said, "I'm sure I'd put him off plain enough for him to understand, if he hadn't made up his mind not to."

Mrs. Harvey, accustomed to the cautious advances and careful distinction of grades of a more reticent part of society, was somewhat scandalized by the frankness and courage around her. She, herself, married at three-and-twenty, had refused but one previous offer, and could only plead guilty to one or two silent lovers, one at least of whom, she felt sure, had kept from declaration from his just sense of certain rejection. But Hatty's admirers seemed to take for their motto, "Nothing venture, nothing have." Hatty's own characteristic report of the matter was true enough.

"You can't be civil to a man but he thinks you're willing to marry him, and if you're not civil he thinks it all the more."

Mrs. Harvey could only silently wonder what it would end in. Hatty herself seemed perfectly heart-whole. Nor could all her mother's watchful affection detect anything amiss in her conduct which could explain her troubles. She was only impartially cordial and open, which was so ingrained in her nature that when she sincerely endeavored to be austere and repellent, it only resulted in a spasmodic, overdone shyness, which might easily be mistaken for arch coquetry.

Presently there came a lover of a very different kind to the honest shoemaker, the sharp saddler, and the earnest, blundering corn-chandler's "young man" who had already presented themselves.

When this one began to "drop in" of an evening, he did not make all the family uncomfortable by sitting on the edge of his chair and blushing and stammering. He had a bit of news for Mrs. Harvey, a fitting pleasant word for Millicent, and an argument for George.

His name was Harry Westbrook, and though he lived in the same lowly street with the Harveys, he had "gentle blood" in his veins. Once, in the course of some appropriate conversation, he took from his pocket an old signet-ring, with the family crest engraved thereon, and showed it to Mrs. Harvey. The well-bred, dignified woman liked him all the better for having it, and for not wearing it.

He was tall and fine-looking, with a something in mien and manner that set him apart from the handsomest of the workmen around him. And he had also that greatest charm of all, a sad history.

His spendthrift gentleman-father, born to "hunters" and "meets," had fallen to die from the effects of a ducking he had received as a "welsher" on a fifth-rate race-course. This ne'er-do-weel's wife had been a simple decent woman of lower birth, who had been dazled into marrying him while he was still handsome and fascinating. Poor thing! Even from her own son's account, one could hear she had paid very dear for her folly. His childhood had been spent in furnished lodgings, each more squalid and disorderly than the last. The scrapegrace father, alternating with circumstances from cruel penuriousness to mocking prodigality, had often clothed his half-fed child in rich velvets, and hidden his wife's bruised arms in Lyons silk. But the poor woman had done her best for her boy. She had taught him all she knew, and then starved herself that he might be taught more. She had striven to screen his father from blame, even while training him to loathe his father's courses. She died first, mercifully spared the last cruel pang of such a death as her husband's.

All this was indicated rather than related by Harry Westbrook, and it touched Mrs. Harvey's motherly heart. She felt that she could not be surprised if Hatty listened to his wooing.

Hatty was a riddle not easy to read. As the young man's attentions advanced her cordiality retreated, but not in the old laughing, skittish way. During his visits she would stay more than half the time in her own room, and then come down grave and silent.

As the family acquaintance with Harry increased, Mrs. Harvey, though she grew to like him more and more, began to have her doubts and fears. It was hard to say that he was not a religious man. He had attended church regularly since they had known him. (He now went to Zion chapel.) He stayed quietly in his dismal lodgings during the intervals of service, in spite of all temptations to seek fresh air and change. He kept a sort of humble, pathetic silence whenever sacred topics crept into conversation, or if he spoke it was just with one or two half-yearning words. And yet—

Still, even if he were not yet "altogether a Christian," how few holy influences he had enjoyed hitherto, poor fellow! There was a good deal of poetry left in Mrs. Harvey, elderly widow as she was, and not all her sharper experiences of life had destroyed the old humble simplicity that had always preferred others to herself. Like an unsuspected skeleton at the bottom of a calm, sunny river, the pain of her own half-sympathetic marriage lay unspoken in her heart. She would pray, and she would exhort, that her daughters might never know what that was. But if Hatty only saw the difference which she could see between this lover and all her other lovers, if her warm, young heart caught the love-version of her own calm, motherly liking for the youth, then it seemed to Mrs. Harvey that her daughter was caught in the grasp of a terrible temptation from whose intricacy she could see no way of escape. Hatty seemed just the sort of woman to refuse to see the entanglement, and to walk straight into it blindfold, and singing.

It seemed to Mrs. Harvey a much harder pass than that agonized decision of hers which had made them all into poor working people. And yet Hatty had always said, "She could never have done that."

There was one thing which Mrs. Harvey forgot. Something which we are all prone to forget. Not that God shows a way of escape along with every temptation. Mrs. Harvey remembered that full well, and reiterated it in her prayers, and tried to take comfort from it; but failed because she could not see the way herself. But she forgot that this was not her temptation, and that there was no need, and, therefore, no promise, that she should see the outlet.

Hatty grew much graver and gentler. She would take her work off to her own room, and sit there alone for hours even when no Harry was haunting the family apartment. A responsibility had fallen on the girl. She had a question to answer to God and to her own soul.

She was such a young thing—scarcely nineteen yet—and still it was two months ago since Harry had said to her: "Miss Harvey, you must know what you are to me. Do you think you can like me?"

They were walking in the twilight, for he had waylaid her on some household errand. And Hatty had found that the easiest answer was the truth.

"Of course I like you, Mr. Westbrook."

"Don't say it so," he had answered, hotly. "I mean can you love me better than anybody else, and forever and forever? Don't say a word now, it would be too hasty either way. Think it over, and tell me when I ask you again. You must be everything to me or nothing."

None of her other simple lovers had ever spoken so. And it was those last words of his that haunted her—"everything or nothing." Could he be everything? Would it be a very praiseworthy or happy life that had him for its highest point? And yet would not his utter withdrawal make a very unbearable blink?

Hatty did not put it so. She had never talked metaphysics with George and Milly; but she said to herself: "I wonder if all my ways are his ways, and if not, I wonder if I could give up mine for his. I don't quite know what his ways are, I'm not even sure that he has any yet, and if so, then who knows what they will be? He's lived a sad, unsettled life, poor boy—always 'in tarts,' as our minister would say. One never hears him talk about things near at hand and likely. It would be better to think about a rise in his salary than of what he'd do if he had five hundred a year. That only seems a worry to me, and enough to hinder one getting on at all. But religion is nothing unless it makes us charitable to the ways of those who have had disadvantages. And I'm sure if I'd been in Harry's place, I'd not been near as good as he is: I don't think that I am really as good now, if only he could see a few things a little differently. I wish he had not told me that he never cared to go to church till he saw me. Mother does not know that, and have I any right to tell her what poor Harry said in strict confidence, only to show me what a good influence I had over him?"

And so there was rather a bewildering complication that night when Harry Westbrook announced to Mrs. Harvey that "he had received hopes that he himself might some day call her mother."

"What, are you and Hatty really engaged?" Mrs. Harvey asked.

"It's no use saying engaged," Hatty had spoken up, rather decisively for a young lady in her interesting position, and with a swift flush passing over her face. "It's no use saying engaged till one knows when one expects to be married. And we don't want to be married for a long while yet."

"I shall have to be rude enough to bid you speak for yourself," said the lover, gallantly.

"I can't understand you one bit," Milly said to Hatty that evening when they were both shut up in their bedroom. "You were never angry with the ridiculous people who made you offers, and now, although you are going to accept Harry's, you seem half as if you resented it."

"I don't understand myself, and I don't try much, because I ain't worth the trouble," Hatty answered.

"I do hope you will take care what you do," Milly went on; "don't play false in your thoughtlessness. Harry is just the man who could be terribly injured by want of heart in the woman he loves."

Hatty gave a low whistle. It was a shocking habit of hers, generally indulged in, when, in her own phraseology, she had something to say, which she could not "bring out."

"Yes, indeed, Hatty," Milly urged, in her young enthusiasm, "you may have his welfare for this world and the next in your own hands."

"Mayn't he have mine, in his turn?" Hatty inquired humbly.

"Men are different to women," Milly answered, loftily.

"I think I'm a very old woman to you," Hatty observed, as it seemed inconsequently. "I ain't got any romance in me; at least, not your sort."

"You shouldn't give Harry hopes unless you love him," said Milly.

Hatty said not a word, and did not whistle. Milly's advice, like most advice in love affairs, was given in the dark. There was much in Harry's history and character, over which the motherliness of Hatty's nature yearned with an infinite dumb tenderness, and which gave an agony of strength to his appeals for her love. And she must be "everything or nothing," and she really loved him far too well for that dread alternative. Indeed, Hatty had such a clinging kindness for every human being with whom she had ever come in contact, that she had rejected the shoemaker and the saddler with all the less pain, because she would still see them, day after day, in their old places, and she had never felt quite comforted concerning them until they had resumed their former habits of neighborly greeting and chat, and had, in fact, quite settled it in their own minds, that they had never had more than "a foolish fancy" for her.

But, in her own heart, Hatty had long laid down laws concerning the marriage state, to which she clung with that narrow persistency which is the weakness of an uncultivated mind, and yet so often its best stronghold. Very few need to open a grammar, if it were no use to learn a rule, unless one could remember all its exceptions. And it is better to forget a real exception, than to make a false one.

One of her rules was of the headship of the husband over the wife; in her own words, "that no woman should marry a man she could not look up to." She made no philosophic distinction about mental and moral powers, laws of compensation, etc., all of which are not without their wisdom and justice, but which often sacrifice clearness to effect like "Old English" letters on a sign-post.

She had often said, half playfully, half seriously, "If my husband wanted coffee, and I wanted tea, I'd like him to be the sort of man to whom I give his own way directly, without even letting him know it wasn't mine."

Now, ninety-nine people out of a hundred—Hatty herself and her sister Milly included—would have decided that Harry Westbrook was altogether the superior of the couple. He was better read, and, in every conventional sense, he was better bred, for he made no mispronunciations, nor indulged in the rough-and-ready phrases with which Hatty liked "to cut her way straight into a truth." And yet Hatty felt herself noways inclined to give up her own ways to his, and was actually beginning to doubt whether her old admiration of such dutiful surrender was not a mere girlish folly.

Mrs. Harvey did not grow better satisfied with her future son-in-law. He was as well-behaved as ever, but in the quicker current of their more familiar acquaintance, little straws began to show which way the wind blew.

"My hair has fallen out a great deal lately," Hatty chanced to say.

"Oh, we must stop that," Harry replied with solicitude. "You have such lovely hair, and I admire beautiful hair so much. Indeed, I think everybody does. A woman is nothing without her pretty hair."

"Then what is she to do if it all falls out?" Hatty asked, only half archly.

"Wear a wig," said he.

"Well, yes, if she was a disagreeable sight without one," Hatty answered; "but I wouldn't wear one without telling everybody that it was a wig. I hate deceptions."

"But you need say nothing about it," said Harry.

"There's sure to be something to make one mention one's 'hair,'" Hatty retorted, "and whenever that happened I should say 'my wig' instead."

"Is not that straining truth too far?" Harry asked.

"You can't strain truth," said Hatty; "truth is truth, and everything else is lies."

"Well, if you were wearing a wig, I myself would rather not know it," Harry observed.

"I fear you set too much value on perishable externals, Harry," said Mrs. Harvey, very gravely, and her heart grew sore to feel how soon the hard work and many cares of young, needy married life, would wear away the physical bloom and beauty which even the mother was half afraid were Hatty's chief charms in the eyes of her lover.

"I hope you pray to God to guide you, dear," she would often say to her daughter. "I think only God can guide us in these matters, for our dearest friends do not know what will really be best for us. Ask Him to lead you to what will keep you nearest Himself, dear, and pray Him to keep out of your heart anything that can come between you and your love for Him. Better give up anything than Him."

And then the mother would sigh within herself, feeling that this daughter of hers was cast in no heroic mould. Not that she feared Hatty would wilfully hold everything cheap in purchase of a brief day of false, passionate love. A woman must have gone far downward, before Satan tempts her to try that turning. But had Hatty the determination which can tear up what has taken root deep in the soul? Besides, what was to urge her to such decision? The young man could not be said to have deteriorated. At least, Mrs. Harvey could not feel sure that he had, though she sometimes thought he seemed a little changed—less serious, more trifling. The first was, their early acquaintance with him had been like one of those fair-shimmering spring evenings, which promise such a glorious day, and yet sometimes die away into a gray, dull noon—so imperceptibly that you could not say when the last sunshine finally faded out.

There was only one person in the little social circle who had never given Harry more praise than a dubious "Heigh!" and who now spoke out plainly. This was Miss Brook.

"I never liked him," she declared stoutly. "Hatty had better have married the saddler, for he is a honest, well-doing young fellow. I'm glad he's got somebody to take him. I looked in upon him and his new wife yesterday, and their pretty parlor does him credit. It's quite a picture."

"But one does not marry for a pretty parlor," Mrs. Harvey remarked, laughing, half sadly.

"No, but one marries for what gets one," said Miss Brook, severely. "It's eighteen months since this young spark first saw our Hatty, and a whole year since he first had the impudence to speak about her to you, and what the nearer is he to being married? Wasn't it only our Hatty's own good sense that saved her from parading a trumpery ring on her finger, and looking like a fool to the whole parish?"

"What can he do?" asked Mrs. Harvey, forlornly.

"Do! Work all night, and live on bread and water by day! Do! Anything!"

"He would only break down his constitution."

"Fiddlesticks! Constitutions are made to be broken down one way or another, and you must take your choice between. Don't a long, lingering, diddle-daddling engagement break down a woman's constitution?"

"I'm afraid it often does," Mrs. Harvey said, with a sigh.

"More than often. And wastes her life as well, for it's an awful strain working with one's hands in one place and one's heart in another. And yet I'd bid a true woman wait for her lover twenty years if there was any God's reason why he should not marry her out of hand. But if he's only sparing and saving his own precious constitution, I'd leave him free to do the same to the end. A man can no more take his constitution with him to Heaven than he can take his silver and gold. He's only got to make the best use of it in this life, and it's generally as true with it as with money that there is which scattereth and yet increaseth."

"It was my plea, remember, not Harry's," said Mrs. Harvey.

"If I was a young man, with a girl waiting to marry me when I could afford to take her, would I go and buy fine new satin stocks at four and sixpence?" asked Miss Brook, with withering sarcasm. "Would I have a single pair of gloves in my possession, let alone three pairs, one lemon colored? These wouldn't be my ways, Mrs. Harvey; and I'm double sure they would not be your own."

"For Hatty's sake and his own, we must hope he will grow wiser," said Mrs. Harvey. "But the poor lad has had but little enjoyment in his life, and is likely to feel it hard to be called to so much self-sacrifice."

"So much self-sacrifice!" echoed Miss Brook, with a snort which meant more than a dozen dictionaries could convey. "But it's the way with human nature. Whenever there's one, like yourself, that's lifted an hundredweight, you are always so fearful that another may be crushed beneath an ounce!"

"What can I do?" sighed Mrs. Harvey. "Certainly I am not satisfied about Harry. With all his moral conduct and correct outward observances, I fear he is not a thoroughly Christian man. But how can I expect an affectionate girl, seeing everything through the first light of love, to believe this? There seems too much in his favor. It would be different did he go into gayeties and dissipation."

"Go! There is no go in him!" said Miss Brook. "He won't even go to the dogs—he'll wait till they come to him. He wants a good moral electric shock—something that will go right across the torpid grain of him."

In truth, though Hatty did not own it to herself, she was not happy in her love-affair. The sunshine seemed gone off the world; faith and energy lay tranced in her heart. How was she to know that this was actually the consequence of the evening visits and chats, which, indeed, were assuming an undue position, as the only charms of her life? She still taught in the Sunday-school, but her class was not as attractive as it used to be, and she had lost two or three of her best scholars, and really sometimes gave a serious consideration to Harry Westbrook's frequent hints that she should resign her post. Not that she showed any falling off in zeal or diligence that was perceptible to the old minister or to Mr. Webber, the superintendent. Hatty's conscience was still in her work, though her enthusiasm had faded. There was no comfort in sermons now-a-days, and no relief in prayer. Hatty's sole safety lay in the misery that she felt because this was so. It was the one imperishable seal of her redemption. She was inside the Father's house, though she had left her sheltered seat by the hearth, to stand shivering on the threshold.

And then Harry Westbrook lost his situation. He had applied for an increase of salary, and his application not being immediately granted, it had seemed to him a right and prudent course to menace his employer by unpunctuality and negligence.

"I thought I would show him what I was worth," said Harry.

And perhaps he did—only the employer showed him the door.

"But I have not quarrelled with him—oh, dear, no," Harry explained. "I have been in to see him, and had quite a pleasant chat only this morning. And I've quite talked him over to understand that he did not really dismiss me, but that I grew dissatisfied, and left to better myself."

And open, truthful Hatty said not a word. She had learned that it was no use. Remonstrance only led to a war of words, in which his subtler wit always bore off the victory, and left the pain with her.

"Harry Westbrook is a fool and worse," was the comment of her Brother George. "Give him up, Hatty, and don't waste another thought upon him."

"Give him up, in his hour of trial and adversity!" said Milly. "Hatty is no true woman if she can do that. Only let her be faithful, and she will be sure to win her reward."

True words indeed! But with a truth beyond Milly's romance.

Harry did not find it easy to obtain a new appointment better than that he had lost. One or two worse ones offered themselves, but he rebelled against "going backward." Yet presently he would have been very glad of another chance of these. He had saved but little, and was soon deep in debt at his lodgings. Hatty heard all the details of the misery; how he was bullied and insulted—how once he walked the streets the whole night rather than confront his landlord, who became so alarmed, that he came out to look for his lodger, and, glad to find him safe and sound, led him home without one angry word for that time.

Any one who knows a woman's nature can guess how blindly and devotedly Hatty clung to him now. When nobody knows what of bitter change and agony any day may bring forth, every trifling endearment or petty act of good nature, assumes such a cruel, wringing pathos!

Everybody openly blamed him now. "They had all turned against him in his trouble," she cried, in desperation, only wishing in her inmost heart that she could really feel it was so.

"It often seems so," her mother said, with sad gravity. "His troubles have shown what he is. But if, after what has passed, he became heir to a million, you would find that my censures would only become doubly as strong."

And yet, while Mrs. Harvey did not spare her daughter from hearing the severest judgments on her lover, and repeatedly expressed her decided opinion as to Hatty's proper course, she never personally urged her to give him up. She felt it too sacred a matter for the pressure of even a mother's authority. Such giving up must be voluntary to be effectual. A bitter life is better than a blighted one, and it is useless to break off an engagement, if a heart breaks with it.

CHAPTER VII.

MATED FOR LIFE.

IT was an unusually damp and trying November. The house was dull and dreary as it had never been before; for Hatty was benumbed and depressed, and everybody else was silent and sad for her sake. Not that she neglected her domestic work. There were days when she "tidied" with doubled, desperate energy; but the little touches of gaiety were gone—the pink jug was no longer artfully put in front of the green plate. "It did not matter" now with Hatty, while to her mother, for the first time fully comprehending of what lightness and ease of heart these little things had been symbolic, it did matter very much indeed.

There came a single heavy knock upon the door. Hatty started. She started at every knock now. Then she went to open it. Though she had seen Harry the evening before, she had all sorts of vague fears about people with news of a dead body discovered, with a letter from her upon it. Instead of this tragedy, she found only a rough errand lad whom she knew to be in the service of Mr. Webber, the Sunday-school superintendent.

"Our housekeeper is taken sudden bad with the erysipelas, miss," he said, "and I dare say you know, miss, the three children has the whooping-cough. Says our housekeeper, says she, 'I'd be easy in my mind, if Miss Harvey would come round for the day, for she's a fine hand with sick children,' and I wish you would, miss, for the master has been up and down with them all night, and now he's up and down out of the shop, and he looks like a ghost, miss. Ain't you well yourself, miss?"

"Oh, yes, I'm quite well," Hetty answered, a little inclined to feel it "a bother" that her own afflictions were not of that ostensible kind which entitles the sufferer to the luxury of strict retirement. She actually hesitated a whole minute before she said: "Tell the housekeeper I'll come."

She went back into the house to finish something she was about. As she was putting on her bonnet, she said: "One can't refuse when one's asked; but I wish people would let me alone."

"No you don't, Hatty," said her mother, gently. "You only fancy so. I know better." She was glad of an outer-world interest for the girl.

Hatty turned and kissed her. She was usually very demonstrative among her nearest and dearest.

"It's nice to hear you say so," she sighed, "but I'm getting sick of myself."

And so she went away. Turning into the Mile-End Road, she met Harry Westbrook.

He walked on a few yards with her. He had no hopeful word to say. There was no luck for him in the world, and he wished he was out of it. He was only a burden to her, he knew that. And she did not need any burdens, it seemed to him her life was hard enough already. He only wished he was a rich man, that he might take care of her. For himself, perhaps the grave was the best inheritance. Then he said good-bye; it was an unpleasant, foggy morning, to be out in. He should have liked to see her again in the evening, but he begged her not to hasten home a moment earlier on his account—only he should like to see her, for there was no knowing how little longer he might see her at all. Good-bye again.

The clouds, through which her mother's words had let a little sunshine, closed again over Hatty. But she went patiently on her way.

Mr. Webber kept a large shop, and described himself as "a bookseller and stationer, wholesale and retail," but his literary stock seldom got beyond spelling-books, ready-reckoners and elegant letter-writers, and his best profits were on grocers' stationery, packing-paper and cardboard for fancy boxes. He was a widower, and his three motherless children had, till lately, been "boarded out" in the country, whence they had now returned, sadly unruly—a sore trial to their patient, pious father, and the prim old woman who managed his household.

Hatty went up to the great first-floor sitting-room, over the shop. The three children were there by themselves. Little Ellen, the youngest, perched uncomfortably on a sofa, coughing and fretful. Dick, the eldest boy, hinting the younger, James, about the room. There was a chorus of delight at Hatty's arrival.

But she went away for a moment to see the invalid housekeeper. She was an ancient spinster, as kind and good as she could possibly be, but one of those women who are positively terrified with the management of children. It had been bad enough while they were well. Their sickness had driven her almost frantic, and Hatty felt quite sure that her convulsions had been the active cause of her utter disablement.

"It's all very fine to say it's only a common child's disease," said the good woman, gasping in her darkened room; "but what's the doctor been examining Dick's chest for, and saying we must take great care of him for as strong as he seems? I should just like to let the doctor himself try to take care of Dick Webber, that I should! And then he says they must do this, and they mustn't do that; but yet I must be considerate, and not cross 'em—the cough makes children so nervous. I'd like to see the doctor make little Ellen drink mutton-broth without crossing of her! But it will be all right to-day, now you've come, Miss Harvey, for you've a genius for it."

Not at all nonplussed, Hatty went to her task, and found it sufficiently engrossing to make her own anxieties grow very far off. She knew all sorts of lively games, which yet did not knock the children's sorely-needed breath out of their bodies. When Mr. Webber came up to dinner, he blessed her in his heart. He looked pale and worried, poor man, for it was a busy time in the shop, and he had all a father's feelings and a man's helplessness. Bad as was the day, he had not hesitated to run out, that he might himself choose a toy for his little white-faced Ellen, who looked so dreadfully like her mother in her last illness. His kindness was its own reward, for Hatty, with her quick woman's wit, made it a stringent condition "that now papa had been so good as to buy such a pretty doll, Ellen must take her broth without saying a word to fidget him, or else surely she would be ashamed to look at his nice present."

It was the most peaceful meal that Mr. Webber had enjoyed for a long time, and he felt quite loth to leave the snug, bright room, for the cold, damp shop. He actually indulged himself in ten minutes' chat before the fire.

"But I must be off at last," he said, cheerily. "Dear me, but the shop I half shrink from to-day, would have seemed a paradise to me, compared with the cold, damp outhouse I worked in, in my young days. But nobody need complain when their hard lines comes early. And as for fun and excitement, it comes natural in those rough ways. And there's worse mental exercise than pulling hard at the two ends to make them meet."

Mr. Webber was a little plain man, who did not talk immaculate grammar, and whose education was solely made of the strange odds and ends of religious magazines, mutual improvement societies, and the like. Yet the world was the better for Mr. Webber by one godly home, and one honest Christian example.

"I only wish Harry was a little like him," sighed Hatty. "Every hardship would grow easy then."

Mr. Webber saw a pretty picture when he came up after tea, to release Hatty from her labors. The two youngest children, weak and easily wearied, had fallen asleep on the sofa, and for their sake Hatty had put the candle behind the screen. She was seated in the firelight, with Dick beside her in the great arm-chair, which was quite roomy for them both. Her arm was round the boy, whose head rested on her shoulder. Mr. Webber could hear their low voices as he came softly up-stairs. Dick used to sit just so in the twilight, giving childish confidences to the mother who had been dead nearly five years already. Dick had never sat so since. His father was often sorely troubled about him. He had to be strict and severe to boisterous lawlessness. He had to be law and justice; but it was with a forlorn sorrow that there was nobody to be restraining mercy. As the good father saw his rebel subdued for once, happy and earnest, his heart grew so full that he could trust himself to eavesdrop no longer, but dashed into the room and broke up the pretty picture.

"I wish Miss Harvey would come and live here always, instead of old Mrs. Gambr!" said the boy that night.

Hatty found Harry Westbrook awaiting her in her own home. George was out. Mrs. Harvey and Milly were both seated at needle-work with their heads bent very low. They both rose up as she entered, and left the room. As Mrs. Harvey passed out she took Hatty's face between her hands and kissed it fervently.

Astonished, Hatty turned to Harry. His face was bright and eager, and he stretched out his hand and drew her fondly toward him.

"All the terror is over, darling," he said. "I have the offer of a good appointment. I got it through my old employer. I shall be able to marry you directly, and we shall live in such ease and luxury, for the climate is healthy and native service is cheap in the hill-country of India."

Hatty put her hand to her forehead, and her heart felt cold and dead.

"It may seem hard to you to go at first," Harry went on, blithely; "but you will have me, darling? Surely, you will be quite satisfied with having me, all to yourself? For my part, I am glad to go, I shall like the change, and a change for so much the better. We shall be waited on like princes, over there, Hatty. No common people always treating my beauty as an equal, and worrying her to help them out of their troubles."

Hatty drew herself away from him. Her mother or her neighbors would scarcely have known the handsome girl as she gazed at her lover then. The outlines of her face looked strong and hard. Her voice was deep and harsh.

"I cannot go with you, Harry. I cannot leave everything else. Oh, Harry, I dare say you will call me false and fickle. But I cannot—cannot—cannot leave everything else to go away with you."

He might have thought that her words could be presently combated, but there was in them a cry of agony—a tortured rending in two—which he could not mistake.

"Have not I heard you preach that man or woman should leave father and mother and cleave only to wife or husband?" he asked, with a passionate bitterness.

"Yes, yes," she cried, "the Book says so, and it is so. Unless it is so there is no true marriage. Unless a woman would cheerfully follow a man to the ends of the earth, she ought not to marry him. She has not the true wife's love for him. I have loved you—yes, Harry, I have, I have, among other things. But all by yourself, I don't love you enough. I can't tell how it is, Harry, you know I'm not clever. But I'm thankful you asked me to go to India, because as I can't say 'Yes,' it shows me I'm not meant to be your wife anywhere. I hope I haven't done you any harm already, Harry, but it wouldn't undo that to do you the greatest harm of all, and go on to be your wife now I know I oughtn't to be."

"It is quite natural that you should feel leaving your mother and sister, Hatty," he pleaded, "but if you would only be patient and think of me you would be able to bear it."

"No, no," she wailed. "Perhaps I might for some people—I don't know, maybe I haven't got enough heart for such deep love. But I can't do it for you. I'd be a happier and a better woman, living here, an old maid, just going wherever she was wanted, and doing whatever nobody else cared to do. I'd have more satisfaction in that, Harry. Oh, forgive me, forgive me!"

"Shall I stay at home?" he asked, mournfully. "Or shall I go away there till I have earned some money, and then come home again and try to settle down?"

"Not for me!" she said. "This has come like a flash of lightning, and shown us what a dangerous way we are in. Because the lightning goes out the way doesn't get safer, Harry. If this had not come to test us, Harry, I might have married you, and lived to grow what you wouldn't like, nor God either."

"And you don't think you'll miss me when I'm gone?" he pleaded.

"I shall! I know I shall," she owned, with a burst of tears. "But I don't know that I shall miss you more than I should what I should leave if I went with you."

"I think you are putting too much stress upon very natural feelings," Harry observed, more hopefully. "I dare say most women who have gone with their husbands to foreign lands heartily wish themselves at home again, and wonder how they could have come away. Yet it is but simple homesickness, and wears away in time."

"Yes, yes, Harry," she interrupted; "I know it is so. I have heard mother say that one may often wonder how one had strength for this or that, and feel that one couldn't have it again. But then one had it at the time it was wanted, and one thanks God for that. I haven't it, Harry. I've felt for a long time that this was coming somehow."

"What! that you meant to give me up?" he said, stepping back, stung.

"No," she said; "but I've felt something was wrong. Life didn't fit me, and I don't think it really fitted you, either."

They sat silent. Both their heads were buried in their hands, and great tears kept falling on the table between Hatty's fingers.

She looked up at last.

"When do you go?" she asked.

"In five weeks' time," he answered, heavily. "I am required to leave for Southampton the day after to-morrow. I meant to return here to be married last thing before I sailed."

Another silence.

"You'll want a great outfit," she said.

"Yes," he replied; "it will be easily bought. My new master makes an allowance for that. He would have made an allowance for you, too."

"Harry," said Hatty, eagerly, "don't buy everything. Let me do some sewing for you—it will show me that you forgive me."

He looked at her earnestly.

"You shall have some, Hatty," he said. "That shows me you mean all you're saying. I believe that—you do love me—but not in the wife's way. Make me up anything you like, and send it to my lodgings. I'll say good-bye now. Don't speak another word. And don't come out to the door. I can't stand it."

She sat still where she was, till she heard the street door close, and his heavy footsteps pass the little courtyard. She still sat motionless, till her mother and Milly came creeping back with eyes full of fearful interrogations.

"Harry is gone," she said, quietly. "It is all over. I could not go away with him. Don't talk to me about it."

And she rose and went away to her own dark chamber, and did not come in again to supper.

But next morning she prepared breakfast as usual, and then went out and bought some fine linen, and set herself diligently to make it up into the most elaborate shirts. It was the dainty shroud of a still-born love.

She did not see Harry Westbrook again before he died. A little note from him acknowledged the receipt of her farewell gift. Mrs. Harvey, Milly, and even George, all read it. Anybody might have done so.

"MY DEAR HARRIET: Thank you for your token of remembrance. You have always been very good to me, as you are to everybody, and I shall owe you much of my pleasantest recollection of England. As for what is left, you would not have given it me but in kindness, and I hope it will do me good, that you need never feel that you did anything but what was right. My best love to all, and "I remain, always yours gratefully,

"HARRY WESTBROOK."

"There must be a great deal of good in him, after all," said Mrs. Harvey, whitfully.

"Yes, very likely, if you stirred him well up," commented vigorous Miss Brook. "The worst of the people with a great deal of good in them is, that few are ready to tell 'em there's more evil! Our Hatty has been a true friend to Harry Westbrook."

Good Miss Brook's active interest in the Harvey household was rewarded by a sweet sense of property therein. Between Mrs. Harvey and her the children were always "ours."

The mother had no more reason to fear any flights or vagaries in Hatty. Her life had had that priceless touch of responsibility and sorrow, which gave her ripening beauty a sweet, womanly sedateness, and shamed away the light, shallow love which had before haunted her footsteps. As months and months went by, and she still remained so serenely sober, so solitary among her old associations, Mrs. Harvey actually began to think that after all Hatty might become an old maid.

To be sure, George and Milly had got into such a habit of laughing over Hatty's lovers, that they could not leave it off, but must sometimes twit her about Mr. Webber, and the regularity with which he kept her supplied with a loan of Sunday books. Hatty bore it with her old patience for a long while, but at last she flushed tearfully, and sobbed, "That she had let them laugh about a good many, and they might, as long as they liked; but they had no right to make game of a good, serious man like Mr. Webber."

"Certainly not," chimed in Mrs. Harvey, quite innocently. "It is natural that Hatty should not like to hear any foolery about an old friend, for whom she has such a deserved respect."

She was still as profoundly innocent, when one evening Mr. Webber called and inquired pointedly for Mrs. Harvey.

"Something about that delicate little daughter of his," said the good lady, as she adjusted her cap and bustled to receive him, only to be confounded by such incoherent speech as this.

"Your daughter Harriet—have long seen her inestimable value—I am not young—nor at all worthy. But she says she can look over that. My dear children's best interests safe in her kind hands. Home like home again. My boy Dick worships her. So good, she would not make a fuss about anything, but shall have new carpets and papers, and everything right. May suit her better than a younger man. She says she can honor me—I don't know what for. Hope you will pardon what must seem like impudence in a widower and middle-aged, but we both want your blessing, and I'll do my duty to your child, as I know she'll do the same by mine."

"And can you really love him better than poor Harry?" Milly asked in another chamber conference.

"I know I'd go to Van Dieman's Land with James Webber if he asked me," said Hatty, bravely, with a strong light in her beautiful eyes, and a tender quiver round her mouth. "James Webber carries God in his heart, and that would make it home wherever he went."

There was a quiet wedding, with Milly and little Nelly Webber for bridesmaids, and then the wedded pair took the three step-children with them on their week's honeymoon at Richmond. There was no such long difference between the ages of the husband and wife as to make a romance or a scandal. She was twenty-two and he was thirty-eight.

Miss Brook officiated at the marriage, terrible in an old brocade that had done service in the days of her youth. She went through the ceremony so diligently that she even echoed the portions set apart for the bride and bridegroom.

She drove home in the same fly with Mrs. Harvey, and could not resist making a few personal observations.

"Ain't you sorry now that Hatty put such a many stakes down in her own place, that she couldn't strike tents and off at any word like a marching soldier? Can't you see now, that them God doesn't give much romanticalness to are just those that haven't got what is necessary to keep romanticalness from being sheer rubbish? Can't you see now that from every temptation God makes the way of escape suitable to the nature He offers it to? Is He a mocker that He should bid a rabbit save its life by running up a tree, and a cat by burrowing in the ground?"

And so Hatty settled down to the homely, loving life that was fittest to bring out the best of her, and to make her of most service to God in this world.

PART II.—HOW GOD GUIDED A GENIUS.

CHAPTER I.—THE TALENT PUT TO INTEREST.

ALL through his diligent boyhood and youth, George Harvey lived a kind of double life. He might talk over some of his duties and prospects to his mother and sisters, but the real secrets of his working existence remained in his own heart. If Mrs. Harvey had known all, she might have felt goaded to snatch him from it, at any cost, as a brand from the burning.

George's was a very hard place to begin with. It was easy to describe himself as "reading boy," and to speak only of his wonderful trials and successes in his old skill in deciphering writing. To the brave, manly lad, it was equally easy to be silent about the errand-going, window-cleaning and office-cleansings, which earned more than half his humble wages. When George's hands looked unaccountably red and scarified, there was always some reasonable account of a seasonable and obliging assistance which had been required in the matter of presses and types. It was the truth certainly, but it was not the whole truth, nor yet one quarter of it.

Oh, reader, in thy praiseworthy severity toward shams, include not under that name all things which are not precisely what they seem. Was He an impostor who supped at Emmaus in the guise of a stranger? Stop the counterfeit coin, and destroy its baseness forever, but condemn not the foreign piece which thou hast taken unawares into thy purse. It may not be good to pay thy baker's bill, but it may be worthy to grace a royal cabinet. Askest thou, what is the use of the secresies, and euphonisms behind which grow up only fair flowers of endurance and sacrifice? Askest thou, why should not the world see these beauties, these virtues? Why dost thou store thy dainty plants in winter? Why dost thou not leave them open to sweeten the north-east wind, and enliven the snowy landscape? Answer that question, and then be content to love even thy nearest and dearest, in the faith that they offer to God far sweeter blossoms than they can ever give thee in this world.

and his many crowding fancies!—no loving heart less tender and true than the heart of his Heavenly Father could have borne to see him, in his little greasy apron, rubbing away at smoky windows with sore, chapped hands, or going from tap-room to coffee-house, collecting the unctuous dinners of the ribald journeymen. He patronised the exact side-streets where he knew his mother would never see him. He met Milly once, and exhorted her "not to tell," and she was worthy of him; and did not, and never even mentioned it to himself, till years and years afterward. And surely God wrote down his name in His book of heroes—a larger volume and of a totally different contents, to any such work current in this world.

In their most prosperous days, George had enjoyed a small weekly allowance, which he had always hoarded for the purchase of books. But this was now set afar off, among unattainable luxuries. He had just to go over and over again, his old Heather, his old "Pilgrim's Progress," and his very ancient and battered Plutarch's Lives. He was often very tired of these at first; the mystery was that he grew less and less so. He did not remember that a sage had said, "Fear the man of one book."

George's scrambling duties led him among many varied people. He did not make friends as his Sister Hatty did. Or, rather, he made friends to himself, but was not made a friend of. He filled his own heart and imagination rather than entered into others'. He really knew more about many people to whom he never spoke an unnecessary word, than did Hatty of those with whom she sat and chatted for hours.

There was the woman at the boiled-beef shop. George knew quite well that she had been a great deal better brought up than the vulgarly handsome "master" who sat in her parlor smoking a long clay pipe. George quite understood that she was very unhappy, and though her eyes were red for weeks after her baby died, still George did not think she was altogether sorry. Heaven preserve the little printer boy, but he had his private doubts, which he would not have breathed to a living soul, whether she was really "Mrs. Smith." He always put her wasted tawdry figure into Hatty's song of—

"Oh, no, we never mention her,
Her name is quite forgot."

And yet she was kind to the little quiet printer boy, and let him look over her shop-bundles of waste-paper, and pick out whatever he chose.

Then there was "Mr. Rollo," who wrote poetry, and got George's master to print it on credit. Mr. Rollo had been a wealthy tradesman's son, but he had been quite above the shop. He could not find Helicon in the cellar, nor Parnassus behind the counter. It staggered George at first, and he thought Mr. Rollo a shrinking, sensitive soul, too "sweet" and "light" for this hard work-a-day world. With Mr. Rollo in his eye, George even wrote a secret stanza about—

"That lofty soul, that noble mind,
Which no fit resting-place can find,
But bravely meet its lonely doom,
And only asks—a poet's tomb!"

But George presently discovered that if Mr. Rollo could not find Helicon and Parnassus in the shop, he seemed to find them in still stranger places. Did he think the gutter was Helicon, that George had to pick him out of it, one fine winter evening? Did he think the police-cell was Parnassus, that he went there regularly every two or three months for blacking "Mrs. Rollo's" eyes? Why had he married poor Mrs. Rollo, if he did not like her?—and George could not wonder if he did not, for she was vulgar, fat and loud. By and by George heard that Mrs. Rollo had a little money! It was altogether a shock to one's ideas to think—

"That Heaven-born genius so should fall!"

But still poor Rollo was kind; he was the very first person to whom George ventured to show his own rhymes, and Rollo lent him Crabbe's "Poems," and Walter Scott's "Antiquary," and patted the boy's shoulder and said, with something very like a tear in his fishy eyes, "that he'd better stick to his work, and that would make a man of him."

Poor little George! Once he set his boyish heart on buying a bound and ruled book wherein to copy his poetical efforts. These things were not so cheap sixty years ago as they are now, and it was a very common-looking thing, priced eighteen pence, on which George set his fancy. But his wish was a profound secret. Nobody knew that he wrote poetry, and yet the longing for utterance was so strong with him, that it seemed to him as if an invisible public would read and sympathize, if once his rhymes were legibly written out! He used to picture to himself how he might die, and his writings be found afterward, and his name made immortal! Morbid fancy of green youth, fruit of folly and not of genius! But in his case the sacred salt of genius preserved it from corruption into mere egotism. For he hoped it might bring friends to help his mother and sisters when he was gone!

But the practical part of the question was about this eighteen pence, and what were the legitimate means of secretly acquiring such a fortune!

Now in the office, there was a young printer, with whom George was on rather more intimate terms than with most of the other men. Mrs. Harvey heard occasional mention of his name—James Murray, but if she had known all about him and his history up and down, she would almost have died of terror for her poor boy's morals and manners.

James Murray did not know how he came by his name. His earliest recollections were of living with his mother in varying sets of furnished apartments. He had known none of the restraints and instructions of even nominally decent homes. He had been born and brought up at the bottom of the blackest pit of human depravity. It was a miracle that he was not a thief, in the coarsest rendering of pick-pocket or burglar, but that was the utmost that could be said of him, for sense of morality he had none.

In birth, in breeding, in that grain of mind and frame which grows out of these, George Harvey and James Murray stood at antipodes. And it was from their very distance that they drew together.

The other men and lads in the place were ordinary work-people, with the common merits and faults of their class—left, at that date, very much in their native "rough." They disliked George, calling all his little ways which differed from theirs, "a setting up," and constantly jealous of the superiority his quickness of mind gained over their untutored strength. They despised James. There were always fights arising out of their coarse insults about his parentage; for though James confided to George that he did not much feel the sting of these, he always made them an excuse to display his physical prowess, as the best proof he could bring forward "that he was as good as they were."

The melancholy mystery of James Murray's whole life gave him a weird interest to George. George had put him into two poems—"The Foundling," and "The Homeless Wail," and we must say that James would not have known himself, and yet, perhaps, his failure would have lain with his own perception, rather than with George's art. Perhaps George, looking straight out of his innocent boyhood, saw the nearest to what God himself saw—a sight utterly sad and pitiful, to make angels weep and fiends rejoice. George was not yet philosopher enough to say coolly "that every human being must have had a chance in life," and so pass by, self-satisfied, on the other side.

James Murray, who kept no "Sunday best," had once, from a lounging post, seen the Harvey family going to church. He could not understand it at all—was as far from it as the best of us are from the angel's song and service. "She's a fine woman, that little chap's mother," he said, afterward. "I'd have liked to go up and speak to 'em, if I'd had on a decent coat."

It was this James Murray who happened one day to tell George that "his old landlady was in an awful pickle, for she'd a swell lodger who wanted his boots cleaned for him, and her own hands were bad with the gout, and she was 'queer' and so suspicious of strangers that she would not have one in, and her own nephew said she might get them done how she liked, for he was above being any man's flunkey."

George thought it over all day long. He was not without a boy's dislike for "menial" work, but he argued within himself, that when he already did so much like it, it was rather foolish not to do a little more, when he wanted eighteen pence so very, very much! "It is easier doing it when one is not forced to do it, too," he argued within himself. "It is the forcing that breaks one's spirit. I should not like to be forced. I should not like mother to have had to say to me, 'George, you must take any sort of place you can get, and you must not be particular what you have to do, for you must earn money.' I came here of my own accord, and I don't see why I shouldn't clean these boots for my own pleasure. This common boy, the old lady's nephew, is afraid of seeming a flunkey, because he is one already. I've heard mother say that nothing honest is beneath a gentleman, because, whatever it is, he can do it from a gentleman's motive, and in a gentleman's way."

Was he a poor little moralist on stilts? Never mind; stilts are only folly at a country fair, but we fancy we remember hearing of a district in Germany where some peculiarity of the soil sets all the sensible people walking on stilts, and only fools trail through the bog!

So George made up his mind to clean the boots, and requested James Murray to introduce him to the "queer" landlady, in case she might be disposed to trust him as not altogether a stranger.

"Well, this is a rum go!" James not unnaturally ejaculated. "Why, I wouldn't do such a thing myself, unless I hadn't a bit of bread to eat without it! But I'll tell her she can trust you—yes, with untold gold on her kitchen table, if she likes, and that's more than she could do with some that pay her rent, I can tell you!"

And so George cleaned the boots, and was pronounced by the old woman "a regular nice, decent lad," and became hateful to her nephew on account of his aunt's praises. The bitterness of the deed was over after it had been done once or twice, and as the old lady's hands were not quite recovered when the eighteen pence was earned, George resolved to go on as long as he was needed. The worse of it was, the walk to and fro took up his small leisure, and prevented him from getting as far as Cheapside to buy the particular book on which he had set his heart. "One can't be earning and spending, too," George said to himself; and, besides, had a capitalist's comfortable inclination to wait and choose the best market.

In the meantime James Murray had been going on very badly indeed. In the lodging-house kitchen, George had learned more about him than he had ever heard before. Now, George regularly read the Youth's Magazine, which the grocer's wife lent his Sister Milly, and its simple, moral stories fired him with a desire to do good, like their Christian heroes and heroines. He wanted to make some drunkard sober, some infidel believe, some Sabbath-breaker attend church. George did not know that he was not a Christian himself, nor did he suspect that Christianity meant any more than these good outward things—except that there was what seemed to George a mere formula attached to his favorite stories, which, in his turn, he was quite ready to repeat, though with no more meaning than the muttering of a magic spell. He was like the poor little bird in the dark inn-kitchen, who mistook a lamp for the sun, and sang its matin at vesper-time! He could not have understood the question, "Do ye fulfil the law of Christ?" for he had not learned that there is no fulfilment of the law out of Christ. But the little dim artificial light he had wanted to share—sure sign that a higher law was working in him than any he yet knew how to obey.

He wanted to do good to James Murray; he "talked" to him very sensibly as to his outward failures and delinquencies, and James was often seriously attentive. But George spoiled all by winding up with religious exhortations, which his unmeaning utterance spoiled as an ignorant translation can spoil the grandest original.

Oh, if the aspiring missionary had only heard his subject's candid opinion of him.

"He's a good enough little chap, but I can't make out half what he means, and I don't believe he can himself."

And yet, never mind. Aspiration is the upward path. Desire precedes fulfilment. Let each, in whatever gibberish he can command, tell his fellow-sufferers and sinners that there is a Fountain of Living Water, and what he believes to be the best way to it. Their empty vessels, big and little, may have to wait awhile before the stream of pardoning love shall fill them. Nobody knows who shall first be filled—the last may be first, and the first last—perchance he who told of the Fountain may fill his own vessel from his who once did not even know that there was such a fountain!

George had been at his "menial" duty nearly six weeks when James Murray sauntered into the kitchen, and throwing himself into one of the chairs, announced: "I ain't going up to work with you to-day; and if the governors think o' sending here to look for me, tell them to save themselves the trouble, for I'll be off within half an hour after you go."

"Off? Where to?" George asked, in astonishment.

James laughed. "Don't know, and don't care," he said, recklessly. "I can't be much worse than in prison, and if I stopped I'd be there to-night."

"What do you mean, Jem?" George inquired, kindly.

"Oh, I've been behaving like 'a warning tract,' or your clever talk, mate. I've gone from bad to worse. I've sworn and drank long enough; now I've been picking and stealing, and when you write my history I don't know whether you'll need stretch your fancy much to just finish off that I died on the gallows at last!"

"What have you stolen?" George asked, knowing the young man quite well enough to accept his plain statement as no exaggeration of fact.

"Was cleaned out last night, and one of the governors had left three shillings and sixpence on the shelf, and I took it up. Old tell-tale Cater saw me, but I said I was taking it home with me to keep it safe from the boys. I tried my luck with it and lost, and ain't got a penny to refund with. I'm deep in debt here, too, so it's a good opportunity to clear all scores by cutting away. I'll enlist, or go out before the mast. I've tried something like a decent life, and made a mull of it, and now I'll try the other."

All for three-and-sixpence! When a soul treads the slimy paths of sin, it takes a very little slip to slide him down that yawning precipice below, whose bottom no man knows.

All for three-and-sixpence! And George Harvey had absolutely four shillings in his pocket carefully wrapped in a fragment of that scribble which he was so modestly anxious to see at least in fair and flowing manuscript.

Honest, enthusiastic little soul! He had not yet heard of the refinements of that delicate philosophy which hesitates to use its powers for good lest it should be guilty of bribery or compulsion! He looked upon this as a glorious opportunity, and it did not cost him half the struggle to give up his earnings as it had to earn them.

"I'll lend you three-and-sixpence, Murray, and you can take it back with you this morning," he said; "but I can't do it unless you'll promise me to sign the pledge, and go to church every Sunday for three months."

"That's stiff conditions, my boy," returned the other, with half a jeer; "I don't think my respectability is worth so much."

"Oh, yes, it is," George urged, adding, not without shrewdness, "and did you not tell me you were to get a rise in your salary in two or three months' time? Do you want to lose all the advantages you've been waiting for so long?"

James whistled. George's earnestness touched him a little, and gave him a momentary glimpse of life in a new light. Like many another, he cheapened and half-suspected the benefit that was thrust upon him.

"Where have you got so much money from?" he asked.

"Out of these boots," said George, laconically.

"I dare say I should never pay you again," James remarked, coolly.

"Never mind," said George.

"How can you tell I'm not hoaxing you because I know you have got a little loose tin?" James presently inquired, with a hoarse laugh.

George gave him one quick glance. "I'll take the chance," he answered.

"Can't you let us off the pledge?" James asked, mockingly. "As for church, I can do that. It's a warm sitting, and it's winter already."

George shook his head. "It is drink that is ruining you," he said, with his premature preciseness. "Church would do you no good, with a gill of brandy in your head."

James reflected. And it struck him that if George lent him this money, he would have no means of enforcing his conditions. He might please him by "turning" into church sometimes, but as for the pledge, he need not take it, or, for that matter, if he did, he could break it.

"You're a briske, young one!" said he. "Give us over the coin."

And George counted out his little hoard.

James scarcely thanked him, but he turned back on the kitchen threshold, to say: "I'd better wait for you to come with me to the office, else I might still cut and run, and take your money with me, without giving you my precious soul in exchange."

The two did not speak much all day; but when the heavy rattle of the presses ceased, and the men began to turn down their sleeves, and wipe their faces, George went up to James.

"I know a place where you can take the pledge. I'm coming with you. There'll be a lecture first. I told mother I was going to hear it, so they don't expect me home till late."

"You're a determined young dog," said James. But he offered no opposition. The lecture might prove "a lark," and there would still be plenty of time to "get off" the pledge at last.

In those days the Temperance movement was not the wealthy or widespread organization which it now is. Gough was not yet born to adorn it with oratory, nor had Mathew yet consecrated it by his zeal. The noble army of self-denial had not arisen, and there were few total abstinents except reformed drunkards.

Yet this simpler state of matters was not without its advantages. Temperance at the table was not then in much danger of breeding intemperance of the tongue. It had not become an element in political life, and it had few advocates except men of simple and vital piety, who were in no danger of mistaking a means for the end, and who fostered little excitement, and less self-laudation.

It was such a man who addressed the meeting that night. The plea with which he came before the people, was after this wise:

There was One who came to live among men, and show what God had meant them to be, and, at last, to die among them, by their hands—to die for them, taking the punishment of their sins upon Himself, that those who would clothe themselves in His righteousness might pass from the just wrath to the pardoning mercies of His Almighty Father. It was on the divine idea of the sacrifice that he dwelt. And when he came at last to press his special plea, it was pointing to the story of the Cross, and urging "that He died in His love for thee; canst thou not do this small thing in love and gratitude to Him?"

There was a grandeur in his simple eloquence.

"For thee Christ gave up His Father's throne, and the worship of angels, and all the indescribable bliss of Heaven. For thee, instead of these, He took up a frail mortal body, and became a poor, despised man, who had not where to lay His holy head:

"For thee He endured temptation, persecution and treachery. For thee He was scourged and spit upon and mocked. For thee He hung among the common malefactors. For thee He bled, and died in agony.

"For His sake, can you not give up the cup that starves you and strips you and slays your wives and children? For His sake can you not give up the glass that seduces you to workhouses and madhouses and jails? For His sake can you not give up the fiery poison, which you will loathe as it should be loathed before you have abstained from it for a year? For His sake, oh, my brethren, can you not give up the deadly drug that will send you besotted to the doom He died to save you from?

"Don't you believe in 'giving up,' my friends? Is there nobody who has ever given up anything for you? (Ay, that there is, like a little Briton, thought James Murray.) And wouldn't you hate yourself for a mean, cowardly worm, if you took their kindness and flung it back in their face? (It is awfully shabby—of course I never meant to do it, thought James Murray.) Then why do you do to your divine Saviour what you wouldn't do to your human friend? If there's one here who feels he hasn't a bit of goodness of his own, and that he don't even know what goodness is, you're the man that Jesus wants, my brother. (Then that's me, thought James Murray.) Come to Him—just as you are. Put your dirty, stained life in His hand, and He will make it pure. And I, as His servant and because I love you for His sake, stand here and entreat you to come and be one of us. If it will help you to tell me your difficulties, I am quite sure Christ has an answer for them all. We want to aid you, as brothers should aid each other, and may the blessing of God be about us all."

"I'm going to stay," whispered James Murray to George. "Don't you wait. I'd rather go up by myself."

He signed the pledge that night.

He repaid George's loan in less than a month. And the next time he was called ugly names in the office, his face turned very red, but he did not offer to fight.

George went with him to many an evening service and Bible reading among his new friends, but he grew often weary where James sat interested and delighted. George thought the difference lay in James's utter ignorance which made every holy thing a pleasing novelty. George became terribly afraid that such a complete change could not last, and that he should have the humiliation of seeing James fall back to his old ways. He could not understand the entire difference in his tone of thought, which was presently manifold. Strangest of all, it was to find how James was heartily ashamed of ways and characteristics which had formerly been his pride—that he no longer called arrogance and brutality "high spirit," nor mistook ribaldry for wit, nor shamelessness for candor.

Poor George, he would have only cut off the tops of the weeds, and because a wiser way had uprooted them, and sown honest corn in their place, he doubted, and was almost glad when James, by and by, went away, with a creditable character, to a better situation in a midland town. As if any body was ever quite lost sight of in this little world, where, if you flee from London to Caffraria, you shall find your old next-door neighbor's brother living in the nearest shanty. Let us take heed what we cast into the sea of life, for it will surely be thrown ashore again at our feet.

And so George's poems were fairly copied out at last.

CHAPTER II.

GEORGE HARVEY'S FIRST SUCCESS.

AND then George's life flowed on very evenly for years. He rose in his employment, and became a first-rate compositor. Many and many an one might have thanked him that in some occult way their lucubrations appeared in proof, with mended punctuation, grammar and even sense. But they only thought "how much better it read in print."

"I would not trouble myself thus for nothing, Harvey," his fellow-workmen would say.

"In all labor there is profit," George smiled in reply. He grew more popular as he grew older.

But all through those quietly prosperous years, there ran a strong under-current of excited interest. George must have been about seventeen when he first sent a "poem" to a magazine. He did it in secret, and when he had done it, he trembled to think what an awkward revelation its return would make. For George gave his own name and his own address, too open to think of any double dealing, and too generous and unsophisticated to suspect that his lowly habitation might offer no attraction to the editorial eye.

But George need not have troubled himself about "returned MS" that time—no, nor for long afterward. Not until his mother and sisters had guessed the mystery of his interminable copyings, and watched for the postman's knock as eagerly as he did himself.

"Do not speak to him about it, girls," exhorted Mrs. Harvey. "Wait till he speaks himself. Suspense and disappointment are often easiest borne in silence."

"But he might show his writings to us," Hatty had protested. "Because the stupid magazine people don't care for these, he needn't think we shouldn't." And it became a stereotyped form of unfavorable criticism with her.

"I'm sure George could have done better than that."

George actually greeted it as a step made in the right direction, when his papers began to come back "with thanks." But why need we go into all the details of a story which in some form is as old as genius itself? Why need we tell of the sour editor, who made the poor lad wander for two hours in the dark in Hackney Fields, by scrawling over the back of his very best production, "Let the writer learn a useful trade, and forget that he had ever the folly and presumption to think of verse-making?" Why need we tell of the kind editor—no, it was an editress!—who lifted him into the seventh heaven by writing him a pretty little note (which had a deep black border), saying, "You only need patience and cultivation. You have the gift, and it lies now in your own hands. I can appreciate your poems, in spite of their technical crudeness, and they have touched me—you may guess how much, for I could not find time to write thus fully to many of my would-be contributors. They remind me of my younger and brighter self, before I had lost faith in everything but blue skies and green grass. I should like to see you, but will not, for my acquaintance would be no real benefit to you."

It made George very happy when he read it. It was the first warm grasp of a comrade's hand. Years after, when he read it again, it made him very sad; for, by that time he had learned enough to read a woeful tale between the lines.

Despairing of the magazines, George collected his poems, and resolved to face a publisher. He chose one who had recently issued a little book something in the style of his own production. How it would have daunted George had he known that its author had published strictly on his own account, and was already fifty pounds the poorer for the transaction!

George left the packet of poems and a very modest letter, saying he would call again in a few days. He did so, and a smirking shopman told him that if he waited a moment, he thought "Mr. Dunbar would see him." And George sat down to wait. He fancied that a superior-looking young man, seated behind a desk, looked pointedly at him; but ere he had time even to return the glance, the shopman came back and summoned him to Mr. Dunbar's presence, warning him familiarly that "he would have to speak up well, for the governor was dreadfully deaf," and with great trepidation, George entered the dreadful sanctum.

"Come in, come in and sit down, my lad," said a cheerful, rubicund old gentleman. "And so you write poems, do you? Bless me, you look very young! And what else can you do besides write poems, young man?"

"I am a compositor," said George.

"That's right—that's right. A starving genius is never the best sort of genius, my boy. And I can tell you, my lad, you write a deal better for being a compositor. Says I to my nephew when I read your verses, says I, 'This young fellow has lookit outside his ain head,' and I can tell you, my freen, if the greatest genius doesna do that, his genius soon gets blind in the dark! And now, my dear laddie, you mustn't mind me saying that these things won't sell. If I were to publish them, instead of my paying you, I should want you to pay me; and there wouldn't be tea sold except what you bought yourself to give to your friends, who would laugh at you behind your back. And now, what did you say your name was, my boy?"

"George Harvey," faltered poor George.

"And are you with your own people? Have you still got your father and mother?"

"Only my mother," said George.

"Ah, she's a widow," observed the old man, with a kindly insight deeper into the little tragi-comedy before him. "And has she been a widow long?"

"Seven years," said George.

"And are you a Londoner-born?" asked Mr. Dunbar.

"Yes; I was born in Buckingham Street, by Charing Cross," said George. "We were better off before my father died."

"Harvey!" Buckingham Street, Charing Cross," echoed the publisher. "I have a brother doing business in the wharves below there; surely, I've heard him speak of the Harveys—something about your mother behaving in a vera honorable way about her husband's debts."

"My mother did what was right," said George, proudly.

"Yes, yes—a weel-respectit woman—an' there were some that didna say much, that noticed a good deal. So, so. Well, my boy, if you'll take an old man's advice, what you've got to do is to wark for the magazines, and the editors and sub-editors will tak care that you dinna write what fouk winna read, an' they'll lick you into shape fine."

"But they won't have anything to do with me, sir," said George, laughing.

"Willna they?" answered the good Scotchman. "Ha' ye ever tried the Thoughtful Hour?"

"No, sir," said George, "I did not dare, for far inferior papers rejected me with scorn."

"An' did it never strike your semple mind that your morals might be too guid for them as well as your rhymes too bad?" asked Mr. Dunbar. "'A' well, the editor of the Thoughtful Hour is a godly man, frae my ain toon in Dumfriesshire, an' I'll gie ye a line to him. Mind, I canna make him tak your verses, and I dinna think he will tak mony, whiles, but I'll tell him to speir himsel' at what you may send, and gie ye a word o' advice, whaun you need it, an' 'accept' ye as soon as he can. An' when the Thoughtful Hour accepts, it pays. And, hoo, good-day, my man, and ye needna thank me, for it's an unco' pleasure to come across a bodie whose sel', or their verses either, are worth saying a guid word for."

As George, in his delight, almost stumbled along the dark passage which led from the private room to the shop, he jostled against the young man whom he noticed behind the desk.

"The shopman tells me you are Mr. Harvey," he said, interrupting George's apologies. "My uncle gave me your manuscripts to read. You are one of the right sort, and we shall hear more of you. I am glad to have seen you."

And George went home, as if he had wings rather than feet. If such was the foretaste of fame, what must be the sweetness of its full fruition? Ah, George, George, you cannot eat a peach without brushing its bloom away, and many a beautiful picture looks fairest from the distance. Fame's trumpet sounds well down the aisles of the past, but it often seems only discord to the ears that are nearest.

Then George despatched a little budget to the Thoughtful Hour, and for four months that oracle preserved a dead silence, and George began to fear that he need only thank kind Mr. Dunbar for fruitless good intentions.

It was Hatty Harvey's duty always to answer the door, but whenever there was a postman's call George always went out of the parlor and stood on the mat. If it was a family letter he came in again with Hatty, if it was anything for himself he took it from her, and retired to the back room, and stayed there as long as he liked, always sure that when he chose to join the family circle no remark would be made nor question asked. Is not such silence the very heart of confidence.

They kept it so implicitly that the mother and daughter never even said a word to each other whenever Hatty came in alone.

"He would not like to be talked over," Mrs. Harvey had decided, "and there is a fine instinct by which people always know when it is done."

They only suspended their work for a single significant glance at each other, one night when they heard him pacing about the next room, with a strange new vehemence. They were all stitching with their usual industry when he came in, and said, with suppressed excitement, that could not pause to go through any unnecessary explanation—

"One is taken at last! They have sent me a proof and a draft. Look!"

He spread the papers on the table. Milly caught up the poem. Hatty seized the draft. But the mother's eyes were on her boy's face. It was white and sharp in its agony of triumph, with a wild, strong light in the dark-blue eyes. It was as the fierce ecstasy of a dumb man, who suddenly finds voice. She had often pondered if her child really had genius—or only its terrible treacherous simulation. That never troubled her again.

"A whole guinea! And yet I'm sure it's worth more!" cried Hatty, not in the least ashamed of her keen interest in the practical part of the affair. And why should she be? For honesty is before honor; and though man must write his poems in sounding words, God's poems are printed best in the brave and silent duties of common life.

Her voice called George down from that point of acute rapture whereon mortals are never very safely poised, to those simple facts which great raptures and agonies are only made to sanctify. He did not sharply rebuke his sister's observation as degrading to the high vocation which was opening before him. It revealed the soundness of his nature that he was wise and sweet in his hour of joy. At the very moment of his own triumph he unconsciously felt, clearer than ever before, that life was holy and beautiful on all its sides, and that only God can rightly judge which side is highest.

"I hope I shall soon be able to make things very different for you all," he said proudly. "I've never said so before, because mere talking is no use."

"I know it is not much yet, Hatty," he went on, deprecatingly, "but it is only the beginning." And then the pride of his order flushed up, and he added: "Money need not represent the value of the work. Some things cannot have money value. Fifteen thousand pounds could have been no nearer to the value of 'Paradise Lost' than the fifteen pounds that the Milton family got for it. You don't think your linnets' songs are only worth the seeds you give it, Hatty. But the seeds are all that you can give."

"But I'd be ashamed of myself if I gave it just as little as would keep it alive!" Hatty muttered, wagging her head.

"This is really worth very little," he said, taking his poem from Milly's hand. "I only wonder that they have taken it at all. I never thought less of anything of mine than I do of this poem as I read it now. Nothing more than any old man in my hero's place must think, if he would only think it aloud."

"But then you ain't an old man, and that makes it wonderful," persisted downright Hatty.

"A little appreciation makes one very humble, mother," said George to Mrs. Harvey, as he bade her good-night. "I thought there was something in me, and while I was snubbed I could assert that something! But now—I'm afraid!"

There was no sleep for him that night. Slumber never brought such dreams as he dreamed—wakeful. Those poor shillings, marked on that draft—what agonies of mental arithmetic were they not carried through! So many poems, so much money. So much money, so much improvement at home. Out of this, his very first literary earning, he must make some gift to his mother and each of his sisters. Something pretty as a keepsake, and pleasing as a present, and yet something that should spare the household purse, always so sternly absorbed. God had dropped the seed of a true poet into the lad's heart; and thus it was striking root downward and bearing fruit upward, spreading its sweet aroma through all the ramifications of his nature; not growing on the surface of his life, but drawing his life into itself.

Well, it is something in one's life when the first watchful night is one of hope and joy!

CHAPTER III.

HOW GEORGE GOT LOST IN THE SUBLIME DARKNESS.

GEORGE never "woke one fine morning and found himself famous." He worked his way on slowly and surely. Editors and publishers who were pleased with his poems, began to suggest that he might find new successes in prose. Their encouragement was not always as entirely flattering or beneficent as it might appear, since the idea generally seized them when some "regular hand" had failed them, perhaps on some subject that was already advertised, and the tyro was expected to write at a shortness of time which the "regular hand" would utterly have repudiated, except at very different prices. George knew all about it, but he had lived no glass-case existence, but an honest open-air one, and instead of being sensitive and indignant, was contented and thankful, and was, perhaps, all the more grateful to his employers, because their favors did not lie upon him as a heavy burden, but were borne between them, as cheerful mutual obligation. "George is a genius," Hatty used to say, "and yet he's as sensible as if he was stupid!"

George continued in his printing-office until more than a year after his sister Hatty's marriage. At that time he accepted the post of sub-editor and general literary factotum in the house of a rising publisher, who wanted to get as good an article as was to be had—cheap.

He had been the financial head of the little household for some time before that, and, indeed, his commencing salary was not much more than the wages he had earned among the presses—was, in fact, no more, considering the extra expenses of a changed social position.

We can do things a little different without letting them cast much more, his mother reflected, and their changes were made by that prudent standard.

They left the homely house at Mile-End for an old-fashioned cottage at Hackney. They got this on very moderate terms, because the landlord lived next door, and was "particular," and would not take children, or a piano, or people who kept late hours. It was a pretty little cottage, scarcely larger than the Mile-End one, but with a trellis-porch, a Virginian creeper and Gothic windows.

"Just such a quaint, genteel place as I always thought I should like to live in when I got old," said Mrs. Harvey.

Another change on which George insisted was, that his mother should give up all work for money. They had lost their old housekeeper Hatty, and George commanded that his mother should take her place, with the assistance of a little maid hired from the workhouse.

Milly still continued her designing, and earned a very fair female income. Then, as the Hackney cottage boasted an extra bed-room, it was arranged that Miss Brook should come and live with them. It was a plan which conferred a benefit on all parties concerned. Miss Brook put her own furniture into the empty room, and paid the five shillings a week, which had been her accustomed rent for years. That made a considerable item in the rent of the Hackney cottage. At the same time, Miss Brook had hitherto been penned in her own narrow precincts, frying comfortless chops in winter, and in summer eating cold dinners and drinking milk, sooner than light a fire. Now she had "the run of the house," and lived cheaper and better by sharing the Harveys' food. Miss Brook still frowned and spoke as sharply as ever, but the Harveys never noticed it, for they knew it meant smiles and approval. George had made two or three "characters" out of Miss Brook, and had put her in two or three poems. She had such a strongly-marked self, and yet spoke so little of herself, that she was really exciting to the imagination, like some of those gaunt old Border keeps, which have survived their very names and traditions.

But George presently found that he must be prepared to attend an occasional dinner-party. Flattering letters came to him, from wealthy, would-be literateurs.

Now, in his own home, at his mother's side, George Harvey had always enjoyed the very best society—that of a thoughtful, cultivated Christian woman. She had really formed her son's taste upon this standard. But connoisseurs of all kinds are at times liable to be diverted out of their better sense. Men who can appreciate Velasquez and Vandyck have been bewitched into buying Sir Peter Lelys.

George Harvey was but young. And if there were some trials and temptations of literary life, against which his Spartan training had forearmed him, there were others to which it left him peculiarly open. The lowly printing-office, the free gibe and comment of the work-people, but served as a foil to set forth the charms of the soft-speaking, complimentary society into which he was now introduced. At first he did not care for it at all, was only too glad to escape from it to a bread-and-cheese supper, and the simple talk at home. But after a time the poison began to work. Its sickly taste began to seem only sweetness. An appetite was forming which could be satisfied with no other food.

He began to think that perhaps public opinion in his home had grown rather too simple and direct—that perhaps life had a few interesting corners which must be measured by some rule less stern and straight than that of "Fear God, and keep His commandments; for this is the whole duty of man."

He fancied that there might be some truth in the delicate and wide views of his new friends, and that most ministers of the gospel were too "narrow." Not that these superior people censured them for it—the common multitude required bonds and bounds, but they were elevated above such things, as the man is elevated above scholastic discipline. It was a dainty compliment to George, when referring to his minister, they observed "how beautiful it was in him to be ready to learn of a man whom he could teach."

They never said that anything was "wicked." There were men in the "set" who had two wives, or at least a right wife and a wrong one. Their stories were whispered about as interesting secret tragedies. They might mean suffering, and sacrifice, and sorrow—they might mean anything but what they unmistakably did mean—sin. And yet it is wrong to say that they never said anything was wicked. Whatever injured themselves, either in fact or fancy, was unpardonable. Whatever would not be injured by them, was coarse selfishness or black ingratitude. In a word, they forgave everybody's enemies but their own. But this inconsistency was not apparent to George, while their acquaintanceship was new.

They went into such charmingly courageous arguments. Nothing was too sacred to be doubted and discussed. "Perish whatever will not bear handling," they cried. "Fancy if a burglar said so of your jewel-case!"

They were so gentle, too, and tender. The women among them could not believe that the taint of sin was already in their "sweet and innocent little ones." It was quite natural and interesting that they should smash their toys, make targets of windows, and insist on tasting every dish at table. It was also "natural" that they should pull the cat's tail, but they evidently judged her a higher order of being, for it was not natural if she turned round and retaliated. Then she must be beaten and banished.

"Well, I do believe in innate depravity," George observed (it had been their last argument), "and yet I cannot remember the least inclination to worry an animal."

At first George fancied that the reaction of their doubts and uncertainties was but a refreshment and stimulant to his own spiritual nature. The fact was, he did not yet understand that spirituality is quite different from mere mental grasp. There were beliefs which he held the tighter for any effort to draw them from him. He was a Christian in his understanding, and it had a side-light into his heart, which otherwise was yet in darkness.

There are many people, especially those of quick and thoughtful capacity, who, born in Christian homes, can never tell precisely when first the light about them shone also from within. It may have been such a little taper at first that, though it would have shone plainly in darkness, it was smothered by the brilliance around. Often it burns so for a long time, is almost extinguished, and then its revivifying is likely to be mistaken for its first appearance.

George presently became aware of an uncomfortable change in himself. His regular prayers and public devotions began to appear wearisome and useful formalities. The Bible seemed half a dull truism, and half an incomprehensible mystery. Life looked like a tangle. The dogmas on which he had rested seemed to bend beneath him, like bodies without a living soul. What had satisfied him hitherto sufficed him no longer. He thought he needed less—he really needed more. He was like a man throwing away a precious stone as useless, because it is not yet set and polished.

Yet he had misgivings that this was not a change for the better, and wanted to hide it as much as he could, even from himself. But it would come out. It is as hard to hide a dead faith as a dead body. These acquaintances of his found it out as vultures find carrion.

"We always thought you would soon rise above the circle of the creeds," they congratulated him. "We knew you would soon be strong enough to recognize the sublime darkness, without trying to dissipate it with a farthing candle. Submit yourself to the mysteries of the Infinite. Rest assured that the Supreme Intelligence which turns the dead leaf into manure for the next spring, will find some satisfactory use for our lives beyond the grave. Let positive science be your undeniable revelation."

George stoutly denied that he had reached any such point of enlightenment, but the others shook their heads and knew better. George still went to church; he still read family prayers,—Mrs. Harvey having long since delegated that duty to him. But he did not pray in private. Sometimes he knelt down—dumb. Even his desk-work had ceased to be a joy to him. He did not know what to say; he had nothing worth saying to his fellows. What is there to say about a "supreme, silent Intelligence?" Who is to be the perfect ideal of the Friend and the Benefactor? Who is to be the Husband of the widow, or the Father of the fatherless? In his secret heart, George Harvey felt that his questionings were going far beyond the avowals of his acquaintance. And so he was, for his doubts were sincere, spiritual throes, theirs but social excuses.

But it all lay between God and his own soul. His nearest and dearest never suspected it. Only his plain-speaking Hatty observed to her husband, "George always seems to me to be in a bad temper when he comes from service on Sundays."

CHAPTER IV.

THE TALENT BEARS INTEREST.

GEORGE lived on somehow, as people do live through great struggles or great sorrows. He knew now that he had lost something whose possession he had never realized before. He missed it, as the world would miss its unnoticed blessing of air, light and water.

He could not help seeing an outer difference in himself. It was no longer easy to put aside his own books, and read aloud from some volume that interested his mother and Miss Brook. It was no longer a matter of course to postpone some purchase for himself, that he might the sooner buy some article for Mrs. Harvey, or some trifle to beautify the home. To remember birthdays seemed but a trivial impertinence, unworthy of the "stern reality" of life.

He gradually grew taciturn, and was often touchy and irascible. Mrs. Harvey feared he was working his brain too hard, and George himself tried to believe in the motherly apprehension.

He would go and sit in the Webbers' house of an evening. He did not speak much, and the good little stationer was often sorely awed by this strange genius of a brother-in-law. But George liked to hear him talk. His simple views of life, his perpetual consciousness of a higher law, and his trustful confidence in its finalities, were to George's wrung and jaded sensibilities like a sweet fairy tale among bewildering geometrical problems. It soothed him as such, but it did him no more good, because it was a seed that fell on such stony ground as this.

"He is naturally a good man, and he is satisfied and happy because he is not very wise. He has faith, because he does not know doubt. His soul has known no struggle, no yearning. It may be well to be so—especially for him!"

George forgot that nobody knew of his own struggles and yearnings, though they might begin presently to perceive upon him the signs of defeat. We are all so apt to forget that other men's histories are not written as plainly upon their backs, as our own is, in our hearts.

Another woeful experience for George was, that as he had lost his old and merely half mechanical faith in God, he had gained faith in godless men. He invested love and confidence in people with whom, in his old simplicity, he would have had no close personal relations. He was doomed to find that hearts, unfertilized by divine love, are too sterile for any wholesome human growth.

It is no use going into unprofitable details of the relations of "the natural man" which poor George found himself suddenly forced to receive. There was one with whom George had held many a metaphysical disquisition, and who had startled him by such views as that "surely what are called sins are merely natural developments in certain persons, since almost every particular evil trait of humanity is found, as it were, personified in some species of the animal world"—who believed "that the world was a vast machine, bound to work remorselessly on from some uncertain beginning to some unknown end"—who held that "prayer was a useless fiction, and free-will a mere chimera, whose nearest fact lay with those who knew they had none, and consciously surrendered themselves to the despotism of their fate."

In a little money-matter with George this individual became involved in what looked awfully like a particular mean and base embezzlement, for which he could find no available defence except two lies and a dash of defiance. George let him go unpunished, except by a little suspense as to whether "fate" destined him to a police-cell, and by the awful consciousness that there was at least one person in the world who knew the measure of his natural goodness!

Still, George comforted himself that he had never had the highest opinion of the stability of this individual. For one peculiarity of his enlightenment was that it had made "hail-fellows-well-meet," with some whom he secretly distrusted and more than half despised.

But there was one who had been the very ideal of George's new spiritual world. He had not so much disputed the letter of religion, as insisted on its needlessness for those who walked in the spirit. He had neglected Sabbath observances because he said all days should be Sabbaths. He had slighted God's ministers, only because he said that all men should be priests unto God. He had never kneeled to pray, because "every thought should be a prayer." His only doubt of Scriptural inspiration was his belief in the equal inspiration of many other books. He had smiled benignly on the grand doctrine of the atonement, because he regarded it as the "artistic embodiment of that spirit of sacrifice which was the highest secret of life."

To this man there came a trial. Only a commercial difficulty, which he had to reserve to meet, because his delicate and liberal taste had preferred sumptuous luxury to the "low gratification of hoarding." And now he began to clutch at anything that might save him. No matter what it might be, he would grasp it—tear it up—if it would only check his fall for a moment. He who had despised "pennurious economy," was not below claiming its results from any trustful hands. A hundred broken hearts and bruised lives were to him as nothing compared with his own broken fortune. He would take the bread and cheese from those that had earned it, that he and "his own" might enjoy the Dives' paradise of "firing sumptuously" every day. Self-sacrifice was the good and beautiful thing for everybody but himself! ✓

George said nothing. Never one bitter word passed between him and his former friend. The bitterness was too bitter to be borne in the mouth. The fallen idol was shivered in too many pieces to be touched. Bury the rubbish.

It was just after this sad and silent burial that George sat one day in his office, blank and dreary. It seemed an empty world beneath an empty heaven.

"If there was a God who cared personally for us, I think He would pity me," George pondered.

There was a rap on the door—a strange rap. Nobody who came there knocked with a walking-stick. George's heart gave a curious thump.

"Come in," he said.

There entered a man about thirty. A well-dressed, pleasant-looking man, with very blue eyes and a humorous mouth.

"You don't know me, I see, Mr. Harvey," he said. "But perhaps you'll recollect the name—James Murray."

"I beg your pardon for coming here to bother you," he went on, as George greeted him warmly, and drew up their chairs together before the fire. "But I've never been in London since we last parted, and I've been reading you in the magazines, and I could not help wanting to say, 'God bless you,' and how glad I am that you are in a way of doing good to plenty others as you did good to me."

"I'm afraid I don't do much good to anybody else, if I did any to you," said poor George, humbly.

"No mistake about me," responded James. "You know that I was as thoroughgoing a young black-guard as there can be in this city, for I'd never have gone of myself where I was likely to hear how to be anything else. There's a way in which it wasn't you who did me any good, sir; because it is only God who can take the evil spirit out of a man and put in a new one—just as it's only God who can make the right medicine do good to a sick man. But the doctor that prescribed the physic, and the nurse that takes the sick man to the doctor are all in it, and they all deserve gratitude and love."

"And you really are a different man to what you used to be?" George observed, rather dreamily.

"God be praised I am, sir," Murray answered devoutly; "and I may say it, for it's not to my own glory, and its best sign is that while I used not to think myself a sinner, but just what was quite natural and like everybody else, now I know both what I was and what I am still, sir."

"And you are happy and doing well?" George asked.

"Yes, I married a nice, good little woman, and we've got a pretty baby, and I'm head man in Dash & Blank's printing-office, in Leeds, so we get along very fairly in our small way. Of course, it's very different to yours nowadays, sir. But if ever you're passing a night in Leeds, you must put up with us. The bedroom is nice and comfortable, and we can sleep on the parlor-sofa as easy as anything. It would be a real treat to do it to accommodate you, sir, and we'll be hurt if you don't prove it. Mary told me to say so, sir, and that she comes from the North, and is a fine hand at Peterborough cheese-cakes. I'd be a happy man to take you into my Sunday-school class, and say to them, 'Here's a gentleman you've often heard about, that's been my best earthly friend.'

"Have you ever met any doubters—religious doubters?" George asked, anxiously, but with a strong effort to appear unconcerned.

"Dear, yes, sir, lots. Some of all kinds. Some that couldn't believe, and some that wouldn't; but the first sort mostly come round at last. I've met people that didn't think there was a God, and people that didn't think He troubled Himself with anything except the earth and the stars—folks who couldn't get further into the Bible than the first chapter of Genesis. I've seen people that don't think we want a Saviour. I can't say I've ever been troubled with doubts myself. You see it was only likely that most of the Jews in Jerusalem should be exercised in their minds as to whether Jesus was the promised Messiah or not, but I don't suppose the widow of Nain, or Jairus, or the man born blind, had many doubts about it. They knew. So do I."

George Harvey looked earnestly at his companion. The man seated at Christ's feet, clothed and in his right mind, could not have been more unlike the raging lunatic among the tombs than was the decent, cheery, kindly artisan unlike the profligate, artful, reckless lad of fifteen years ago. One might as well assert that a barren field had become a fruitful garden, by some force of its own, as that such a change had been wrought without any exterior power. George knew by bitter experience that "nature" in itself has elements of decay, but not of restoration.

He took James Murray home with him, and the good, simple-hearted man amused them all with the history of his old admiration for Mrs. Harvey, and his feeling that he should like to speak to her if he had a decent coat.

"I never thought to be sitting supping with you," he said. "That would have seemed too good. But God gives us a deal more than we ask Him for. Did it ever strike you, Mr. Harvey, that we should be awful poor creatures, in soul and body, if He gave us nothing more than our prayers?"

George sat in his room till late that night. His soul felt like one who has just come out of a fever, weak and faint, not fit for strong meat, and feebly grateful to resign itself to a narrow pound and a shaded light, but yet thankful to know that its ghastly horrors and terrors are over with its delirium, and that it is still safe in a breezy world, where God's sun is shining. And into his silent heart it seemed to him that Jesus came and stood in the midst, and said, "Peace be unto you. Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands: and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing."

And on his knees George answered and said unto him, "My Lord and my God."

Next Sabbath he took a class in a waterside ragged-school.

UNFORGOTTEN.

BY ADA M. KENNICOTT.

"KEPT close is not forgotten,"

Oh, loyal, loving heart,
From sweets of home and kindred,
Of love and friends apart.
Though a stranger might not deem it,
Though no eye the proof may see—
"Kept close is not forgotten,"
They miss and pray for thee.

"Kept close is not forgotten,"
Oh, dweller with the dead,
Though thy name we rarely mention,
As our daily paths we tread;
The heart turns to its treasures—

How often none may tell—
"Kept close is not forgotten,"
Thou art remembered well.

"Kept alone is not forgotten,"
Oh, patient, toiling throng
In field, or mart, or workshop,
With pencil, pen, or song.

All ye who bravely labor,
With purpose pure and high,
"Kept close is not forgotten,"
Your recompense draws nigh.

God setteth all His jewels,
Yet never one may know
The place He will assign it,
Or why He worketh so;
Yet doubt we not, nor murmur,
Whatever may befall—
"Kept close is not forgotten,"
And He remembers all.

CONSECRATED GROUND.—When Molière, the comic poet, died, the Archbishop of Paris would not let his body be buried in consecrated ground. The king, being informed of this, sent for the archbishop, and expostulated with him about it; but finding the prelate inflexibly obstinate, his majesty asked "how many feet deep the consecrated ground reached?" This question coming by surprise, the archbishop replied, "About eight." "Well," answered the king, "I find there is no getting the better of your scruples; therefore, let his grave be dug twelve feet deep—that's four below your consecrated ground—and let him be buried there."

DO THE GOOD THAT LIES NEXT TO YOUR HAND.—"Never fail," says Macdonald, "to do daily that good which lies next to your hand. Trust God to weave your little thread into the great web, though the pattern shows it not yet. The grand harvest of the ages shall come to its reaping, and the day shall broaden itself to a thousand years, and the thousand years shall show themselves as a perfect and finished day."

THE OPIUM DEATH.

A WRITER in the New York Observer gives under the above caption the following sad story of an opium-eating friend. The habit of opium eating is said by physicians to be gaining ground rapidly in this country among nearly all classes; and its effects upon mind and body becoming more and more generally disastrous. If any reader of this happens to be among those who are tampering with the drug, we trust the narrative given below will act as an effectual warning.

I have a sad, strange story to tell. Did I say "strange?" Alas, I fear it will be but a recital of things familiar to some of my readers; and it is in part for those few, hoping that it may warn and help, that I tell it. But rather I write to warn any who may be in danger of the bondage, concerning which is this true and mournful history, than from hope of benefitting those already enslaved.

I have many times felt almost persuaded to write of what has been hid away in my memory for years; but as often have I shrunk from bringing forth to the public gaze the sorrows, the weakness, the struggles of one very dear to me, although facts, places and persons might be shrouded, as they will be, by fictitious names.

Of late so many facts and statistics have come to my notice of the alarming prevalence of the evil of which I write, among—I will not say especially—but even among the more educated and refined in both city and country life, that I am constrained to break the long silence I have kept.

Says one writer: "Opium is a corrosion and paralysis of all the noblest forms of life. The man who voluntarily addicts himself to its use, would commit, in cutting his throat, a suicide only swifter and less ignoble. The habit is gaining ground among our professional men, the operatives in our mills, our weary sewing women, our disappointed wives, our former liquor drinkers, our very day laborers, all our classes, from highest to lowest, are yearly increasing the consumption of the drug. The terrible demands made on modern brains, especially in this country, by our feverish competitive life, constitute hourly temptations to its use as a sedative."

When lately I read the testimony of an eminent physician—"I have known of more deaths from the use of opium in some of its forms, than from all forms of alcoholic drinks"—I felt that I might no longer stay from holding up what might prove as a beacon light to some whose feet were turning aside from that Temperance which is one of the fruits of the Spirit of God, bringing them back to the way of sober self-denial. For this I write, for this I earnestly pray. If it be given me to know in Heaven that one soul has been kept, through God's blessing on my weak words, I shall forever praise Him that He permitted me, helped me, to tell the story, even though now it wrings my heart to write it.

My first remembrances of Ellen Gordon picture her as a young, lovely woman, refined, educated, and gifted with no ordinary talent, possessing a rare dignity combined with a sweet graciousness of manner, that made her not only admired, but beloved by all who knew her. In a beautiful home, surrounded by loving children, and tenderly guarded and cared for by a devoted husband, she had all that earth could bestow of happiness.

Nor did she rest in these things. Her loving, child-like spirit saw God in all; and I well remember how I felt much as I were listening to an angel when she talked of the works of a loving Father, whether she recounted to me her impressions of Niagara, or traced His love in the forming of a daisy, so clear was her vision of His power and love. I was much younger than she, yet she honored me with her love and friendship, and spoke to me without reserve—the more freely, she often said, because I was too young to criticise her enthusiasms.

For some years we rarely met. Trials in her family, my own marriage, and our separate places of abode, rendered personal intercourse well nigh impossible, and letter writing, with our respective family cares, was a difficult matter, and became very infrequent. Yet the old love never died out.

One evening, in the summer of 184—, my husband said to me at the tea-table: "James Matthews called at my office to-day."

"Did he say anything of his sister Ellen?" I inquired.

"Yes," was his reply; "Mrs. Gordon is in town, is at his house, much out of health. She is very desirous to see you."

"I shall not wait, I assure you," I said, eagerly; "why not go this evening?"

"James said that he thought she would rather see you alone, as she is unwilling to see general company; and her best hours, that is when she is most herself, are in the afternoon."

"Is she very ill, then, Paul?" I asked, a vague terror seizing me. "What do you mean by saying 'most herself.' Tell me all you know."

"James thought that you ought to know before you saw her, that you might understand, and not be too greatly shocked by the change in her appearance. Mrs. Gordon is a victim to the terrible habit of opium eating; dying from its effects, he says, very rapidly. You will, I imagine, find her but a wreck of what she once was, of the woman you so loved and admired."

"Loved and admired." The words sounded to me like a death knell. Was this indeed a thing of the past? Was the Ellen Gordon of my youth no longer anything but a beautiful memory? I could not believe it; I could not realize the meaning of my husband's words. They pierced my soul with anguish, though they were spoken tenderly, as knowing the bitterness to me of their import. I had read the "Confessions of an Opium Eater," and had gleaned some parts of Coleridge's dark and sad history; had read how this fearful habit had wasted his frame, poisoned all the sources of enjoyment, dried up the fountains of natural affection, and fastened upon him a load of mental agony that became daily more intolerable; but I had never seen its effects, and therefore only faintly realized them. I found it impossible to think of Ellen Gordon as such an one as De Quincey or Coleridge.

The hours passed wearily enough until the time arrived indicated by Mr. Matthews as the most suitable for my call. Ellen was expecting me.

How shall I describe my once lovely, cheerful friend? Seated in a large chair, rocking dreamily to and fro, with her head bowed, her hands moving restlessly upon her lap, and picking idly at her dress, she did not appear to notice my entrance until her daughter, touching her shoulder, said: "Mamma, here is Mrs. Fenton." She raised her head a little then, took my offered hand, held it for an instant, but with scarce a return of its pressure upon her own, and motioned me to sit down beside her; requesting her daughter to leave us together in tones that sounded like the echo of her dead voice—that voice I remembered as so clear and musical.

We sat in silence for some minutes. I could not speak—she either could not or would not. As we thus sat, I noticed the changes in her whole appearance. The face I remembered as full and oval, was almost fleshless; the once bright eyes hollow and dull, wearing an inexpressibly mournful expression; the clear skin had become olive-colored, and was drawn tightly over the sharpened features, on which dwelt a look of great mental anguish. The beautiful hair had lost its brightness, looking, not so much gray, as dead and lustreless. Her whole form was shrunken and bowed, and to the dignity and grace that formerly characterized it, had succeeded an appearance of utter helplessness, of cowering apprehension, as if some fearful danger threatened. I may not have noticed all this at once, but it was the impression carried away from that first visit.

At length she broke the silence, for my own lips were weakly closed, my tongue seemed chained.

"You find me altered, Sara."

"Yes, my dear Ellen," I replied; "you have surely been very ill."

"Ill!" she said, and paused—then, "yes, if illness that may be called which is one lingering agony brought on and continued by one's own free will."

"Your own free will, Ellen? That cannot be—surely it is beyond your control!"

"They tell me it is not; they despise me because I cannot free myself from this bondage, and they will make you despise me."

"That is impossible, for I believe in you too thoroughly. If I could only help you."

"I am beyond help; even my physicians tell me that—though they need not, I feel it too surely. But you will believe in me no longer, Sara, when you know all."

Then she poured out in one resistless tide of saddest eloquence, of which I can give but a faint shadowing, the story of her struggles and her despair. It would consume too much space to write this conversation, or those that succeeded it, fully as I can recall them; therefore I shall endeavor to give in brief outline all the sad history related to me from time to time during these, my last interviews, with my dear afflicted friend.

In 183-, about ten years before the date of our renewed intercourse, she suffered fearfully from nervous disease, causing almost sleepless nights for a long period, a state of health brought on no doubt by extreme debility. Living in the country, several miles from any town, or from any medical practitioner, she struggled hard against the suffering and the increasing weakness it entailed, using such simple remedies as were recommended by friends, but without obtaining relief. At last her husband insisted upon calling in the aid of a physician, who immediately prescribed the use of opium in the form of morphia. This acted like magic, subduing the pain and giving her, even on the first night of its use, refreshing slumber, which she considered a boon to be thankful to God for, notwithstanding the succeeding nausea of the morning.

After a time the opium became indispensable. The agony of pain, the weary nights returned, and her physician ordered from time to time an increase of the dose, never warning her or her friends of the danger of continuing its use, or the importance of leaving it off as soon as practicable. When the physician ceased his visits the remedy was still at hand, and as the usual dose lost its power to quiet her nerves, she went on increasing it, until she, as well as her husband, became alarmed at the large quantity necessary to produce the desired effect. I never knew the amount of the dose reached, but suppose it to have been very large. I do not believe—indeed I am very sure—it was never taken from any craving for excitement, nor from any love for the taste of the drug, which ever remained exceedingly distasteful to her.

Her eyes were opened to her danger by what she thought a casual and inadvertent remark from a friend though, I think more probably dropped purposely in her presence, and she made an attempt to abandon its use. For awhile hopefully; for a gradual diminution of the dose seemed to exert no unfavorable effect. But on its entire disuse, days of intolerable pain and sleepless nights of fearful agony ensued. Again the physician was summoned, and by his advice she resumed the use of the poisonous drug, finding it necessary to take larger doses than before. He expressed surprise at the continued use, and at the large quantities taken.

Whose was the sin? If Dr. — had not made the opium disease his study, being a regularly educated physician, he must have known the danger of a continued use of the drug, and his consequent duty to guard against its abuse in all cases where he felt called upon to prescribe it. If it was his ignorance, was it not in his case sinful ignorance?

"I have tried," she said to me one day in despairing tones, when I spoke to her of the possibility of deliverance, "I have tried again and again, but the suffering has been too fearful. Dr. — told me that fearful consequences would follow, that my nerves were so shattered, that I would probably die in the attempt; or what seemed more terrible still, would become insane. My appetite failed entirely, intense neuralgic pain seized me in every part. The slightest exertion of mind or body was impossible to me. I was sunk in the Slough of Despond. It was useless. I know, Sara, you will think me weak; I despised myself, but I went back. Even my husband, though his face was like the image of despair when he said it, told me it was useless."

"Since then, Ellen?"

"Since then I have not tried, but have taken my dose morning and evening, though I loathe it, and loathe myself for taking it; but I cannot live without it, and I do not dare to die. I know that either way I must die ere long, for I feel that the poison is destroying me. My heart seems breaking with misery, and yet it will not break. I long for death to deliver me, and yet I fear it with an awful terror. The ease and quiet which the poison once gave me, no amount will procure for me now; I only take it to live. I cannot save myself: O, that I could warn others!"

Some three years previous to the time of which I write, her loving, patient husband died, taken from her suddenly under very trying circumstances. The opium had lost its power long before to excite or to quiet her nerves, but in no wise was she released from its bondage. She was compelled to take it to keep the very current of life, miserable as it was, from coming to flow.

The story of her husband's death was told without a tear; hers were dry eyes that could not weep, and she seemed to wonder calmly that mine should overflow, as they did occasionally at their recital, spite of all my efforts. His loving forbearance and patience was not succeeded in any wise by the son and daughter to whom he committed the care of their mother, the wife of his youth, still tenderly beloved, though so changed. They could not sympathize in what they considered blameable weakness, and treated their only surviving parent with little respect and tenderness—let us hope without intending to do so.

They had not the courage to refuse to supply her with the poison, fearing the consequences of sudden or even gradual discontinuance; nor the firmness to insist upon no augmentation of the dose, as their father had done for a long time. Yet they believed that "if mother would only exert herself to try to conquer the habit, she might get over it." This they made no scruple of saying to others, in and out of her presence, and though she heard it unmoved apparently, yet I do not doubt that it went "sharper than a serpent's tooth" to her heart, dulled as were its perceptions and its capabilities of feeling. It was to this she alluded in our first interview, and I was soon made sensible of her meaning by the cold, sneering remarks of her daughter, who treated her with a sort of contemptuous patronage, that often stirred my wrath, though I deemed it wise to control it.

Could she have forgotten all the love, all the teachings, all the blessings of her childhood, that she could thus requite so coldly, so impatiently, that once tender, patient, unwearied mother-love? And yet I can see that from their standpoint it must have been very difficult for her children to comprehend how one who on all other matters seemed perfectly sane, and whom they had always been accustomed to regard as possessing an unusual share of decision and mental power, should not be able to free herself from the chains of such a habit. They did not know how utterly it destroys the power of the will. The will may indeed prevent the forging of the chains, but it rarely has power to enable the enslaved victim to break them. But they are now where all is made plain, and if the children have seen and regretted their lack of duty, the mother has forgiven and still loves on.

I never saw my friend in a natural state of cheerfulness during all these days, though I was with her frequently. Once or twice there was an attempt at gaiety, but it was only like the faint mocking of the gentle humor, the flashing, genial wit of former days. The same stony calm, the icy despair which met me on my first visit, was her habitual state. I parted from her with a sinking heart, anguish thrilled me from head to foot; to leave her thus seemed more than I could bear, for I knew it was our last parting on earth.

An impenetrable veil was drawn by her children over the last days of her life—happily they were but few after our parting. I could learn nothing save that "she remained much as when I saw her." I know not if she saw THE DELIVERER before her eyes closed upon earthly scenes, but I believe that He came at the last and brake her chains, leading her captivity captive, and restoring her to the liberty with which He makes His people free.

God forbid that I should excuse or extenuate sin; but to the sinner let us be merciful, even as was our blessed Master while upon the earth, merciful as He is now: and has He not left us an example that we may walk in His steps?

I have said I had little hope to influence those in whom the habit was confirmed, but yet I do believe that even such may, if they have any power of the will left, emancipate themselves. Much and protracted suffering must doubtless be encountered; but, in the words of another, "it is a choice between two evils. If he abandons opium, he must count upon much suffering of body, many sleepless nights, a disordered nervous system, and, at times, great prostration of strength. If he continues the habit, there remains, as long as life lasts, the irresolute will, the bodily languor, the ever-present sense of hopeless, helpless ruin. The opium eater must take his choice between the two. On the one hand is hope, continually brightening the future; on the other is the inconceivable wretchedness of one from whom hope has forever fled."

"The medical profession are not agreed as to the treatment of this opium disease." Are they not supine and careless about the matter? How is it less dangerous than alcohol! And yet they, or many of them, fear to prescribe alcohol in cases where they see it to be the only remedy. But this insidious, serpent-like drug, is permitted too often by the medical attendants to wind its crushing folds around its victim, all unwarned of evil, till writhing in its grasp, he awakes to find his efforts unavailing to deliver him from the cruel fangs which have entered into his soul.

"O, that I could warn others," was Ellen Gordon's oft-repeated cry—a cry that has come from many another captive, agonized heart. Will others heed the warning?

THE CHASSEUR ANTS.

BY G.

A LADY who had been living for some months in the West Indies, gives the following account of the Chasseur ants, and remarks that many disagreeable looking insects perform important uses in the economy of nature, which are not generally known, and which she should not have been an eye witness of, had it not been for her residence at Laurel Hill, Trinidad.

She says, my attention was arrested one morning by a number of small blackbirds, such as I had not seen before, on a Calabash tree near the kitchen. I inquired of my colored girl, what could be the cause of the appearance of so many of these blackbirds. She said, "Misses, dem be a sign of the blessing of God; dey are not the blessing, but only de sign, as we say, of God's blessing. Misses, you'll see afore noontime, how de ants will come and clear de houses." I thought it some superstitious idea of the girl's, and paid no attention to it, until about two hours after, when there were an uncommon number of Chasseur ants crawling on the floor of the room. My children were so annoyed by them that they beated themselves on a table. They did not crawl on my clothes, but I was surrounded by them, and soon they covered the walls of the room. Thinking I would take the children into an adjoining room, separated only by a few steps from the one we were in, I found that not only the floor and walls, but the roof was covered with the ants. The open rafters of a West India house at all times afford shelter to a numerous tribe of insects, with many cockroaches, now their destruction was certain. The ants ascended as if trained to battle, and threw down the roaches and other insects to their comrades on the floor, who by their united efforts dragged them away with great rapidity. The ants did not stop to devour their prey, but conveyed all to their storehouse.

The jack-spaniard is the wasp of the West Indies; it is twice as large as the common wasp and its sting is more painful. It builds its nest in trees, and old houses, and sometimes in the rafters of a room. They were not such easy prey, for they used their wings, but not one of them was left; the moment they attempted to rest on the window or any place they were caught by the ants. Two of them alighted on the dress of one of my children. I entreated her to sit still and remain quiet. In an almost inconceivable short space of time the ants had possession of the two jack-spaniards, and dragging off the wasps, they had done the child no harm. If one of the ants had been stepped on, or in any way injured, we should have been summarily punished. I opened a large chest of linens, which had been much infested, for I wished to take every advantage of such able hunters. The ants were already inside. I pulled out the linens on the floor, and with them hundreds of roaches not one of which escaped. After destroying the insects, the ants commenced an attack upon the rats and mice, and strange as it may appear, they were no match for their apparently insignificant foes. They surrounded them as they had done the insect tribe, covered them over, and dragged them off, with a celerity and union of strength, that no one who has not watched such a scene can comprehend. It was about ten when the ants first appeared, and at two the houses were cleared. Then the negro huts were cleared in the same way, and by five in the afternoon the whole was over.

The grass round the house was now full of the ants, and the blackbirds, which had been in the trees all day, darted down among them, and destroyed thousands of them, before they could make good their retreat. No such blackbirds were to be seen before or after that day, and the negroes assured me that they never were seen but at such times. If every one was to love and perform the use that they were designed and best fitted for, as well as some insects do, there would be very few idlers or beggars to be met with. And all who o the best they can, in the position in which they are, and wish to do the will of Him, who made all for use, will not have lived in vain, in this busy world.

DUNELLEN, NEW JERSEY.

MONEY, says Colton, is the most envied, but the least enjoyed; while health is the most enjoyed, but the least envied; and this superiority of the latter is still more obvious when we reflect, that the poorest man would not part with his health for money, but that the rich would gladly part with their money for health.

MANY a one has kissed the trouble at parting that he met with trembling.

THE COTTAGE AT LONG BRANCH.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

IF you had gone to Long Branch last summer and driven out on Ocean Avenue, past the great hotels with their gay, crowded, picturesque life, past the beautiful cottages, whose varied and graceful designs give an indescribable poetic charm and sentiment to the whole landscape—if you had driven far up the long avenue with the soft laughers of the out-going tide, making a pleasant murmurous air among your thoughts, you would have reached at last, on the side nearest the sea, a simple brown cottage. It stood far back from the road, with winding walks and clumps of shrubberies in front. There was nothing in this cottage to strike you on first sight, it stood there in its quiet brown, conspicuous for plainness among its more pretentious neighbors. A two-story cottage surmounted by a French roof; all around it ran cool, deep upper and lower verandas, in whose delicious shade one could sit all day and hear the sounds of the sea. Indeed, the longer you looked at this cottage the more, it seems to me, you would become penetrated with a sense of its quiet home-atmosphere and comfort. That was all?

Not quite all, as you will see. There was a flag-staff run up from the roof with the dear old stars and stripes waving proudly in the sea winds, and the foreign ships, outward bound, or coming into port, when they passed by, would salute this cottage, firing and lowering their flags, and all day long there would be eager, curious faces leaning out of the elegant carriages which swept back and forth on the gay drive, and you would have the secret of the lowering of flags and the firing, and all the eager curiosity, when somebody glancing toward the plain brown cottage with the deep verandas would say simply: "President Grant lives there."

And because he is to be this for the next four years; because you have just declared it too with a loud heartiness of utterance which has shaken the land; because a certain natural curiosity always attaches itself to the family and daily living of the head of the nation, I have concluded to tell you about some glimpses which I had into the home-life of the President's household last summer.

This was the way it happened. The friend whose guest I was at Long Branch was the friend of the President, his tenant also.

On the opposite side of the avenue, and almost facing his own, General Grant had erected a pleasant, spacious cottage, intended sooner or later for his own occupancy.

My friend, the kindest and most generous of hosts, had taken this cottage for the summer; so it came to pass that the President was also our landlord!

There are days which lie in all our memories as though we had heard "The horns of elf-land faintly blowing" through them. Such a day is that first one

I passed at Long Branch. It was just after July's fiery sword had swept over the great city, and reaped its terrible harvest of death.

Going out from days which had walled us up in their midsummer heats, into the coolness and quiet and delicious sea-breezes of Long Branch, was like entering another world. I seem to see it all as I saw it from my window that first morning—the ships coming and going in the distant horizon like "sheeted phantoms," the sunlight glimmering among the sails—the long stretch of gray, unbroken beach, and, greatest of all, the old ocean with the splendor of its rising and falling tides; the glittering sweep and retreat of the surf on the sands, and the shout of the waves that was like the chorus of an army returning from victory.

All these things make that first day at Long Branch seem to me unlike most of the other days of my life.

General Grant was to leave Long Branch on the following day for a tour among the Northern Lakes: so it had been arranged that I should meet him informally that evening, and a little after dusk we went over to the brown cottage through the shrubberies and the winding walks, my friend, with his pretty wife, and myself.

The President and Mrs. Grant were just rising from the table as we entered. After the usual introductions were over, and before we had had a fair chance to look in each other's faces we went out on the piazza, and the stars were overhead, and the surf played among the sands below, and its voices came softly up to us like the hymns of worshippers.

There was no company at that time and the General took a chair at my side. Perhaps we talked a little at first, perhaps we did not. Sitting there my thoughts went back over half a dozen years to a scene and place very unlike this one.

I was once more in a quiet village a few miles from Boston. The tender April sunshine shone in at the windows, the soft south wind was whispering among the flush of rock-maples, and the delicate green of the budding oaks.

Nothing broke the glad stillness but that soft ripple of winds, or a robin song pouring into the golden heart of that April afternoon. Then, of a sudden, I heard a voice. It came up the stairs with one throb of ecstasy like the flash of a bugle. This was what it said: "Grant is in Richmond. The war is ended!"

All over the land amid the thrill of leaves and the songs of birds, other voices were saying these words that spring afternoon—north and south, east and west, they were saying them—mothers and wives, sisters and daughters as they will never say any words again.

"No more battle-fields, no more weary marches, no more heart-aches, nor wrench of partings; no more broken homes, nor columns of "wounded" and

"dead" in the papers. For those four long terrible years, how we had waited and hungered for these words; and now they came flashing and singing into the heart of the April afternoon. "The land is saved! The war is ended!"

And the sun went down, and the moon came up that night, and looked down over the quiet New England town, as though she, too, knew all about it, and was glad, and the bells of Woburn, coming softly through the distance, told the same story to another tune.

"I wanted to thank you then, so far as words could," I said. "I have wanted to thank you all these years, and the time has only come for me to do it to night."

The General laughed a quiet, half-deprecatory laugh. "Oh," he replied, "whatever I may have done it is likely some other man would have done all just as well. Somebody is always raised up for the necessary work, you know."

"But who would have done yours, General?"

"Thomas, or Sherman, or Sheridan, perhaps."

The manner, even more than the words struck me. There was such an evident desire to appropriate no large honor or glory to himself. It was simply, "Somebody else might have done it as well." It seemed to me that there was something morally sublime in that answer; but I am sure Grant himself never thought so.

Indeed, the modesty, the total lack of anything like self-assertion in the man impressed me during our whole talk. I had heard him described as cold and reticent. I found him quite the reverse, while he listened with his shrewd, courteous attention, he was always ready and able to sustain his full share in the conversation.

He has not, of course, an imaginative or ideal temperament; his genius is of the practical, organizing kind. He has a wonderful memory for facts and details, and if yours is of the slipshod order, he will be likely, in his quiet, straightforward way, to put you right in any small matter of dates or names where you may be at fault.

We are accustomed to think of Grant as a man of iron nerve, and almost superhuman physical powers, with about as much practical knowledge of pain and weariness as the old heroes and demigods of mythology. I learned during the course of the talk, that he had, all his life, been the victim of more or less frequent and distressing forms of headache. To those who are his fellow sufferers, that fact will seem a great deal, establishing a kind of bond of sympathy between him and them. He stated, however, as a curious fact, that the war seemed to have cured that malady. He had but one attack during the campaign.

At last other company came in, and Mrs. Grant made a place for me by her side.

There is one question which a woman always asks about a President, and which, while it seems of vital importance to her, is the last that occurs to a man, and this question is "What kind of wife has he?"

It is not a question of mere idle curiosity. The woman who is the wife of our President, is to be for one or two "political Olympiads" the lady of the nation, the representative of American womanhood. Can it be to us, for a moment, a matter of indifference what manner of woman the wife of our President is?

We do not ask that she be beautiful, or graceful, or highly accomplished. Many women are all this who are no honor to their sex; but we do desire that the wife of our President shall be a woman we shall not blush for; a woman with dignity of character and tenderness of heart, possessed, too, of quiet good sense and tact, and representing in the high place where she stands, all that is true and lovely and of good report in American womanhood.

With this feeling I took my place by Mrs. Grant's side that evening, a good deal prejudiced, I confess, by some antecedent circumstances in her favor. In a few minutes we were talking much as though we had known each other all our lives. There is a quiet, unaffected simplicity about Mrs. Grant which strikes one on a first interview. She has a pleasant voice, with a little feminine lisp along the syllables. She impressed me as a genuine, warm-hearted home woman, with quick sympathies and enthusiasm. There was something almost touching in her evident devotion to her husband, in her absolute faith in him. It was sufficiently apparent that he filled the wife's heart and bounded her horizon, whether she called him, half-unconsciously, "Ulyse"—and I wondered whether that was the name with which, long ago, he had wooed the warm-hearted western girl—or "Mr. Grant," or occasionally "the General."

She talked about her girlhood, and her life during the war, and her home at Washington, and I listened to the pleasant voice, with its little twinkling lisp along the syllables, and the soft laughter of the waves on the beach below rippling among her words, and I said to myself, "Here is a woman to whom a little child might go in its sobbing grief, and be sure of soothing and pity."

Mrs. Grant's talk showed me some pretty little cabinet pictures of her home at Washington, which I am afraid I shall spoil if I attempt to reproduce them here.

She spoke of her attempts to make a real home-life in some corner of the great house at Washington. "Nelly," the name of the little girl, that night, far across the sea, was always slipping into the talk—you saw she was the central figure of the household—"Nelly plays, and so do I, a little, and during the winter evenings when there are no receptions, we gather into one of the smaller rooms, and have a quiet, cosy time, just as though we were at home, and a few friends had dropped in to see us.

One saw it all through her words, the quiet home-picture, the girl midway in her teens, with her bright young face bending over the piano; the mother looking on, with her pleased eyes, the boys clustering around, and the lights shining over the pleasant home-scene, just as they had shone softly long ago on another home-scene in the quiet western town, before the war came and swept away a great many people from their homes, and among them—Grant from Galena.

But the pleasant summer evening with its stars overhead, and its soft rush and retreat of the surf along the beach, was over at last; an evening so quiet and homelike that I could scarcely believe at that very time men were in the thick and strife of another election, and that the quiet man who used to sit every morning in a corner of the piazza, listening to what the waves had to say to him, was in everybody's thought and on everybody's tongue.

The next morning the President and his family left Long Branch, but Mrs. Grant had kindly given orders that I should have the entree of the house, so one day I went over and was marshalled by the housekeeper, "from turret to foundation stone," although in inverted order. The interior in its simple appointments corresponded with the outside.

The rooms were finished in woods, black and oak color I think, and the furniture, dark and simple, was always in good taste.

But the homelike air pervaded everything. It was just a place to rest and dream in. I wandered from room to room, and everywhere the same sense of rest, ease and comfort followed me.

In the parlor were pictures and books, and the library that opened out of it had a fine portrait or two of the General's staff looking down benignantly on the writing-table, where the President spent more or less of every day.

It was just the ideal of a simple, quiet home by the sea. It seemed as though the world's loud rivalries and strifes could never find its way into that delicious repose.

The housekeeper, too, seemed the kindest, most unpretentious soul in the world. She had been with the family for several years, and her affectionate loyalty was quite touching. Her talk, too, gave me a great many fresh, vivid glimpses into the family life.

Her admiration of Mrs. Grant as wife and mother, as woman in short, was unbounded. I remember one instance she related to me as illustrating Mrs. Grant's natural avoidance of display, and her wish to save the Government all unnecessary expense.

When she first entered the White House as its mistress, she found the furniture, much of it, in a dreadfully shabby and dilapidated condition. I suppose it always is after going through its four years' wear and tear.

Mrs. Grant, however, patriotically resolved that she would spare the Government any additional expense of furnishing for the next Olympiad. She went to work, and set others at it, directing and supervising. We all know what a tasteful, energetic woman can accomplish in this line. All the shabby old furniture was rejuvenated with bright, fresh damasks and rups and covers of that sort.

I suspect Mrs. Grant's experience in her Western home may have served her at the White House. At any rate the old furniture, with the new covers did duty for nearly four years, and when, at last, it became absolutely necessary to refurnish some apartments, Mrs. Grant said quietly to her housekeeper, "The old furniture has done well enough for us, and we may have another President next spring, and if we do, the new things will be just the thing for him!"

Saying this, she never suspected it would get into print, and if she should ever chance to read it here, I almost feel as though I wanted to be at hand, to ask her forgiveness for telling the story which yet was too good to be lost.

"You must see Nelly's room," said the housekeeper. Indeed, the little, liquid dissyllable had been slipping in and out of all the talk, just as it had that first evening. It was evident the family pride and tenderness centred around that young girl who was coming far across the seas in a month or two, to the hearts who were waiting with hungry eagerness to receive her.

I could not help thinking of her with a kind of tenderness that had a touch of pathos in it, the object of so much cherishing love and care, and hoping that she inherited the native kindliness of her mother's heart.

"Nothing is changed in Nelly's room. We keep everything just as she left it when she went away," said the housekeeper, as she opened the door and led me into the room, almost as though it were a sanctuary.

It was a simply furnished, pleasant chamber, such as any young girl might nestle in. All around her at Long Branch were far more sumptuous chambers than this which sheltered the President's daughter. There were little pictures and ornaments all about the room, none of them expensive; some, indeed, might have adorned the play-house of a child, yet the young girl across the sea had evidently treasured them all. The whole room gave me a pleasant impression of its owner's fresh girlishness and simplicity. The world had not spoiled her then, it seemed.

"She is so fond of the sea," said the housekeeper, bringing up one little reminiscence after another, in order to make the household daughter clear and vivid to me.

"When the new cottage was finished we talked of going into it, but Nelly said: 'No, I like the old house best. I can run down the bank and plunge into the surf whenever I want to. Don't let us leave the sea.'"

And so they stayed. And at last when the house had been all gone over, I went out on the veranda, and stood there awhile, in the pleasant midsummer morning. There was nothing to break the beautiful stillness, but the sound of the waves as they came roaring and sweeping in like a vast company of glittering chariots upon the beach. Occasionally a great, white seagull circled, with slow grace through the air. The ocean lay in its wide, still splendor all around me.

I thought of all the strife and tumult, the struggle for place and office, the shouting crowds, the processions and pageants which were filling the summer air and shaking the souls of men; and there was that peaceful sky overhead, and the great ocean below, and the stately ships coming and going softly with the sunlight on their sails.

What a commentary this was on all the struggle and raging outside. And the eyes of the whole nation were turned on that quiet brown house, in whose veranda I was standing that midsummer morning, listening to the clear bugle of the winds, and the deep bass of the sea.

It was hard to go away. I promised the housekeeper—I promised myself to come again every day, and sit there in the cool shadows and hear the psalm of the surf; but the cottage across the avenue had its own alluring programmes, the walks on the beach, the watching the sea-bathers swinging in the surf, the searching for rare treasures of pebbles in the sand, and all the rides and rambles which make Long Branch the attractive place, it is to those who go there to enjoy its splendid sea views, its soft landscapes as nature spreads them, not to plunge into its Vanity Fair of display and dress and dissipation.

So that first morning and evening at the President's were the last, for I never sat again in the deep upper veranda and watched the sails with the sunlight on them, and listened to the psalm of the sea.

It seems to me I cannot better close these little glimpses into the household life of the nation's soldier and President, than by repeating a little speech of his housekeeper, which quaint and homely as it was fairly illustrated her idea of the heart and character of the man. "General Grant is so thoroughly kind-hearted, that I do believe if a cross dog was barking, he wouldn't stop him, unless he was afraid the creature would do some harm to somebody."

EXTRAVAGANCE AND DEBT.

WE know a family consisting of father, mother, four daughters and one son. The father is a superior watch repairer, has a shop of his own, and earns, with the assistance of an apprentice, about four thousand dollars a year. He is most devoted to business and free from all expensive indulgences.

We do not know a man more harassed by debts and poverty. Whatever stock he may have on hand must always be in the name of a friend, or his creditors would soon dispose of it.

The way in which those four thousand dollars disappear we desire to give the reader, with some reflections thereupon.

House-rent, $600; shop-rent, $350; gas and coal, $175; dress for self and wife, $150; spending-money for fifteen-year-old son, $100; allowance for each daughter, $350; two servants, $190; food, $1000; extras, say, $500. This, altogether, amounts to about $4500; so our good friend F runs behindhand about $500 per year. These accumulating debts make his life a constant humiliating struggle. He said recently that but for his helpless family he would gladly take refuge in the grave.

Now, as our friend will read this, we shall take the liberty to say a few plain things, which we sincerely hope may help him out of debt and into a more comfortable frame of mind.

We shall presume that to-day you owe $1500, and shall likewise presume that you would make almost any sacrifice to rid yourself of said debt.

We shall not advise you to work harder yourself, for you already go quite beyond your endurance.

First, discharge your servants, and let your wife and daughters cook and make the beds. This will save you, in salary, board and waste, at least $500. A good beginning, you see.

Next, reduce your daughters' dress expenses to $150, which will save $400. If you or your daughters think a plainer wardrobe will make them less respectable, you are all very much mistaken. They are not half so widely known as your debts, and every new and rich addition to their dress excites anything but admiration. We know several young men who admire your girls, but are deterred from visiting them because of the facts we have mentioned. The reduction we have suggested in their wardrobe would add more to public esteem and popularity among all classes than anything else we can think of.

Then stop the hundred dollars which your son expends every year for segars and ice-cream, and take him into your shop in the place of your apprentice. Here you will save at least $400 more.

And, finally, reduce your table expenses to $500, which will be infinitely better for all. If you leave off the pies, cakes and puddings, you will have better digestion and finer complexions. If you live on plain, coarse food, you will all have sweeter breath, whiter teeth, finer skins and longer life, and, what is not unimportant with you, save $500 per year.

If you will run your eye over these several items, you will find the aggregate $1800. This will soon make you a rich man.

Allow us, dear friend, to say that you will never know a happy, manly hour until you have done something like this. And we trust your daughters will not be offended if we say that any objection they may urge to this retrenchment will discover a lack of decency and honor, which in a woman is perfectly shocking.—Dr. Dio Lewis in To-Day.

MAKE THE BEST OF LIFE.

WHAT'S the use of always fretting
Over ills that can't be cured?
What's the use of finding fault with
What we know must be endured?
Does it make our burdens lighter
If we grumble 'neath their load?
Does it make life's pathway smoother
If we fret about the road?
Better use our time, than fill it
Full of signs and vain regrets
Over some imagined blunder—
As does he who always frets.

THE SERPENT AS A SYMBOL

FROM "RENDELL'S ANTEDILUVIAN HISTORY."

THERE are few facts better attended by historical evidence, than that the serpent has, by all the nations of antiquity, been regarded and employed symbolically. It is conspicuous in their history, it stands out in their fables, and it is visible in their religion. Herodotus informs us that it was sacred at Thebes; and the hieroglyphics which have been brought to light in our own times, abundantly show that it must have been used in an emblematical way, among the ancient Egyptians. Bryant, also asserts, that in the first ages, the serpent was extensively introduced into all the mysteries that were celebrated; and that, wheresoever the Ammonians found any places of worship, there was generally some story of a serpent. There was a legend about it at Thebes, at Colchia, and Delphi. Even the Athenians had a tradition that the chief guardian of their Acropolis was a serpent.

It is sometimes presented under a variety of ideal forms, nor is it uncommon to find it represented with a human head. It is impossible, rationally to contemplate these circumstances, and doubt that the serpent sustained some symbolical character.

The facts at once suggest, that such must have been the design of the serpent, said to have been more subtle than any beast of the field; and here we make the question, of what was it significant? The various nations, by whom it was symbolically used, do not appear to have viewed it under the same aspect. Uniformity of idea in this respect, would not long continue, after that knowledge had perished, which originally directed its selection for a symbolical purpose, and when men were left, with no other guide than a fallen fancy, and no sounder principle than caprice, to conduct them in the profound matters of religion and its objects. The serpent is said to have been worshipped, from the circumstance of it having been mentioned and set apart, as one of the objects associated with the religion of Egypt. This was the opinion of Eusebius and others; and it might have been the case in the most corrupted periods of Egyptian learning. That is, it might then have become the symbol of something to be worshipped; but, although it was always a symbol, that was not always the object of it. The serpent came to be spoken of as sacred, only from the circumstance of its having been associated with religious sentiments, it was not at first set apart to be worshipped, nor for any good it could bestow, but rather to be dreaded for the mischiefs it might originate.

It was the symbol of something that might, if not guarded against, be disastrous to mankind. Hence we find it so frequently referred to in legends of remote antiquity, as having exercised an unfavorable influence upon the destinies of the people. Every one knows that the figure of a serpent biting its tail is very ancient; it is commonly regarded as the emblem of eternity: but is it not rather a representative of evil punishing itself? In Phœnician Mythology, we read of a serpent surrounding an egg, plainly implying the danger of sensuality, with which life is beset from its very beginning. Among that of the Greeks, we are informed of the hair of Medusa being transformed into serpents, because she had violated the sanctity of the Temple of Minerva. The serpents are evidently, employed to represent the evil she had perpetrated. The serpent, Python, which is fabled to have sprung out of the mud left by the deluge of Deucalion, was an emblem of the evil occasioned to Greece by the overwhelming of Thessaly. The serpents which the infant Hercules strangled in his cradle, were, unquestionably, a representation of innocence conquering the blandishments of sensuality; and the Hydra, which he afterward overthrew, was a representation of those evils which the labors of energy and fortitude may overcome. So also, the Caduceus, which was a rod entwined by serpents, and with which Mercury is said to have conducted souls to the infernal regions, plainly symbolized the evils which cling to power and so conduce to misery. Esculapius, the medical attendant on the Argonauts, is always represented with a serpent entwined about his staff, to denote the power of the physician over the diseases of humanity. Many other instances of the emblematic use of the serpent, could be easily collected from the writings of the ancients, but these are sufficient and plainly show, that the emblem of that whereby man fell was preserved among mankind for a long time after the reminiscence of its definite signification had passed away. They retained the emblem, with some general idea of its meaning, but had lost sight of its precise signification. For this we must go to analogy and the Scriptures. These are the only sources, whence satisfactory information can be drawn, and these will show us that the serpent was the sensual principle of man. "Of all the objects of the animal kingdom, the reptile tribe is the lowest, of which serpents of various kind and species are the most conspicuous. Of all the degrees of man's life, the sensual and corporeal are the lowest; because they are nearest to the earth and are actuated by merely earthly appetites, influences and causes. These lowest degrees in man's nature partake the least of what is truly human in man, and the serpent, their corresponding emblem, is of all animals the most remote from the human form. As the serpent crawls upon the earth, so the sensual principle in man is nearest akin to the earth, which, if not elevated by the rational and spiritual principles of his nature, may be said to crawl upon the earth in like manner. As sensual things have a tendency to fascinate and charm the mind, because sensual delights are more vividly experienced than any others, so certain kinds of serpents, especially the more malignant, are said, by naturalists, to fascinate and charm their prey before they devour it." The general analogies, so satisfactorily presented in this extract, assist us in perceiving certain general resemblances between the serpent and the sensual principle of man.

Now the serpent which was in Eden, we believe to have been the sensual principle, that was connected with Adam's character. For a time, there was with him a realization of the Lord's injunction, to be "wise as serpents." The sensual principle, at first, was right and orderly, because it stood in its proper relation to the dictates of his higher nature.

It was among the objects upon which the Divine approbation had been pronounced; for the Lord declared the creeping things to be "good," yea "very good." This then, was a characteristic of the serpent, or, more literally, of the sensual principle of Adam, as declared of it by the Lord himself.

So long as it was employed instrumentally, to promote the ends of spiritual use and order, so long it was wise; but when it was directed principally to secure the gratifications of corporeal nature, it became most subtle. The wisdom of the serpent is the circumspection and prudence of the sensual principle of man; the subtlety of the serpent is its artifice and deception.

OUR CLUB.

BY ANNIE L. MURPHY.

II.

OF TONGUES.

LITTLE EFFIE SEYMOUR, knitting her brows, was twirling nervously Charley Churchill's ring upon her finger.

"For the tongue is—What is that the Good Book says about the tongue being a deadly poison, Mr. Morton," she said, turning to the young theological student who had lately drifted into our circle.

"And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity, an unruly evil, full of deadly poison—is that what you mean, Miss Effie?"

She caught her breath, and clasped both hands closely over her heart with a swift, involuntary movement that spoke volumes of her painful experience in the "deadly poison." We all knew the meaning of the pathetic gesture. But shrinking from the sympathy which she saw she had evoked, she started suddenly from her seat in the shadow, and vanished from the room, too proud to betray how much she was suffering from her hurt.

Jean Mariott's great, gray eyes blazed with indignant lightnings.

"We have laws," said she, "to punish the violation of our natural rights—one may not, indeed, with impunity steal our purse, or murder us in cold blood—but for the refined cruelty, the demoniac torture inflicted on sensitive souls by meddling, malicious, mischief-making tongues there is no penalty, or none, at least, adequate to the offence. For Heaven's sake, gentlemen, can there be no statute enacted which shall compel people to mind their own business?"

"My dear, Jeannette, it would cast such a host of good folk out of employment," said Templeton, drily.

"Especially the women—which would be ungallant and ungenerous, you know," added Roy Sherwood, with a spice of malice.

"I wish every woman who utters an uncharitable, spiteful and venomous word had to suffer with a blistered and swollen tongue which would hold her silent for a month," burst forth Jeannette to whose intense nature we have to yield a wide latitude of expression.

"What a vindictive spirit, Miss Jean," laughed Roy, sarcastically. "The suffering perhaps might be endurable, but the silence, you know, would kill the unfortunate culprit in a week."

"No better than the fault itself do I like the sneering, carping, cynical temper which misses no occasion to make it the subject of low jest," returned Jeannette, severely.

"Women talk, and talk abominably about each other, I admit with all candor, but I observe with sorrow that men are not free from the same vice."

"In a word, you agree with the sharp, epigrammatic Mrs. Poyser as regards women—that 'God made 'em to match the men,'" said Templeton, good-humoredly.

"But, Jean, of tongues there are many," struck in Dell Falconer. "Is it only the spiteful and venomous, pray, that you include in the blistering penalty?"

"By no means. There is the sly, insidious, insinuating tongue that hints at evils which it dare not name—the kind of tongue the Apostle James must have had in mind when he said, 'it setteth on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire of hell.'"

"And there is the secret mole-burrowing, tale-bearing tongue, that whispers in strictest privacy the scandalous story it would not syllable to any one in the world but you, because, forsooth, it does not want to make mischief," added Mrs. Templeton.

"And the busy, officious, meddling tongue that harrows you up with a timid hesitating report of all the disagreeable things people are saying about you, because it feels you ought to know, and because it loves you so," chimed in Dell.

"And the soft, sweet, melting, traitorous tongue that draws from you almost unconsciously your heart's closest secrets, and straightway runs and delivers the precious morsels into the jaws of your enemies," said Sherwood, viciously.

"And the smooth, friendly, plausible tongue that would not do you any injustice for the world, but stabs you more cruelly and unmercifully than your bitterest adversary could do," continued Jeannette.

"And the hot, rash, angry, impetuous tongue that in a moment of frenzy, lashes with scorpion fury its offending victim, setting all hearts ablaze with its own unholy fire which, when it has smouldered out, leaves but a heap of dull, cold, lifeless ashes, where once had been a tender and loyal friendship," murmured Edna Templeton.

"And the sharp, critical, censorious tongue which darts at every weakness and folly of friend and acquaintance, leaving unmarked the generous virtue and the worthy deed," added Jeannette.

"Come, come, good friends," interrupted the professor, "you may go on classifying tongues in this fashion till you have quite exhausted your defining powers, and what do you prove except that our poor, crossed, crazed, and perverted human nature has infinite ways of torturing itself, and that tongues are only exponents of inner evils which would utterly consume us if we kept them pent up."

Our young theologian who had maintained the serene silence of superior wisdom during our vain discourse here opened his lips with the oracular air too often seen in youthful teachers, who are apt to announce a truth, old as eternity, as if they were its first herald, and with a delicious enthusiasm which alas! too often cools under the sad experience of years.

Said he, "Instead of spending our breath in exacerating effects, we should go farther back and endeavor to extirpate the causes. If hearts were overflowing with love and charity there would be no sharp, wounding, malignant tongues; and to rid the world of these we have only to expel envy, malice, hatred, and all that evil brood of passions that make their nest in the human heart."

"Tut, tut, young man," smiled the professor. "You are fresh and untried in the work of wrestling with human depravity, and you feel, no doubt, strong and valiant and bold, a moral Hercules, able and ready to undertake the task of cleaning out these Augean stables in a day. Heaven knows I would not lessen your ardor or your courage, but 'tis likely a little longer service in your chosen field will weaken your confidence, in the case of expelling the brood of evil passions from the human breast. They will not out at your bidding. The most you can do will be to convince the sinner of his sin and lend him your sympathy while he works out his own regeneration. You see we have each got our own stable to cleanse, oh, Hercules, and it is a brave soul that accomplishes the labor in the compass of a lifetime. The millennium is not reached in a day. The lion has got a long, painful journey to make before he can lie down with the lamb. But, meantime, since evil is present with us, and we cannot put an end to it, shall we not make it subservient to our growth in the higher life? These stinging scorpion tongues, for instance, may we not compel them to contribute to our spiritual development and progress—to do us good when they mean us harm?"

"What! Are you crazy, Professor Engel?" demanded Dell Falconer, with lifted brows. "A bitter, spiteful, slanderous tongue 'contribute to our spiritual development'—ha! in the direction of devils."

"A slippery, treacherous, serpent tongue that undermines our faith in God and human kind, subservient to our growth in the higher life?" questioned Jeannette, slowly, with wide thoughtful eyes on the professor's face.

"A lying, malevolent, unscrupulous and hypocritical tongue that rakes up every hellish passion in the heart, a ministrant to good—an aid to spiritual progress?" sneered Sherwood, in that disagreeably sarcastic and skeptical way of his.

The professor smiled in our critical faces.

"Is there anything so strange and absurd in all that?" he said. "Whatever calls for the exercise of patience, forbearance and charity must, if met in the right spirit, aid in the development of those admirable virtues, and so far minister to our good."

"Yes, but how many of us have the 'fight spirit,' or can feel anything but a masterly and overpowering rage when unjustly and maliciously assailed?" flashed the Falconer. "I tell you, Herr Professor, it makes anything but saints of us to be stung, and goaded, and harrowed, and fretted, and victimized in every way by impertinent, meddling, scandalizing, misrepresenting tongues."

"Why, as to that, we are as free to be fiends as saints if we will, and nothing shall compel us to choose the good if we prefer the evil," returned the professor, mildly. "But what is the merit of being sweet, and generous, and gracious, and large, and noble, only so long as we have no temptations to be anything else? If our integrity will not stand the test of direct assault, if we cannot face the adversary with calm, brave, unflinching front, fearless of all that hate and malignity can do or dare, what are we worth to our fellow creatures as examples of sweetness, tenderness, magnanimity, courage, strength, patience, and long suffering? We may fling away our opportunity to prove the beauty and grandeur of the Christian virtues, we may sink ourselves to the level of such as malign and traduce us, and malign and traduce again; there is no law, as I said constraining our choice between the true and the false, the good and the ill."

"Well, I will say for it," burst forth Jeannette, with a great struggle, "this freedom of choice when we are all upheaved, and turned topsy-turvy with passion and injured feeling is something dreadful, and it would be an unspeakable relief to know there was only just one thing possible for us to do—the thing we want to."

"But the momentary satisfaction we might find in doing that, would not, when the passion is spent, compensate us for the loss of our proud consciousness that we are rational beings, with power to act nobly if we will."

"But there is another view," went on the professor, "not a pleasant one to contemplate, but none the less true, I suppose, on that account. There may be a retributive justice in the wounds and thrusts over which we cry so lamentably. A sleepless and avenging Nemesis lashes us in these cruel, lacerating, irritating, tongues. We are loth to recognize the fact. Our suffering seems horrible unjust and unprovoked. We feel ourselves the unoffending victims of evil and unlawful machinations. But have we never been guilty of inflicting pain and discomfort through idle, thoughtless, or hot, impatient words, quickly forgotten by us, but remembered, perhaps, with rankling bitterness by those whom they concerned? Have our judgments always been tempered by the abounding love and charity which we could desire should be exercised in the criticism of our own follies and weaknesses? Have we, in all our relations and dealings with our fellows striven to guide ourselves by the tender, clear, and beautiful light of the Golden Law?"

There was a little silence, followed presently by a confused murmur of conviction, dissent, expostulation, denial, acknowledgement, during which our young student seized the opportunity to cross over to Effie's window, drawn by an attraction none the less powerful, sweet and irresistible because he could not explain it, and didn't try. We marked curiously that the gleam of Churchill's ring was gone from the slender hand put forth to make room for the sympathizing friend, on the tete-a-tete in the shadowy recess of the window, and in our conjecture as to the secret of its disappearance, we lost for a moment the thread of the discourse which was shifting warmly from one to another.

When we caught it intelligibly again Templeton was saying: "I have questioned sometimes whether there were not also a wholesome restraint in the vixen tongues of society—whether the free and wholesale cutting and hacking which we have to undergo in the dissection of our character and motives has not a beneficial influence on such of us timid, approbative souls as have the fear of adverse criticism so continually before us that we are withheld from doing anything knowingly to invite it."

"Out upon an integrity, a morality like that!" cried Jeannette in a glow of indignation. "The person—man or woman—who is restrained from doing evil, through dread of public opinion is deserving of less respect than the bold, open and avowed sinner, and his or her fair action is a spurious coin that will not pass current with the pure, high fearless souls that reverence virtue for its own sake, and seek it for its own rewards. Besides, popular sentiment is not the test of morals. Society has no just standard of right—it is one thing to-day and another to-morrow, this thing here, and that thing there, and whoever is governed by a law so fluctuating must be as unstable as water, driven hither and thither by every shifting breath of opinion. Out, I say again, upon such pitiful, cringing, cowardly time-servers! Better I like the brave, free, daring spirits who are a law unto themselves, and who will act boldly up to their own convictions of truth, though the heavens fall, and the whole superstructure of society be ground to powder."

"Have a care, Jeannette," warned Templeton. "It is just such reckless, restless, audacious, innovating spirits that to-day are seeking to overthrow the whole fabric of our social, moral and religious life, aiming their deadliest blows at sacred and time-honored institutions; and striving to substitute for a tried and established order of society their own wild, chaotic, disorganizing schemes of reform based on the freest exercise of individual liberty."

"What then? It is truth that we want though we pluck it from the ruins of all that we once thought precious," Jeannette began a trifle excitedly, but the professor's clear steady eye caught and held hers, glowing and pulsing with flame, and she stopped abruptly like a child chidden by its master.

"That subject is too broad to discuss with haste or passion," he said, quietly. "And you are in a mood to speak more warmly than you really feel, and more strongly than your judgment in cooler moments would commend. Another time, Jeannette. We shall have to concede to friend Templeton that there is a basis of truth and justice underlying the ruling principles and prejudices of society, and the wiser of us, however hardly pressed, will hesitate about hurling ourselves against them with a violence more certain to wound us than to shake them. Still, where our own sense of right clearly conflicts with the recognized social law there is no question, in respect to our own conduct in life, as to which we should follow—only let us be sure that it is conviction and not contrariety that rules us. Of one thing, however, do what we may, we shall not escape the vice of tongues. People will talk—talk mischievously, talk maliciously, talk censoriously, talk uncharitably, talk rashly, unreasoningly, passionately; talk idly, recklessly, thoughtlessly, for the pure sake of talking, and without consideration of the evil consequences involved. And while it is wise in us to mark the drift of the muddy current, to study its secret sources, and to mind what tributaries we yield to it, we should not suffer ourselves to be overwhelmed by the bitter, unclean flood. Quick to perceive, frank to acknowledge, prompt to remove the evils indicated by our critics, we ought at the same time to guard against a morbid over-sensitiveness concerning what is said about us."

"Nor need we be too solicitous to show that we have been misunderstood, and go about explaining, apologizing and defending, as if there were no other way to demonstrate the purity of our motives, and the honesty of our lives. A character that cannot vindicate and clear itself of all aspersions by a simple, straightforward course of action will never get justice or appreciation by argument or appeal. And what if we even have to submit to be misunderstood, to have our purposes grossly misrepresented, our actions fully misjudged? There is nothing so terrible in all that. Conscious of our own integrity, with heart pure and hands clean before God, let the world judge us as it may—what matter? For, after all, it is not what people think of us, but what we are, that chiefly concerns us."

Was it the student's sympathy or the professor's philosophy that brought such a wonderful glow and radiance into Effie's tear-wet face suddenly turned to the light? With the swift, beautiful impulsiveness by which she so often startled us, and which cool, cautious people did not understand, and alert, suspicious people misconstrued, she flashed from her seat, and darting up to the professor, dipped her lovely head with the motion of a humming-bird, and touched her lips to his hand.

"God bless you," she said, in a fervor of gratitude.

"And, good angels guard you, my child," he responded in a quiet fatherly voice.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPEBERRY POTTS.

No. II.

THERE is many a girl called beautiful whose handsome face will not bear a good look at it. The features may be fine, and the complexion faultless, and to a careless observer she may be very pretty; but watch her awhile, wait until she is not talking, and until the smile is faded and the light of laughter gone from her sparkling eyes, then you'll see her as she is.

A face in repose tells the true story. It tells of a daughter whose selfishness is proverbial in the home circle; of cross words flung at her father and mother, of bitter taunts given to her brothers, of unkind treatment to her sisters, and of a jealous, captious, unhappy disposition, irascible, overbearing and self-important. That smooth pink and white face will tell all this, if it is hidden there at all.

When the features are in repose and the mind in its usual state, not elated or excited—if the girl is unlovable at home and not of a sunny disposition, the face assumes its everyday, stolid, sullen, ugly look, and a close observer cannot help but read it aright.

That sweet mouth settles down into a cold dissatisfied expression, it droops at the corners, the rosy cheeks hang sullenly, the eyes look as though there were hidden, back of them, really vicious, hateful thoughts.

We see such faces every day, and while we are sorry, we can't help feeling glad that "truth will out," that it is impossible for a handsome girl to hide an ugly disposition. It is good enough for 'em, too.

Let mothers teach their little daughters that every mark of ill-temper chisels itself into the features, defaces them, leaves its mark to remain through all time, not even to be removed from the face by death.

I often read one thing in pretty faces, and the girls don't know that I see it, but it is just as plain as is this written page before me. This is what I read:

"I think it is a shame that I, Flora Arabellie, should have to work just like a kitchen-girl! I do hate to drudge at milking and scrubbing and washing dishes, and if there's one thing more than another that I despise, it is cooking, bending over the hot stove and ruining my complexion, and making my hands red and wide; just a complete drudge for those big boys and father and the young 'uns! It's a burning shame! I was born for something better, I feel it; but how can I rise when I am fettered thus?"

Pooh! nonsense! I guess when the world needs you you'll find your place. There has never yet been a man or a woman, filling high places, who did not come up, step by step, from a lowly estate.

Think of Lincoln, working for his board and clothes, and coming home Saturday nights and finding his mother banging away at the loom in the "lean-to" attached to her lowly cabin; of Sherman whose grand march "down to the sea" thrills all hearts, a little bound boy picking blackberries on the hills about Lancaster; of Farraday, marking off into seven divisions the loaf that was to last him a week; of our worthy President smelling nothing but leather, in his shop in Galena; of Greeley going to bed hungry, and of dozens of other cases, and be content to do your duty. If you do not fulfil your duty where you now are, you will not be apt to do it elsewhere.

I hesitated when I wrote high places, for it is a high place to be sister in a family of brothers.

No doubt, in the sight of angels, it is a higher place than the President's. So much depends on the sister. Sometimes I think her influence is more than the mother's because boys will make a confidante of a loving sister, in a way that they will not of their mothers. They can tell the sister everything, and she can soothe over their fancied insults, and exhort them to kindness and forgiveness, and she can make them more manly and noble and generous.

If I hear of a boy stealing, fighting, betting, racing, gambling, or getting drunk, the first thought of mine is that his sisters have been derelict in their duty.

So when Flora Arabellie makes an ugly face, and calls her daily duties, dirty drudgery, oh, I think what a beautiful work is hers! if she only does it through love for her dear ones.

I call it an exalted work to cook good wholesome dinners, on time, to give the brothers clean under-clothing, and warm woolly socks and mittens, and see that they don't creep into beds not made, or only "spread up;" see that they have good books to read, that they use no vile or profane language, or slang phrases. Try and make their homes so attractive that they'll say: "there's not another spot on earth like this."

If father scolds, smoothe over and make allowance for his hastily spoken words, and do all in their power to make them temperance men, and upright, pious men who will reverence women.

Indeed I think the best way to make men venerate and think highly of women is for the sisters to set a good example themselves.

There is no end to a sister's duties; her work is far-reaching, and glorious in its good results.

I feel my eyes snap when I hear an upstart of a girl call housework drudgery; I see no such a thing as drudgery in this social life of ours, and the woman who calls the labor of love and duty, by that disrespectful word, is to be pitied.

I made a mistake last week and baked too many loaves of bread, and the day following I was sick and it was not carried down cellar, and now we have been eating dry bread..

The deacon helps me out of many a trouble by telling me how his grandmother used to do, in New Salem, Mass., when he was a little boy. He says she used to freshen dry loaves of bread even if they were a week or ten days old. I followed his direction and dipped a dry loaf two or three times in a pail of water, put it in the bread-pan in a moderately hot oven and let it remain half an hour, turning it over once, letting the heat of the oven gradually diminish, and the bread came out just as good as new. I was delighted with the plan and would recommend that only one loaf at a time be renewed. To save a trip down cellar with the loaf after supper, it may be wrapped in a damp towel.

We are all bird-lovers here at the deacon's, and I guess the brothers won't care if I tell how tenderly they woo the birds.

We killed a very fat cow yesterday, and when I went out to save the tripe, I saw one of the boys up in an apple tree with a hammer and nails, pecking away at something. I stole around and found that he had cut the udder in strips, and was nailing them to some of the big branches, out of the reach of prowling dogs and cats. That was for the little birds to eat all through the winter.

We always put the useless offal up in the trees for the birds, and the balance we leave on the ground covered in a way that nothing can reach it except the chickens. It is excellent food for laying hens.

When I was a little girl it was considered a fortnight's work to clean a tripe. I would rather clean one now than to wash a bed-quilt, and this is the way I do it.

Let it be laid on boards to keep the outside clean. Shake the contents out well through a small hole, and put in about a pint of unslaked lime with two gallons of warm water. Place it in a tub of water and agitate fifteen or twenty minutes, or until the lime is well-slaked. The inside skin can then be scraped off. The lime takes out all odor and leaves the tripe nice and soft. Cut it up, wash it well, and keep it in a weak brine that is to be changed occasionally.

Broil it like steak, buttered and peppered, or, dip the pieces in melted butter and fry them. I am sure I cannot see why poor people who buy their meat, don't use tripe, when they can get them for nothing.

If I were a widow I'd show you how to manage. Whenever somebody killed a beeve I'd swoop down like a big buzzard.

I am pleased with the way Cousin Barbara manages little bib aprons. When they begin to break at the elbows she rips the sleeves out and changes them, the right to the left, and the left to the right, and that brings the worn place inside of the arm.

It takes no longer than to patch them and looks a great deal better.

Cousin Bab is a charming woman. I told you once about her coming to our house and hawling right out, because the hogs had gotten in and destroyed her flower-beds; well she has better judgment now, and Tucker, her husband, better appreciates her now than he did then. She can lead him by a single hair, and I believe the secret is, that she is always one way, calm, cool, self-poised, gentle in her sweet way of reproving, and there is never a frown on her brow. I often think it must belittle a wife and mother to let her family see her angry, her face red and distorted with passion, her voice shrill and sharp, and her moods frequently sulky ones, and, perhaps, I only surmise this—her language coarse and vulgar. I hope this latter is never the case. I don't know that it is.

If it is, dear ones, for her poor sake keep it a secret in the sacred bosom of the family. I know that trouble and trials not heroically borne, with sickness and shattered nerves, and a weak faith in God and man, might possibly result in this unhappy state. If so, be kind and careful, and let no word or deed of yours add a feather's weight to the burden she totters under in her weakness.

While Cousin Barbara was here I was showing her a blotch of ink on my white apron. I had soaked it in buttermilk, and smoked it over brimstone, and tried every way to get it out, but it only grew brighter. I was vexed when it happened. The deacon was hanging a rennet up over my head, and knocked down a bunch of pop corn and tipped the inkstand right over into my lap. It was a careless trick, and if I had been looking up I might have got hit in the mouth and been disfigured for life; might have changed my smile, for which I am noted, into a horrible grimace.

Barbara said one of her girls had carried her ink-stand home from writing-school in her pocket, and it leaked, and quite ruined a white ruffled skirt. One of Tucker's aunts was visiting there and she soon took it out. She made a strong solution of oxalic acid, wet, and held the place over a current of steam, I think she said the tea-kettle with the boiling water only covering in part the base of the spout. Wash and scald well, and if the first application don't remove it, try again. This will also take out the stain of iron rust. Oxalic acid looks just like salts, so much so, that lately a poor wife, half-asleep in the early dawn, gave her sick husband a dose and killed him. I recommend that it be used and kept in a state of solution. Let the bottle be plainly labelled poison. As soon as any drug or acid, or medicine comes into house be sure you label it. Do it while you are sure that you are not mistaken in the correct name. And when a physician leaves medicine you should write on a slip of paper and put in the receptacle with the medicine, just what he said about it. If we are watching in the night with the sick, and are sleepy, or scared, we are very apt to make mistakes. I know that I cannot trust myself. I always write down the doctor's orders.

Hoh! hoh! I've just been out raking up and carrying in chips! I always feel myself to be on the safe side if I have a good heap of dry chips stored away. If I am in a hurry to make a cup of tea, or boil an egg, or toast a slice of bread, I only want a few dry twigs and a handful of chips. It is nonsense to waste good wood just for a little hurried fire that you only want for a few minutes.

So, every time the men cut a few sticks with an axe, send the little ones out to gather up every chip, and put them away in a dry place for mother. A child can show its love so charmingly this way, better than all the kisses they could give. It teaches them thrift, and economy, and good management, besides.

We've had a visitor for over a week, Cousin Becky Donaldson from Pa. She said she had been dousey (she don't mean dousey at all, at all; look in your dictionary and see) and she thought a jaunt out amongst her kin would brighten her up a little and make her feel better.

She has dyspepsia, and is low-spirited, and sunken-eyed, and nearly all her conversation is about murders, and burglars, and robbers, and people falling out of upper windows, and from scaffoldings. At night, all the curtains have to be drawn, and the blinds closed, and the door bolted, and the lights turned half down, and after we go to bed we are be-wought to peep around under things and "see if there isn't a man hidden somewhere."

She wants us to talk in whispers, and when we laugh to put our heads down under the blankets, or press the pillows over our mouths.

Now the girls and I always do our visiting at the table and after we go to bed, and sometimes we grow so boisterous that the deacon has to rap his knuckles on the wall intimating, "less noise." But then he's always had to do that, ever since he had a family.

Time was, when the laughter would burst out, and he would have to take a stick of kindling-timber and cudgel the bed-clothes that covered us. We would all howl out; "oh, papa! I'll-never-do't-again—I'll-never-do't-again!" and try to make him think he was killing us, and then the laugh would burst out again by the time he would be snugly in bed.

Some mornings when we ask Becky how she feels, she will say: "my head aches bitterly!" or, "are you sure the blinds were all closed and fastened on the inside; I thought I heard some one at the shutters about midnight."

She will frequently groan right out in a good, strong, full voice, coming upon us as suddenly as a thunder peal in a calm, midsummer day.

Some days she will sit and sigh with her eyebrows raised and her mouth drawn down at the corners, and her thin transparent ears sticking out like handles on a cream crock. She will say then that she has the "blues most dretfully," and she will say it looking us right in the eyes, and not a bit ashamed. Now I think any woman ought to be ashamed to own that she has them, because they are the result of one or more of nature's laws violated, and the confession brands one as a coward, a glutton, or grossly intemperate. For a woman especially, this seems coarse, unwomanly, out of place.

Blues and headache are the horned bug-bears that stand squarely in Becky's path, and instead of meeting them bravely she quails before them.

Now, honestly, the right name for these triple foes to which she succumbs is indigestion—not half so pretty, or interesting, or romantic as blues and headache. That's just it! she violates a half dozen of nature's prime laws, and then goes whining about over low spirits and uncongeniality, and the deceitfulness of the world, and the stubborn blindness of people everywhere, and unappreciative friends, and all the time I believe the secret lies in her two cups of strong coffee, or the hearty dinner of boiled pot-pie that night as well have been boiled cloth or leather.

One who does not work at real labor, demanding muscular exercise, cannot with impunity eat a very hearty meal of strong food and not have an interesting headache, or a poetical spasm of the blues.

If one drops down on flowery beds of ease, she must not be surprised to feel the pricking of an occasional thorn. Nature cannot work well with any of her wheels locked.

The best preventive I ever found for the blues was to have my mind at work cheerfully, entirely, my heart full of hopeful thoughts, and my hands, and head, and feet, busy and moving.

Have the whole machinery a-going, and you may snap your fingers disdainfully at the first blue that peeps.

Have you nothing to work at?

Interest yourself in the case of a poor theological student, struggling to acquire an education. God knows the whole world is sprinkled over with them long-faced, sad-eyed, in rusty and seedy clothes, denying themselves half the comforts we enjoy, calling them luxuries, and trying to think they can starve and suffer along without them.

That is the kind of men who are often in colleges, and seminaries in want of clothes and money, fighting their way, inch by inch, with poverty, and, too often in spite of their strongest efforts, growing bitter and misanthropic. This is a field to which one may direct energies that are rusting with the blues, energies that if rightly directed could be wrought into a strong and beautiful and exalted power.

Another good work for one who has the blues, is to collect money enough to buy a sewing-machine for a poor widow, dependant on her own exertions for the support of her family.

Then, there are poor children to be clothed, and wood-piles to be made before lowly doors, where none are now, and poor women to be instructed in the knack of managing, and planning; there is more charity in that sometimes than in merely giving—then there's a weak brother who can't stand the color of the wine in the cup without tasting it; he needs an encouraging word and a pat of congratulation on the shoulder.

And when you do talk temperance to a man, some things are to be avoided—don't say "I—I"—and "you—you," with your hands folded or your thumbs sticking in the arm eyes of your vest, say "we," and "my dear friend," and "my poor brother."

I have been told by reclaimed inebriates that when a man came to talk temperance and reform, it only exasperated them to see him stand up high and dry, and free from the vice, and say you instead of that sweet, tender plural we and us.

A poor man with the ban and the curse upon him needs to be approached carefully and kindly, and after the manner in which our Saviour dealt with the erring. He must not be made to feel that there is an impassable gulf between them, or a barrier that is insurmountable; the secret lies in putting one's self on a level with him, in remembering all the time that it is only through God's infinite grace, that he has not fallen even lower than his poor brother; he has the same passions, it may be, undeveloped, the same proneness to evil, but not the same weakness. We know not but:

"Unto the angels who love him,
He may be better and purer than you."

If you work kindly, and in good faith, and with sincere earnestness, and patience, and forbearance, your efforts may be rewarded, at least, you may assist him to take two steps forward and upward, and that is very good, even if he should slip back one step, be of good heart; it was a move in the right direction. Remember always to think kindly and to let,

"The sweet mantle of charity cover Errors that only the infinite knows."

We little Pottas were brought up to reverence an intoxicated man.

Our father always had a weakness for drunk men; he never felt better than when he would find a half-frozen one. He would sling him on his shoulder like a sack of grain and come in with his prey, and warm him, and chafe him, and make him drink hot coffee, and then put him in the best bed, the one that had the white curtains about it.

Many a poor old fellow would waken in the morning, sober, and not have the slightest knowledge of how he came there. My mother heard one poor creature mutter once in the early morning light: "and this is Heaven?"

My gold pen rolled off the table the other day and stuck in the carpet. One point was twisted out, and one in. I said, "oh, my good Cousin-David-pen is ruined!"

Tarrey Taney, one of the students, was here getting out his Latin lesson with the girls, and he came running into the sitting-room saying: "Miss Potts, tinkering gold pens in my forte, let me look at it."

Would anybody believe it! He laid a piece of soft morocco on the desk, placed the pen on it, and gently rubbed down the back of it with a bit of cork; it straightened gradually, then he rubbed harder, and in a few minutes the pen was as good as ever. I was very grateful. I would not have given him one cent for it when he took it into his hands.

He says a gold-pen dealer told him once, that pens should occasionally be placed on soft leather and rubbed down the back with a cork, that it kept them in good order and the diamonds secure.

To take a peep into Deacon Potts's pantry you would think there wasn't much in it, but that is all owing to the late arrangements which we have just perfected.

The mornings were too cool to eat an early breakfast in the dining-room, and it was too much trouble to bring out the table. So we moved the pantry-table into the kitchen, and then we missed it and really couldn't spare it. I could have made a store box, tipped on its side, answer, but it would have to be moved when we would scrub. I studied about it two or three days, and at last it came to me.

The end of the pantry was just wide enough to take in the large cupboard and table. A chair-board runs all around. I had a shelf, two feet wide laid, one end and one side on that, and then a cleet screwed on to the cupboard to hold the other end of the shelf. It is a good arrangement. While we are using it we keep a brown paper cover on it, but after the work is all done up we lay a fresh newspaper over it—makes it nice and tidy.

I don't like to see pots and kettles in sight in a pantry; if other women don't, and they have no sink with door to hide them, they can try my plan.

Take a store-box about eighteen inches deep, nail two cleets inside, set it up on one end with the back to the wall, then fit a shelf in on the cleets, mind that you measure correctly, before you saw off the length so as to make a good fit. Stand this in a corner of your pantry. Now you want a top to it, which will be made of a board longer and wider than the upper end of the box is.

Make a curtain of dark calico, run a stout cord through the wide hem of it, and tack it on around the edge of the top cover. If to be used daily, spread a paper over it, if not, something nicer.

Cooking utensils are unsightly and it is gratifying to have them covered in such an innocent way.

I know how to make all kinds of improvised furniture, and nothing pleases me better than to flourish carpenter's tools, and make blocks, and shavings, and new things. None of my furniture stands very close inspection however. I remember one time, years ago, of trying to cover the gray stone mantle above the old fire-place, with boards. I had nothing to nail to, and my poor womanly ingenuity suggested nothing better than to bore holes in some linn planks, put strings through, and hang them up over the stones, one tied to another.

I was very tired at night with lifting boards, and reaching higher than my head, and boring, and working to such a disadvantage, but the gray stones were covered, and I sat and looked admiringly at my own handiwork. I had pasted paper over them so the men would not laugh at my work.

Just before bed-time, as we all sat about the fire, with good will toward everybody warming our hearts—suddenly there came upon us a sound like the breaking up of ice, a clashing and a crashing, and down came the whole structure.

The Pottases made their coat tails fly through the air. I only wonder now that there was a pot left to tell the tale. It just grazed the back of the deacon's head and shoulders, and smashed in a tea kettle that stood on the stove near by, frightened the brothers, waked the baby, and made the cat's tail look as big as a box.

The dust and ashes and cinders flew, and the words spoken were not much to the credit of the amateur carpenter.

A curtain, say two widths wide of calico across the corner of the kitchen, or pantry, may be made to cover things on a row of shelves things unsightly, or meant to be covered from the gaze, or dust, or to make a cosey appearance. This is a good suggestion where you have not as much room as you really need. Try it and see.

I have learned some things about the temperature of water that all young housekeepers may not know. If you put any kind of meat on to cook in hot water it toughens it, and extracts all the nutriment, but it will enough if you want the water for soup or gravy.

If you put it on to cook in boiling water, it softens it and does not bring out the nutritious juices into the water.

— Just so if washing a discolored tablecloth; drop it into boiling water and it brings out the stains, into hot water and it sets them.

— If cooking meat that is strong or too salty, put it on to cook in cold water, and leave it in until the

I received a letter lately from a lady who has kept house twenty-four years. Her penmanship was bold and brave, and showed uncommon energy. That letter was an open window into one woman's soul, and its earnest tone did me good.

When she sees this she will know that I thank her most cordially. Some of the suggestions in her letter are timely. She says: "I prefer to wash on Monday, then if I had a spell of headache, or company, or anything goes wrong, I have the satisfaction of knowing that my week's washing is done anyhow. Sometimes if it is stormy and I cannot hang out my clothes, I do not leave them in the rinse and finish Tuesday, but wring out and starch as usual, spread the brown towels in the bottom of the clothes basket, then lay in the other clothes, press down, lap the ends of the towels over the top, and set the basket in the cellar. In winter they do not freeze, and in summer do not dry next the basket. Of course colored clothes cannot be thus treated."

During this cold weather do not forget the chickens. Put all your scraps, crusts, cold potatoes, apple cores, little bits of meat, scrapings of the dough try, old biscuits, mouldy pies, little dribs off the breakfast plates, and everything eatable in a kettle kept handy to the kitchen. Add a quart or so of water, warm all up together, and when soft and broken up, thicken with corn-meal, put in a good sprinkling of pepper, and feed your chickens well.

Give them fresh water to drink. It seems to me if we give our chickens a warm feed once a day in cold weather, they may not die if the epidemic comes around next summer. I refer to flocks of one or two hundred—they could not be so well kept as could a dozen or so.

I was pleased with a bit of economy that I saw practiced lately at the breakfast-table of a couple of student girls. They had to study hard, and were obliged to economise time. Instead of a tablecloth their plain fare was laid out upon a New York Tribune. That saved a little washing, and was quite as nice as a tablecloth. They said a Tribune would last them a knows the whole world is springier than their in-long-faced, sad-eyed, in rustier hair cut short. They ing themselves half the late style of dressing it de-them luxuries, and then they could give and keep it and suffer along with it.

That is the kind of a girl that was formerly a student of Bub's when ing their abroad, stayed with us one night a few often in go.

and now here at Pottsville we don't stand much on ceremony; the conventionalities of society don't hamper us one bit, this being the case I had no hesi-tancy in stepping up and feeling of her coat, and commending its fit, and asking for the pattern. And now see what I found out to tell you, poor girls and school-ma'ms whose dollars are running short. She told me it was one that she had worn for three con-secutive winters, and this winter, tired of it she had laid it away, but when she knew of her visit up here she began to look about for some kind of an outer garment.

She was a poor school-teacher the daughter of a widow, and she didn't feel able to buy anything new. She took the old gray coat out of the closet, and figured awhile and decided to make something new out of it, which she did by turning, cutting over into new style, putting on new trimming, new buttons, etc. It was a very neat garment and the color harmonized with her best dress.

I told her such economy was commendable, and I did wish there was more of it put in practice.

"We never let anything wear out at our house," said she; now she lives at Uncle's and she uses all his old coats to make new sacques out of. She makes real servicable and neat garments out of them after he tosses them aside.

The body and skirts and sleeves of a good-sized coat nicely sponged and pressed, and maybe turned wrong side out, will be found to contain a good deal of nice cloth. Sometimes with a little fixing the sleeves will be the right size already.

To add the finishing touches to a sacque, you sometimes need a bias strip or two of farmer's satin, or silk velvet, or a little trimming of pinked silk, or or fine merino, perhaps stitched or with thread of another color.

I liked the girl's spirit, and though she came from an obscure yet intelligent country village of perhaps twenty houses, I was not at all surprised to learn that she was reading Cæsar, and was well advanced in mathematics.

Whatever you undertake to make, girls, don't slight it because your materials are not new; and after you have made new coats, or wraps, be careful to fold them neatly when you take them off—that is the secret of keeping one's clothes looking fresh and new.

So many girls will throw a shawl across a chair back and pile other things on it, and when they are ready the next morning to put it away, it will be found stretched corner-wise, and creased and broken most shamefully.

I know of a white crape shawl that has been worn seventeen summers, and it is still folded in the first fresh fold—has no marks of a human neck in the centre of it, running cornerwise either, and not a stain except one little dot that seems as if made by the dainty touch of a baby's greasy finger tip.

The black Thibet shawl that I have worn to ordinations, and conventions, and protracted-meetings, and associations, for thirteen years, is still folded as when I bought it. It is just as good as new only for one place in the fringe. I was riding to covenant-meeting that time with Deacon Skiles, and when he sprang, kind of nimble-like, out of the buggy, my shawl fringe was caught on one of his buttons. It pulled me sprawling down into the buggy with my calash on the fore wheel. The button wouldn't let go. I was crumpled all up in a heap like a bundle of dried goods, and couldn't help myself at all.

But the deacon took out his knife and cut off the belligerent button. I knew that was a bad sign, then. I didn't care so much for the silk fringe, but I did hate to have people mistrust that I'd been sitting alongside of the deacon—near enough for my fringe and his coat button to get into a snarl.

I was afraid it wa'n't proper for a woman in good standing in the regular Baptist church. Every time I look at that shawl I sigh and think I will let the dead past bury its dead—let by-gones be by-gones; I'm sure if he can be happy with the likes of Rhoda Bowles, I can be happy without him. I really believe with the poet that "there's as good fish in the sea as these out of it."

THE FOOT BRIDGE.

BY MARIE S. LADD.

THROUGHOUT the long hours of the day
How many tread its yielding plank,
That safely bear them on their way
Across the stream to either bank.

A motley throng, perhaps in haste
To chase their phantom, though it flies,
Once grasping it they hope to taste
The blissful joys of Paradise.

And yet, what thoughts beat through the brain
In time with footsteps fast or slow,
What hopes they carry in their train,
Or what unrest, we may not know.

Could all their fancies take dim form,
And hover in the ambient air,
How strange and sad would be the charm,
That little quiet bridge would wear.

But to that bridge who will repairs,
And passing leaves no other trace,
Than that which constant treading wears
Upon its hard enduring face.

Yet on our varied way in life
We leave the marks where we have been,
Disclosing in the restless strife
The silent path we tread within.

LAY SERMONS.

THIS UNEVEN WORLD.

BY J. E. —.

"NOW look at that fellow," said one poor man to another, as they walked home together; "Don't he take his ease? Nothing to do but ride around in his carriage and look after his money. If he wants a thing he buys it. If his children need shoes they have them, and he lives on the fat of the land every day. Isn't it a mighty unequal world?"

"Not so very, Hugh. I'll warrant he has troubles and distress enough of some sort."

"But nothing like mine, I can tell you. To be always so cramped and crowded for money is a harder burden than he has ever had, I'll venture."

"You think you would trade with him even, do you—just take his situation out and out, and give him yours?"

"Yes, if I could take my family with me."

"Ah, that's not in the bargain. His wife, I am told, is a shrew."

"I'm thankful I have the advantage of him there. If it wasn't for Mary's sweet, cheerful temper, I don't know how we should bear our poverty."

"Then his oldest son is a cripple."

"My Bob is straight and robust as that pine tree. It's something to be thankful for, Mason, that one's children are all sound and healthy, isn't it, though?"

"I should think so. That rich man sometimes sits up whole nights in hard study over his business affairs, while you are soundly, comfortably sleeping, Hugh. More than that; I know he is sometimes nearly distracted to raise five thousand dollars or so that must be had, feeling more cramped for money than ever you did in your life."

"Well, well, it may not be quite so uneven a world as we think for. But I am hungry enough for my good supper, if it isn't made of roast turkey and cranberry sauce. There come the children, running to meet me; so good night, neighbor, I hope you have as good a welcome waiting for you."

HOW TO LEARN SELF-DENIAL.

BY MRS. J. E. McCAUGHY.

"COUSIN Aggie, you are a mystery to me. How you ever manage to live I do not know, with so much sickness always in your home. Your husband was an invalid for years; poor Harry must needs break a leg, to enjoy your good nursing; little Carrie has had her 'ups and downs' pretty steadily all her little life, and now your husband's niece is with you, wasting with consumption, and taking all your leisure, just when it seemed as though you might take a little rest."

"Hush, Jenny dear, and don't complain of poor Hattie. She is here by my express invitation. The poor child has no other home, and what can she do without one. She is so comfortable and happy here, it is reward enough for all the care I give her."

"I don't complain, Aggie: I only wonder you cannot love sound sleep and ease and comfort as I do, for instance, or you could not bear it."

"Ah, Jenny dear, it is a good thing to bear the yoke in one's youth. I never could have done half as well by my dear ones, if I had not served a long apprenticeship in self-denial in my early days. It don't matter much how the experience comes, so the lesson of self-denial is learned. It was just as hard for me as for any one, I assure you. I rebelled against it, and fretted under it for a time, but at last it grew easy."

"Taking up the same burdens daily, they at last become so much, a habit that you feel lost without them. I cannot tell you how I missed my brother's little boy when they moved away to the West. I had taken almost the sole care of him for a year, and no one thought I could save his life. He was always so wakeful and restless, I had little sleep with him, but it was a joy to see him grow stronger and heartier all the time. He has since become a very robust boy, they write me. After Allie went away I could hardly sleep for a long time. I missed the care so much. He kept me awake more when absent than when with me. It was my lot, Jenny, to have much care and labor for others in my childhood and girlhood, and it has been my preparation for the life-work God had in store for me."

"Self-denial cannot come to us by precept; we must have the sharp, hard practice, or we shall not attain it. It is a great blessing to have the lessons taught early before the opposite habits are fixed, for it is hard to take them up in later life. God has given us all abundant means of putting the great lessons of self-sacrifice. He has taught us into daily practice. The way to do good is open to every one, and we need to walk in His footsteps, who pleased not Himself. So shall we be His disciples."

SICK, AND YE VISITED ME.

MANY Christian women, anxious to do good, yet waste their time and effort in idle musings and wishings, while no decisive step is taken. If they were in such or such circumstances, they felt that they could do much for the benefit of society.

Now, there is a simple means by which almost every one can benefit the community in which she lives. This is by unceremonious personal calls. It does not require extra dressing and decorating to call on a poor neighbor, yet often such a little attention may be a means of great benefit to them, and a source of lasting gratitude.

It is impossible to appreciate the illness, the poverty or suffering in any form of another, except we see it. We may hear of it and sigh over it, but we shall rarely be stirred up to do something for it, except it come under our personal observation.

"The Lord show mercy unto the house of Onisaphoras," writes Paul, "for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain."

The call of this good man upon him, when he was a prisoner and needy, was remembered by Paul with gratitude, and made the occasion of this earnest prayer to God for a blessing upon him.

From many a full heart may go up such prayers for you and yours, if you will but show like kindness to those in need. It will refresh and bless your own heart by the exercise of this charity, besides bringing down a direct blessing from Him who takes note of all your ways.

PRAYER FOR NATURAL BLESSINGS.

I HAVE been asked the question, "Is it right and of any avail to pray for natural blessings?" The question has probably been often asked, at least mentally, by many pious and reflecting persons. But it does not seem easy to give a direct answer to the question in a few words. Every one must pray according to his own state, and according to his conceptions of what God is, and what He requires of us. What would be right and useful for one person, and in one state of mind, might not be right for another, or in a different state. But any prayer, reverently and humbly offered, is better than none at all.

As a general rule, and under ordinary circumstances, I conceive that it is not necessary to pray for specific natural blessings; first, because our Lord has promised that to those who seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, all other needful things shall be given; and our Heavenly Father knows what things we have need of before we ask Him. And, secondly, because we do not and cannot know what things will be real blessings for us to receive, and are constantly liable to be mistaken when we suppose we know. Still, it is a duty to commit our natural and worldly affairs to the divine care in our prayers, and to ask for aid in the performance of our worldly duties, whatever it may be that we need therein.

But my correspondent asks further: "If we pray for a desirable good, humbly, and in submission to the divine will, will not such prayer tend to produce such a state that the good may be a blessing, and so come?"

I suppose that all true prayer is from God; that is, that He leads the humble and devout heart to make supplication for such good things as He is ready and desirous to give. How can it be otherwise with Him who is in the Lord, and lives from the Lord? And He may sometimes lead us to ask of Him the natural good things which He is intending to bestow. He may, and sometimes does, I believe, place us in such circumstances as to make it seem a duty not to be neglected, and a breach of our trust in His fatherly kindness, not to ask for such things. But we must then be in a state to ask them, not for our own sake, but for the Lord's sake, and for the sake of the use to which they are to minister.

Again, when we are in peril for our lives, it is to be deemed not only a duty to use all proper and possible means of escape and safety, but also to ask the divine assistance in our efforts. And why? Because our life in this world is a divine gift, which it is our duty to preserve and care for to the best of our ability, not so much for our own sake, as for the sake of our use in the world which the Lord gives us to perform here, and which He requires of us as worthy and faithful servants. And just in proportion as we acknowledge and feel ourselves to be His servants shall we be ready to accept the alternative of life or death at His hands, not wishing to choose for our own sake whether we shall serve Him in this world or in another.

But suppose we are saved; of how much avail was our prayer toward our escape? Perhaps much, in disposing us to receive from above the necessary wisdom and prudence to use the means of safety which were at hand; or in preserving us from the trepidation and distraction which would have disqualified us for employing them; or in still other ways; and again, perhaps, very little, or none at all. None, certainly, we may presume, in inducing the Lord to provide for our safety, which He was intending to grant before our prayer was offered, while the very prayer itself was, if we may so speak, a reflection of His divine mercy upon ourselves, an inspiration from the same almighty love which wrought the deliverance. And this may have been brought to pass entirely without aid from human exertions, so that our gratitude to God, and our trust and faith in Him, may be all the stronger. But in either case, the soul that would humbly commit itself to God's care in the time of peril, will be the one that will most sincerely and heartily thank Him for the deliverance; and as the final and real end of prayer is to bring us nearer to God, and more fully into the acknowledgment of His providence, that end is gained in either case.

But again, suppose that our bodily life shall, after all, perish in the impending calamity, will our prayer have been in vain? Good men as well as bad ones lose their lives by shipwrecks and earthquakes; and does the Lord lead them to pray for things which He will not grant? He may permit it, just as He permits us to do many other things which we never should do, or should do very differently, could we foresee the consequences. But is prayer always in vain that is not answered in precisely the terms we pray for? Is it in vain if it strengthens our faith and trust in Him to whom we commit our ways? Is it in vain if we receive more and better than we ask? It is right, and just, that we should seek to preserve our natural life; but if the Lord should see fit to take it away now, shall we not be satisfied to find, when we awake in the land of immortality, that we have not really died, but that the Lord has given us a better life than that which He took away, and shall we not then thank Him that He has brought us thither?

Every one must be able to see that he who prays in a spirit of genuine piety, and humility, whether it be for natural or spiritual blessings, will feel that he is not dictating to the divine wisdom what it shall do for him, but will trust his Father in Heaven to do what His wisdom shall see fit, whether it accords with our wishes and expectations or not. If regeneration and eternal life be what we are seeking first of all, we shall surely claim that our Lord shall so answer our prayers as to aid in these uses, and lead us nearer toward Heaven, whether He grant what we suppose we need or not.

But though it may be at least sometimes proper, and may even seem to be a duty, to pray for natural good things, it may be presumed that the state in which we are inclined to do so is comparatively a low and external one. If we were in an elevated and spiritual state, we should be thinking little of external things, and still less of making them special subjects of prayer to Him who has them all in His care, and who will surely dispose them for our good, so far as we do not resist and thwart His purposes.

We must, however, pass through low and external as well as elevated states, and we must pray in states when spiritual life is feeble and flickering, as well as when it is active. And even our best states are so much tempered with selfishness, that God must see much of it to forgive and excuse, as well in our prayers as the other acts of our life. To pass through these states, and to pray in them, in the best manner we can, is a necessary means of coming into higher and better states. We must not neglect prayer or other spiritual duties now, because we are not good enough to do them acceptably. If we do, we never shall become good enough. An acknowledgment that we lack goodness is a sufficient qualification for prayer that the Lord will hear.—D. H. H., in N. J. Mess.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

INSINCERITY OF SPEECH.

BY J. M'O.

A LADY was once expressing great regret that her daughters took no interest in religion. They seemed to have little faith or confidence in any one's professions regarding it. This seemed inexplicable to the mother, "when their early training was considered."

It was not so remarkable to a friend, who happened to be for a time an inmate of the family. A lady called one day, and was received with the greatest warmth and apparent pleasure. When she proposed going, she was urged to remain longer, and many expressions were used which seemed to imply a great enjoyment of her company. But no sooner had she left than the lady's tone changed entirely. She criticised her visitor unsparingly, and spoke of her annoyance at the protracted call. There sat the young daughters, listening to both conversations. No wonder they did not have faith in a religion whose very groundwork should be truth. The mother's example was a more powerful teacher to them than her words.

We should be especially careful how we greet the people our children have heard us criticise. We may lose our influence over them for all good by a little insincerity.

"Did you really think it was pretty, mother?" asked a young lady, respecting a piece of fancy work the mother had been admiring with much enthusiasm; "or did you only say so?"

Never let your children be for a moment in doubt on such a point. Oh, these sharp little eyes, that watch us so closely! "What manner of persons ought we to be," where so much is involved for their future? If we would have them hollow and heartless, with no faith in their fellow-men, we have but to show a little insincerity in our daily life. The lesson will take deep root and bear its bitter fruit.

BOYS.

THERE is an article bearing the above title in a recent number of the Christian Union, under the signature & C. H., which is so excellent in its ideas and suggestions in regard to the management of that troublesome portion of humanity, that we give it almost entire:

"Emily, bring your brother his slippers," has grown to be a proverb in one family, to express the climax of masculine inefficiency and of feminine indulgence. This, too, in a family where there is great courtesy between brothers and sisters, and a certain chivalric protection of the boy over the girl "out of doors." But within doors the boy, so sturdy and ready elsewhere, is a marvel of clumsy helplessness. Tablecloths slide before him; books and china fall with crashes to the floor; overturning chairs and work-baskets, out of doors he goes, with a whisp and a bang, leaving chaos behind him for sisterly hands to remedy.

Or, if a quiet boy, addicted to fireside lounging, he may watch the household movements from a corner of his eye. He will come if you call him, to hold a skein of silk for your winding, but does it ever occur to him to spring forward and help with the heavy coal-scuttle coming into the room?

It is all the fault of his mother, doubtless, that he has learned this indifference to the weary work going on before his eyes. A country boy, in the wide, open kitchen of a breezy farm-house, may indeed be the hewer of wood and drawer of water, and take his part indoors as well as out. But the city boy belongs to the privileged class. He is waited on from morning till night, not only by the servants, but by sisters and mother.

In those small, smoothly-running establishments, where the women of the family give their time and strength to the home-keeping, the boys, the sons, are as young princes. They come home from school or from the store, tired enough, it may be, but the sisters and mother are tired too! The boys, at least, have had the stimulus of out-door life and air, while perhaps the family needs have kept the girls at work through the long afternoon hours.

What then? The boy spends his evenings over the newspaper, or lounges on a sofa, or goes "out," while the women clear away the tea-things, and get out the mending basket when all else is done.

The great difficulty, the absolute incompetence of "strikes" and Eight-hour Laws to grapple with the Labor Question comes home to every fireside. It was well and graphically put by the London Punch, in a fine cartoon last year. Time—Nine o'clock at night. The conventional British workman sits over his steaming supper, the mug of beer to his hand and his pipe laid ready for lighting, while in the dark background his wife, on her knees, is mopping up the floor. This hard-working female, evidently driven to the limit of endurance, thus expresses herself:

"Got your nine hours? Much good may it do you! I've been at work for fifteen, and hain't done yet!"

"Strikes" are of small use in her case; there is no tariff of wages for her toiling hours; nor would she have it so. As in the exact realms of science, the treasured epics of an older world are turned over rudely and thrust aside; so into the province of the emotions the exact sciences cannot come. There is no alchemy for a mother's love, no coinage of sisterly devotion, nor, within our finite comprehension, any possible scale of prices current for the bonds that hold a home.

Must we then go on forever with the women of the household bearing heavy burdens, while the masculine shoulders strip off all care with the overcoat, and come in, at night, as audience to the last act of the play?

We must begin at the beginning. One of the most scholarly men I ever knew, a close student of law and of life, had a keen comprehension of the way home matters go.

"Why should that poor, tired-out housemaid, who has been at the wash-tub all day, go out into the rain tonight for oysters for me? Give me the basket; I will bring home my supper, the steak, or whatever else is needed; yes, and cook it myself on the chafin-dish, so that all you weary women may go to bed."

Did the fine critical faculty, which distinguished this scholar among his fellows, suffer any while the steak was cooking, crisp and rare? Rather it was the critical faculty, brought to bear on the little things of life, that rendered him thus a master of the situation.

"No man," so ran his creed, "unless he be a day-laborer, stiffened and saddened by coarse work, has a right to sit calmly lounging, or listlessly looking through smoke-wreaths, while a tired woman brings in wood for the fire or heaps up heavy coals on the grate. I am a bachelor, and know of nursery-life only the muffled sounds; but when I spend an evening with a married friend, and hear him quietly discuss the prospects of the nation, while overhead a weary wife is audibly wrestling with cross and crying babies, I wonder at the manly indifference he manifests.

"Is it, I ask, with stammering anxiety, 'that the children are ill?'

"Oh, no; it's the same every night! Mary can hardly ever come down to me before nine o'clock!"

"Come down to me!" the bachelor inwardly ejaculates. "Had I a wife!"

We must indeed begin at the beginning. Had that indifferent paterfamilias been trained as a boy to notice what was around him, to bear a hand in the little things of home, very possibly he, too, might have tried his luck at soothing the crying babies. Very possibly he might not have enjoyed his newspaper, or the last review, quite so keenly in the parlor stillness, while the hushing and coaxing and rocking went on overhead.

Why should we teach our boy that he is to be a mere whistling, romping, tearing and wearing member of the household, while his own sisters or women-servants work around him from weary chime to chime?

It is not necessary to define the limits, "thus far shalt thou go and no further." Every thoughtful mother can adapt her instructions to the need, or to the strength and deftness of her boy.

Why should he not make his own bed at times? Harry, Miss Edgeworth's Harry, in "Harry and Lucy," used to do it, and what was more, to the best of my recollection, his father showed him how! A very picture of a manly boy he was, growing up evidently to be a Gay Lussac or a Prince Rupert of our day.

Why should the boy leave his room a howling wilderness of boots and bats and inky pocket-handkerchiefs? If he be made occasionally to set it to rights himself, to get a dust-pan and sweep up the sticks and stuff, he will at least have an intelligent comprehension, another time, of the cost of the confusion.

Teach him all the graceful little convenances, how to deport himself before his elders, and the courtesy he owes to ladies, old and young; but teach him, also, why he is better fitted to carry home the heavy basket than Sophy, the servant-maid, and when he should lend a helping hand to women, young or old.

We hear a great deal of imperfect sympathies, now-a-days, as a sort of bitter drop in the cup of wedded life. These imperfect sympathies are charged generally, we believe, to the account of the masculine race. Tomes of poetry and hecatombs of bleeding hearts are laid to the charge of this new disorder.

Why else does Laura whine through sixteen stanzas, or Clothilde rack herself through as many prose pages, but that she has given her heart where no response is, her life to ce monstre!

The disillusion of married life! Shall we lay all the blame on our grown-up boys? When the cara sposa discovers that the cakes and caramels of courtship are succeeded by tough butchers' bills and sloppy servant-maids; when after the day's fret and worry is over, her dear Charles lends her but an indifferent ear, and is surprised that she is so very used up and complaining, we must go back, not only to Clothilde's childhood, but to that of Charles, as well.

She may, or may not, have the cook-book by heart; but very sure, he is ignorant as a wild Indian of the cost of the home. He may foot it up, in dollars and cents, it is true; but of the forces, the physical labor, the executive energy, the moral balance required to keep all things even, he has not the remotest idea.

Teach him, then, O mother of romping Charlie, before that possible daughter-in-law comes upon the scene, that fine sense of fitness and order, that intelligent observance of the household machinery, that will make him charitable and helpful in season, and sympathetic always.

THE MASSACRE OF THE INNOCENTS.

EVERY year thousands of infants perish victims to the use of soothing syrups. Every generation tens of thousands of children grow up only to enter the career of the drunkard, or suffer the prolonged death-in-life of the opium-eater, who can trace their vices and miseries to the same cause.

It is a frequent practice among mothers to give anodynes of some sort to their infants when fretful or ailing. Some mothers make a daily and habitual practice of the use of some favorite or widely-advertised nostrum. Now it is Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup; again it is Godfrey's Cordial; or it may be Dewee's Carminative; or possibly Paragoric, plain and undisguised. Those mothers who use the latter are probably in the minority; but there are numbers of women who would shrink with horror from giving their infants opium in any form, who yet administer the other medicines without scruple, believing them perfectly harmless.

We have before us an article written by a California physician who gives two instances of death, which came recently within his practice, from the use of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup. He adds that it is impossible to estimate the number of children who are sent to the grave by the use of this nostrum alone. He says: "There are very few children at the age of six months who would not be poisoned to death were they to take the syrup as directed (namely: six months old and upward, one teaspoonful three or four times a day until free from pain), unless a tolerance of the drug be induced by its previous administration in small doses. The morphia in a teaspoonful of soothing syrup is equal to about twenty drops of laudanum. Here we have thousands of mothers and nurses, ignorant alike of the ingredients and the effects of this deadly nostrum, directed to give a child six months old morphia equal to twenty drops of laudanum, while a physician would not dare to give a child of that age more than three drops."

Dewee's Carminative has long been considered among the best of quieting medicines for infants, and we have heard it recommended by those who use it, "because," they said, "it has no opium in it." There was never a greater mistake. We have not the recipe for the Carminative before us, so we cannot give its ingredients with their exact proportions; but we have seen the recipe, and we know that it does contain opium in some form. The mother who gives this or any other of the advertised cordials or carminatives to her babe, may stand prepared for its early death, or else expect to see it grow up with a ruined nervous system.

It is said that the use of opium is fearfully on the increase in this country. Who can tell how much this state of things is due to the use of morphia in its disguised form during infancy! The early use of this drug will naturally lead, as the child increases in years, to the use of tobacco, opium or alcohol, to satisfy a morbid and depraved appetite. There is another point in the case which every one should consider. Those only who have been addicted to the use of opium, and attempt to leave off, and those who have been actual witnesses of such attempt in others, know the dreadful suffering—the utter nervous prostration, and untold agony of mind and body—which attends the breaking of this habit. What refinement of cruelty it is that inflicts this suffering upon a child! Yet, as the use of these anodynes is abandoned when the child emerges from infancy, there is no shadow of doubt that it is made to undergo all the tortures experienced by the opium-eater who is striving to free himself from the iron bonds of habit. Only in the latter case the habit is generally relinquished gradually, and the misery, though somewhat prolonged, is rendered less intense; while in the former there is no system adopted in giving up these medicines. All is hap-hazard. The dose is neither decreased nor given at longer intervals. It may be abandoned suddenly, and then after the worst has passed and the system begun to recover from the effects of the drug, another dose, given for some trifling ailment, will place the child back at the starting-point with all the misery to endure over again. Again we say, what refinement of cruelty!

An infant well cared-for, properly fed, frequently bathed, comfortably dressed, used to regularity in sleeping and eating, and allowed plenty of fresh air, will need no soothing syrup when it is well. If it becomes sick, drugs should be administered on the prescription of a doctor alone.

Mothers have a fearful responsibility in this matter. Not only have they the present comfort of their little ones in their keeping, but they have their future well-being to consider; nay, even life and death are in their hands. As mothers would not sorrow over little graves; as they would wish to rear children to a noble manhood and womanhood, free from perverted appetites which lead to vice, let them beware of these Infant Exterminators. They are evil and evil only.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

THE WALKING LEAF.

"WHAT'S that?" asked Katy, looking up from the doll-baby she was dressing. "A walking leaf, did you say?"

"Yes, I said a walking leaf," replied Uncle Herbert, speaking like one who meant what he said.

"I've seen a leafy," laughed Katy, "but I don't believe anybody ever saw a leaf walk."

"Here it is—you can see for yourself," answered Uncle Herbert, holding out the book he was reading.

"Oh, that's nothing but a great bug or beetle!" exclaimed Katy.

"It's the 'Walking Leaf' for all that, little puss! Don't you see the name under it?"

"Does it make a bug a leaf to call it so, uncle?"

"Maybe not."

"Of course it doesn't; Uncle Herbert; and I'd like to know what the man who made this book meant by it?"

"Oh, that is easily enough explained. The animal so nearly resembles a leaf that it is often mistaken for one, and naturalists—that is, those who are curious about the various objects in nature, examine them closely and write about them—have given it the name you find in the book."

"Well, I don't see that it looks like a leaf," said Katy.

"You would think differently if you saw one of these insects with its wings closed over its body and the animal at rest on the ground. Then you would be almost sure it was a leaf."

"Anyhow, I don't see any use in making a big bug or fly look like a leaf," said Katy.

"Don't you, indeed? Well, I guess there is good reason for it. Would you like to know?"

"Oh, yes."

"Well, every animal has its enemy that seeks to destroy it. Or, in other words, every animal that lives is the natural food of some other animal. Now, to each is given a weapon of defence, or some means of disguise or protection, in order that the weaker ones may not be utterly destroyed by the stronger. The bee stings, while the hare trusts to its swift feet for safety. Some animals feign death to mislead their enemies, while others throw out a strong odor to drive them away in disgust. There is a butterfly, which on alighting so nearly resembles a leaf that the birds pass it by, without dreaming of the dainty morsel they have missed."

"Oh, but that is nice!" cried Katy, clapping her hands.

"And it is the same with this 'walking leaf.'"

"And that is nice, too?" added Katy. "Oh, now I see! Now I understand. Isn't it wonderful?"

"The world is full of wonders," replied Uncle Herbert. "We have only to open our eyes to find them all around us."

WINTER IN THE COUNTRY.

"THIS farm-yard scene is pleasant to look upon, even though it is midwinter, with the snow lying deep on everything and the air frosty and keen, because the cattle are well cared for, and the woman who is milking and the man who is feeding them are warmly clad."

So said Uncle Herbert, as he held a winter picture in his hand and talked to the group of children who had gathered round him.

"Don't people in the country sometimes get snowed up in their houses?" asked little Nelly.

"Yes, away in the North."

"So that they can't get out?"

"Not until they have dug paths through the snow."

"What splendid fun that must be!" exclaimed one of the boys.

"There is a beautiful poem by Whittier, called 'Snow-bound,'" said Uncle

Herbert, "in which he tells us how, when a boy, he was snowed up in his father's house, and how they all dug paths through the drift."

"Oh, read it for us! Do, Uncle Herbert!" cried half a dozen eager voices.

"It had snowed hard for two days and nights," said Uncle Herbert. "How it looked on the second morning the poet tells us." And he read—

"And when the second morning shone,
We looked upon a world unknown,
On nothing we could call our own.
Around the glistening wonder bent
The blue walls of the firmament,
No cloud above, no earth below—
A universe of sky and snow!
The old familiar sight of ours
Took marvellous shapes; strange domes and towers

Rose up where sty or corn-crib stood,
Or garden wall, or belt of wood;
A smooth white mound the brush-pile showed,
A fenceless drift that once was road;
The bridge-post an old man sat,
With loose-flung coat and high cocked hat;
The well-curb had a Chinese roof;
And even the long sweep, high aloof,
In its slant splendor, seemed to tell
Of Pisa's leaning miracle.

"A prompt, decisive man, no breath
Our father wasted: 'Boys, a path!'
Well pleased (for when did farmer-boy Count such a summons less than joy?)
Our buskins on our feet we drew;
With mittened hands and caps drawn low,
To guard our necks and ears from snow,
We cut the solid whiteness through.
And where the drift was deepest, made

A tunnel walled and overlaid
With dazzling crystal: we had read
Of rare Aladdin's wondrous cave,
And to our own his name we gave,
With many a wish that luck was ours
To test his lamp's supernal powers.
We reached the barn with merry din,
And roused the prisoned brutes within.
The old horse thrust his long head out,
And grave with wonder gazed about;
The cock his lusty greeting said,
And forth his speck'd harem led;
The oxen lashed their tails, and hooked,

And mild reproach of hunger looked;
The horned patriarch of the sheep—
Like Egypt's Amun roused from sleep—
Shook his sage head with gesture mute,
And emphasized with stamp of foot."

"So heavy was this fall of snow," said Uncle Herbert, as he ceased reading, "that all the roads for many miles around were blocked up, and no neighbor reached the snow-bound family for several days. Let me read you what the poet says of the third night and morning:

"And while with care our mother laid
The work aside, her steps she stayed
One moment, seeking to express
Her grateful sense of happiness
For food and shelter, warmth and health,
And love's contentment more than wealth,

With simple wishes (not the weak,
Vain prayers which no fulfilment seek,
But such as warm the generous heart
O'er-prompt to do with Heaven its part)
That none might lack, that bitter night,
For bread and clothing, warmth and light.

"Within our beds awhile we heard
The wind that round the gables roared,
With now and then a ruder shock,
Which made our very bedstead rock.
We heard the loosened clap-boards tost,
The board-nails snapping in the frost:
And on us, through the unplastered wall,
Felt the light sifted snow-flakes fall.

"Next morn we wakened with the shout
Of merry voices high and clear,
And saw the teamsters drawing near
To break the drifted highways out.
Down the long hill-side treading slow
We saw the half-buried oxen go, Shaking the snow from heads upmost,
Their straining nostrils
white with frost.
Before our door the struggling train
Drew up, an added team to gain."

"Is that all of it?" asked little Nelly, who had listened with wide-open eyes.

"No," answered Uncle
Herbert.

"Won't you read more?"

"If you would like to have me do so, I will read the whole poem. It won't take long, and I think you will enjoy it very much."

"Oh, please do!" they all cried.

And Uncle Herbert read for the children the whole of Whittier's "Snow-bound," one of the sweetest poems in the language.

It was an evening long remembered by the children, who entered into the spirit of the poem, and enjoyed it even more than Uncle Herbert thought they would.

The same pleasure is in store for hundreds of family groups this winter. Get a copy of "Snow-bound," if it is not already in your library, and have it read aloud for young and old on some stormy night, when the snow beats against your windows. You will find a new enjoyment.

OUR LILA.

BY S. JENNIE JONES.

She came on a Christmas morning—

The darling! years ago;

With eyes as blue as the violets

That were sleeping under the snow;

With a face as pure as the lilies,

That had crowned the noon of the year,

Yet wearing withal a look so sage,

That our joy was shadowed with fear.

The meek little mouth was a tremble,
As if with unspoken prayer,
So we thanked the Giver of all things good,
For a Christmas gift so fair.

And the year its golden rosary
Again and again has told,
Till on this beautiful Christmas morn
Our darling is seven years old.
As the Christmas bells are ringing,
And thousands of hearts aglow,
Are waking the song that first was sung
By the angels long ago,
Our Father we thank for His first great gift,
Then meekly and humbly pray
That she may be blest of that blessed One
Who was born on Christmas day.

EVENING HYMN.

RECEIVE my body, pretty bed;
Soft pillow, oh, receive my head;

And thanks, my parents
kind,
For comforts you for me provide;
Your precepts still shall be my guide,
Your love I'll keep in mind.

My hours misspent this day
I rue,
My good things done how very few!
Forgive my faults, O Lord:
This night, if in thy grace
I rest,
To-morrow may I rise refreshed,
To keep thy holy word.

THE VALUABLE VEGETABLE.

TWO maid-servants, Bridget and Valburg, were going to the town, and they each carried on their head a very heavy basket full of fruit.

Bridget grumbled and groaned all the way, but Val-burg laughed and sang.

"What are you laughing for?" said Bridget, "your basket is as heavy as mine, and you are no stronger than I am."

Valburg said, "I have a very valuable vegetable in my load, so I scarcely feel the weight."

"Oh!" cries Bridget, "what a precious vegetable that must be! How I should like to lighten my burden with it, too. Pray, tell me what it is called."

Valburg answered, "The precious vegetable which makes all hardships light is—Patience. Remember, Bridget, that 'Patience makes all burdens light.'"

If days are dark, and not a spark
Of sunshine comes to cheer you,
Then use your might to make a light
Of golden actions near you.

If you have troublesome work to do,
Putting it off won't help you through;
'Tis easier done the sooner you do it;
A task grows longer the longer you view it.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

RUTH.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

SHE stood breast high amid the corn,
Clasped by the golden light of morn,
Like the sweetheart of the sun,
Who many a glowing kiss had won.

On her cheek an autumn's flush
Deeply ripened—such a blush
In the midst of frown was born,
Like red poppies grown with corn.

Round her eyes her tresses fell—
Which were blackest none could tell;
But long lashes veiled a light
That had else been all too bright.

And her hat, with shady brim,
Made her tressy forehead dim;
Thus she stood amid the shocks,
Praising God with sweetest looks.

Sure, I said, Heaven did not mean
Where I reap thou shouldst but glean;
Lay thy sheaf adown and come,
Share my harvest and my home.

MY LOVE.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

NOT as all other women are
Is she that to my soul is dear
Her glorious fancies come from far;
Beneath the silver evening star;
And yet her heart is ever near.

Great feelings hath she of her own,
Which lesser souls may never know;
God giveth them to her alone,
And sweet they are as any tone
Wherewith the wind may choose to blow.

Yet in herself she dwelleth not,
Although no home were half so fair;
No simplest duty is forgot;
Life hath no dim and lowly spot
That does not in her sunshine share.

She doeth little kindnesses,
Which most leave undone, or despise;
For naught that sets one's heart at ease,
And giveth happiness or peace,
Is low-esteemed in her eyes.

She hath no scorn of common things;
And, though she seems of other birth,
Round us her heart entwines and clings,
And patiently she folds her wings
To tread the humble paths of earth.

Blessing she is; God made her so;
And deeds of week-day holiness
Fall from her noiseless as the snow;
Nor hath she ever chanced to know
That naught was easier than to bless.

She is most fair, and thereunto
Her life doth rightly harmonise;
Feeling or thought that was not true
Ne'er made less beautiful the blue
Unclouded heaven of her eyes.

She is a woman—one in whom
The spring-time of her childish years
Hath never lost its fresh perfume,
Though knowing well that life hath room
For many blights and many tears.

I love her with a love as still
As a broad river's peaceful might,
Which, by high tower and lowly mill,
Goes wandering at its own will,
And yet doth ever flow aright.

And, on its full, deep breast serene,
Like quiet isles my duties lie;
It flows around them and between,
And makes them fresh, and fair and green,
Sweet homes wherein to live and die.

SERENADE.

BY EDWARD COATES PINKNEY.

LOOK out upon the stars, my love,
And shame them with thine eyes,
On which, than on the lights above,
There hang more destinies.
Night's beauty is the harmony
Of blending shades and light;
Then, lady, up—look out, and be
A sister to the night!

Sleep not!—thine image wakes for aye
Within my watching breast;
Sleep not!—from her soft sleep should fly,
Who robs all hearts of rest.
Nay, lady, from thy slumbers break,
And make this darkness gay,
With looks whose brightness well might make
Of darker nights a day.

LITTLE FEET.

BY MRS. L. M. BLINN.

BLESSINGS upon them, the dear little feet,
That patter and patter the whole day long,
Through alley and lane and busy street,
Never waiting to ask, "Is it right or wrong?"

Straying, it may be, far out of the way!
Wandering from home a bird from the nest;
Till a loving voice calls, at the close of the day,
"My children, 'tis evening; come home to your rest!"

God's pity be over the poor little feet,
And guard them from walking the paths of sin,
Till they near the gates of the golden street,
And the Father's voice calls His children in!

HE KNOWETH ALL.

THE twilight falls, the night is near,
I fold my work away,
And kneel to one who bends to hear
The story of the day.

The old, old story; yet I kneel
To tell it at Thy call;
And cares grow lighter as I feel
That Jesus knows them all.

Yes, all! The morning and the night,
The joy, the grief, the loss,
The roughened path, the sunbeam bright,
The hourly thorn and cross.

Thou knowest all—I lean my head,
My weary eyelids close;
Content and glad awhile to tread
The path, since Jesus knows!

And He has loved me! All my heart
With answering love His stirred,
And every anguished pain and smart
Finds healing in the Word.

So here I lay me down to rest,
As nightly shadows fall,
And lean, confiding, on His breast,
Who knows and pities all!

BIRDS IN THE RAIN.

BY FLORENCE PERCY.

OVER the roofs of the drowsy town
And streets unfilled by their wonted throng,
Steadily, softly the rain comes down,
Singing its sweet, monotonous song,
Drip, drip, dripping the whole day long.

Never another sound is heard
To break or lighten the slumberous spell—
No low of cattle nor voice of bird
Comes faint and far over slope and dell,
Nor whistle of workman, nor clang of bell.

"How do the birds like rainy days?"

Queries a childish voice at my knee—

"I wonder if every one of them stays
Close in his nest in some tall thick tree,
And talks with his feathery family?"

"When the clouds grow black and a rain-storm comes,
Not one of them flutters in sight or sings;

They never come for my scattered crumbs—
Are they afraid to wet their wings?
Do they have nothing to eat, poor things?"

"How dreadful to be so nicely dressed

They dare not even go out to dine!
Their week-day suit is their very best,
And cannot even be washed, like mine,
So, of course, they must keep it fine.

"What do the birdies say, do you think?"

Do they talk of their little ones flown away?
Or of wild flowers, purple and white and pink?
Or do they fret at the drops, and say
'There never was such a dismal day?'

VOL. XL.—10.

"Perhaps they practise some sweet new song,
To sing when the sun shall shine again—
They have trilled the same old tunes so long—
And warble together with might and main
To drown the sound of the lonesome rain.

"I wish I had been a Sunday child;
Then I should know what the birdies say,
If they were ever so shy and wild—
And to learn their language and where they stay,
I would sit alone in the woods all day.

"I know when the sun shines warm and bright,
They build their houses with care and pains—
They sing and twitter from morn till night,
They pick up insects, and seeds, and grains—
But what do they do when it rains and rains?"

Who knows? And still on the woodlands brown,
And the streaming roofs and the quiet street,
Steadily, softly the rain comes down,
Weaving a song in its musical beat,
Forever sad, and forever sweet.

TO-MORROW.

BY MRS. MARY B. DODGE.

TO-MORROW, a beautiful day,
Is waiting for you and for me:
Bluest skies of a soft shining ray
Are impatient the shadows to flee.
Why care if the landscape be sullen and gray?
To-morrow will chase all the cloud-racks away.

To-morrow, you say, may be dull,
With the leadened-hued face of to-day,
Wait; its morrow with measure is full
Of a joy never spilled by delay.
If to-day born of yesterday baffle our will,
To-morrow, to-morrow is radiant still.

To-morrow is mantled in white
As pure as the soft-falling snow,
That rounds into waves of delight,
To cover earth's pitiful woe.
The gale may be sighing, the frost king astray,
Yet to-morrow will sparkle in crystalline spray.

To-morrow with roses is crowned,
A tender-eyed sylph of the May:
Flinging garlands of blossoms around
In a child-like, improvident way.
To-day may be barren, a chill in the air;
To-morrow young spring-life will bud everywhere.

To-morrow the birds without fear,
Flitting back to the woodlands again,
Will sing for the Summer that's here,
A full-throated, ravishing strain.
The world, now so silent of bird or of bee,
To-morrow shall echo with fluent gleec.

To-morrow is regal for all,
With a sceptre of love in her hand;
The weary but wait for her call,
To spring to the full-fruited land.
O'er the span of to-day we may tearfully grope,
But the arch of to-morrow is glowing with hope.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

WHAT CLIMATE IS BEST FOR THOSE SUFFERING FROM BRONCHITIS AND TUBERCULOSIS?

FROM U. S. MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL,

BY DR. A. E. SMALL.

BRONCHITIS, when chronic, is invariably aggravated by a cold or chilly climate. On this account it has been styled a winter cough. One subject to this affection may during the summer months enjoy tolerable good health, but as soon as late autumn or winter sets in, the surface of the air-tubes becomes easily irritated and inflamed, and from this susceptibility a distressing cough comes on, and continues, unless mitigated by remedies, until another warm season returns, provided the patient is able to survive the siege. We have known a bronchial cough to come on annually, increasing each successive year in severity, for fifteen or twenty years, before the vitality of the patient became exhausted. Winter after winter would a bronchial inflammation set in, attended with expectoration of much mucus, and not infrequently of mucus streaked with blood. Cases of this description are properly termed lingering consumption, and in frigid climates are sure to terminate fatally. We have known many cases of this disease stayed in its progress by resorting to a change of climate. The fact that such patients are always better in summer, naturally suggests that if warm weather could be protracted sufficiently, such patients would be restored to sound health; and to prove the reasonableness of this conclusion, a case of recovery is here cited:

A gentleman, aged fifty-two, contracted in the unpropitious spring of 1856 a severe cold, which fastened itself upon the mucus lining of the bronchial tubes, and occasioned a severe cough and a hæmorrhage. As the weather became warmer the cough subsided, and he apparently regained sound health. But there was evidently a powerful predisponent left, for on the approach of cold weather his cough returned and became very alarming, and he was recommended a change to a warmer climate. He went to New Orleans, and immediately derived benefit. He returned to Chicago in April, feeling quite well, and remained so for two years, when, upon a change of clothing, he contracted a severe cold, and a return of his disease with all of its alarming symptoms. A severe hæmorrhage, which prostrated him completely, together with rapid emaciation, and quick and irritable pulse, seemed indicative of immediate dissolution. A fatal termination of his disease seemed so imminent that the life insurance company in which he had a policy, upon a recommendation from its medical examiner, offered to purchase his policy at a discount, which he accepted. With this money he went to San Antonio, Texas, hoping to prolong his life for awhile. But finding the climate favorable, his health began to amend, and he finally recovered it wholly.

The reason why so many partially recover from chronic bronchitis during the summer, and relapse again on the approach of cold weather, is because the warm season is too brief in its duration at the North for the cure to be completed, and therefore a residence where there is no winter, or at most a very brief one, affords sufficient time for a full and complete recovery. We have seen many cases where recovery has taken place in consequence of the warm and invigorating influences of a genial tropical climate. But we have observed another class of bronchial difficulties, coupled with incipient tuberculosis, that derived but little benefit from a Southern climate. But still we have observed that a different change of climate has operated advantageously to them. In feeble constitutions, smitten with bronchial inflammation and an evident incination to tubercles, we have known much benefit to result from a residence in the climate of Colorado.

So little attention has been paid to a proper discrimination of the cases that become benefitted, and those that derive no benefit, we will here venture the remark, that what will benefit some is absolutely injurious to others. For instance, cases of long-standing bronchitis are not benefitted to any great extent by the climate of Colorado. A tropical climate suits this class of patients much better, but feeble persons, addicted to bronchial cough and incipient tubercles, from our observation, are liable to an increase of difficulties in a tropical climate, because this favors a ripening and softening of the tubercles, although the bronchial irritation may be less. But they are likely to receive much benefit from the climate of Colorado, because the atmosphere is more bracing and supplies more nutriment to the blood, that stays the progress of tuberculous deposits. The same remark may be made concerning the climate of Minnesota, which all classes of consumptives are prone to seek. In this climate many have derived benefit, while by far the greater proportion have utterly failed, and this is owing to the fact that of those denominated consumptives a very large proportion suffer merely from bronchial inflammation, which is made worse by a clear, cold and bracing atmosphere, while those who are inclined to tubercles, and are feeble and exhausted, find a denser atmosphere beneficial, and oftentimes a source of strength. But in confirmed tuberculosis, we have yet to observe any cases that have been benefitted by a residence in Minnesota. While at the same time we have observed the most serious injury to result to those afflicted with uncomplicated, chronic bronchitis, and while we have observed the benefits of protracted seasons of warm weather for the latter, we have observed the fatal effects of the same upon those in the advanced stage of phthisis pulmonalis. There is this difference to be borne in mind between bronchitis and tuberculous consumption. The former may occur in robust constitutions, from a series of exposures and frequent colds; the first produce catarrh, and then cough and bronchial abrasions and hæmorrhages. The latter is, for the most part, constitutional and hereditary. The former require protracted seasons of warm weather, such as can be had in tropical regions, in order to afford time for the abrasions to heal, when the cough does not interfere. The latter require invigorating and bracing atmospheres, that keep up the strength by supplying pure oxygen for the blood, and thus prevent the ripening and softening of incipient tubercles. Many valuable hints may be received from the effects of climate in various localities from condition of health known to exist among the inhabitants. Cases of fatal consumption are found in all climates, because this disease is allied to hereditary constitutions, and the victims are born with the predisposing cause within them, upon which any depressing influence may operate as an exciting agent, and cause its fatal development. This fact accounts fully for the universal prevalence of tubercular consumption in all climates. It is, for the most part, an hereditary disease. But bronchitis, before it has reached a fatal point, results from causes not inherent in the system, is seldom hereditary. Therefore, in warmer, or even in temperate climates, this disease is seldom fatal, and almost always curable. Therefore the selection of favorable localities for such as may be suffering in any degree from this affection is a question worth considering."

THE HOME CIRCLE.

A LETTER TO MISS PIPSISSWAY POTTS.

WE give below the excellent letter to "Pipsey," referred to in the January number. It will well repay the reader for the time spent in its perusal:

"I feel like writing a few lines to you this evening, but just as I take up my pen, dear Pipsey, I remember that, as our acquaintance is all on one side, it would be better to be a little formal at first, and say Miss Potts.

"Well, then, Miss Potts, I hope you won't be offended when I tell you that I have not read all your letters as soon as received—for the reason simply that I have not had time. Now, it is a standing joke of my husband's, that I 'never have time to do anything.' But, please don't tell it, for I know it's no credit to me.

"But, one evening, away back in the spring or winter, I read one of your letters, and it was the one in which you described your visit from Deacon Skiles. I had a good laugh over it—and a good laugh is worth something, especially to an elderly woman, whose life is full of work and care. A little amusement unbends the mind and freshens one up wonderfully. So I thanked you for it.

"I thought then I would surely read all your letters, but the children got sick, first one, then another, then two at a time, and between work, care and anxiety, all the bright summer passed, and I have spent only a few hours in reading.

"And now I must tell you how I first came to read your letters. You see, I lead a kind of tread-mill life. True, it has some variety. There is washing-day and ironing-day and baking-day. Also, by way of variety, we frequently have sickness, in the form of fever, neuralgia, ague, etc. I don't mean to complain, nor to get discouraged, but I do get tired, and often, when the still evening hour comes, which is almost my only time to read, I am so weary, my head swims, my pulses beat unevenly, my energies droop, and, in fact, there seems nothing for it but to drop to sleep. And so it was on the evening when the day had been sultry, when your letter came. When tea was ready I was tired out, and felt that a little fresh air would be the best supper for me; so, looking at Mary, and glancing round the kitchen in a way I knew she would understand, I just left it all to her and went out for a walk.

"I had resolved to make a call—but, as people who go out often cannot understand how I enjoyed it, it is scarcely worth while to tell. You see, we live out in the prairie land, and once out-doors, we can see so far. The eye has a clear sweep on one side over vast fields of grain, bordered by deep, green hedges, to where the clouds seem to bend down lovingly and rest upon the green earth. On the other side we are close against a grove of walnut, oak and hickory trees; and along the edge of this grove I took my way. I have always loved nature, and when I enter her haunts I feel that there is a spirit there with which I can commune. If I were a heathen I might think this the Spirit of Beauty, or Nature herself; but, being a Christian, I understand that it is the Divine Spirit that is manifested so delightfully there. I love the great Creating Hand which has made the earth so beautiful, and spread around us so many objects to delight the eye and comfort the heart. There seemed to be a glitter of gold among the trees, for the sun was setting gloriously among crimson and amber clouds, which threw their reflection eastward, where the sky was bright with blue and salmon color. The beauty and glory of earth and sky acted like a charm upon my depressed spirits and weary frame, and I walked along with a step almost as elastic as that of a child, till I reached the cottage under the trees, which was the dwelling of my friend.

"I would like to tell you about my call, and the pleasant, friendly chat I had with my dear neighbor, who, though aged and infirm, has still a heart full of kindly sympathies and tender affections, which render intercourse with her always a pleasure. But this would make my letter too long, so I will only say that after a pleasant evening, I walked home with Fred, my little boy, who came for me. The moon and stars were shining brightly, and if possible, making the sky more glorious than the sunset, and as we walked along Fred asked, 'Ma, what is the moon hung on?'

"I answered, it was sustained by the word and power of the Creator; for I knew Fred was too young to understand any other answer, and I thought all the laws of Nature amount to nothing more than that, any way. I was pleased to see how this seemed to satisfy him, but he asked again—

"What do the clouds rest on? The air?'

"Yes,' I said, 'they rest on the air, or fly before its swift currents.'

"Well, ma,' he continued, looking upward, 'what do the angels walk on in the sky? Even a little babe can't walk on air; and angels are large—large as you, aren't they? I should think they would fall through.'

"Fred," said I, 'you must remember angels are spirits. A spirit can move like a thought. Our thoughts do not need ladders on which to climb into Heaven. Even now they are there, and in a moment returned again to earth.'

"Just then a meteor seemed to fall from the zenith, quivered a moment before us, and vanished in mid-air.

"When we entered the house we found all had retired, and though Fred was full of questions, he sank to sleep almost as soon as his face touched the pillow. Then I was alone, and it was bed-time; but the walk, the little visit, and the talk with Fred, had made me feel so wakeful that I had no desire to sleep, so I took up the HOME MAGAZINE, and read your September letter. Then an answer came flitting through my brain. It was a cheerful, jesting letter. But, instead of writing it down at once, I thought I would improve my acquaintance first, so I took down all the magazines and read all your letters. Then I found my ideas scattered, like a barrel of apples suddenly upset on a wide floor, rolling everywhere without any particular aim. You had touched so many different subjects, and suggested so many different themes, that I felt a little confused. All at once a heavy weight seemed to fall upon my spirits. My arms went upon the table and my head down upon my arms—I felt my eyes were full of unshed tears, which I forced back and swallowed, only to feel a heavier weight at my heart.

"Dear Pipsey! don't think it was you that made me feel so sadly. It was a sorrowful memory awakened by your words on the subject of self-control. Oh, high and Heavenly art of perfect self-control! How few attain it. How many do not even aim at it, nor consider its importance. For the want of it, how many true hearts bear wounds which time cannot heal. How many a downy pillow is pierced by the pangs of self-reproach, and rendered sleepless by the cries of an outraged conscience. But how near akin to the angels do those few appear who tread with firm step the narrow path of duty, heedless of the slights of the scornful, the insults of the heartless, and the temptations laid by the reckless. I believe there is but one way in which we can remain calm and self-possessed amid all the trials of life, as well as its petty vexations, and that is by attaining that height of Christian experience and privilege where one lives by faith and not by sight. Where one realizes that our real life is in Eternity, that this is only probation-preparation. Where the soul claims the promise, 'All things shall work together for good to them that love the Lord,' and catching a gleam of 'the eternal weight of glory,' the things of this world dwindle by comparison.

"I am setting up late to-night. Ned, my eldest boy, has gone five miles from home, to listen to a political speech and witness a torchlight procession. I knew he would not get home before midnight, and as it is quite cool to-night, I filled up the grate at bed-time, put the coffee-pot on the stove, and set a cup with cream and sugar on the table close by, so that he could warm himself and have a refreshing drink, instead of going to bed chilled by the night-air, to have the ague to-morrow. As I turned to leave the kitchen, it looked so warm and comfortable, I thought this would be a nice, still time to finish this letter.

"One thing more, and I am done. Ned lacks a few months of being twenty-one. Yet there have been those unscrupulous enough to try to persuade him to vote in November. But I promise you no boy of mine will ever do such a thing. He will begin life as an American citizen with 'honor bright,' and may truth be his motto evermore.

"Wishing you success and happiness, I remain,

"Yours, respectfully,

"MRS. RUTH RAY."

IMPROVED CROQUET.

BY MARY ELLA HURTT.

THE other night sweet Jennie Lee explained to me "Croquet:

"You strike your ball just here, you see,

Your neighbor's to 'Roquet';

And you, if quite successful, then,

Can take what's called a tight Croquet."

"I think I see," I, musing, said,

"Is this the way 'tis done?

We'll call my lips the scarlet ball,

Your cheek the white—for fun.

The two collide!—just thus!—"Roquet!"

And now I'll take a tight Croquet!"

"You naughty man," she, blushing, said,

"You've spoiled the lesson quite;

Now listen while I finish it,

And learn the game aright.

A loose Croquet is thought the best

When 'red' collides with 'white.'

"For you can then go side by side

Across the field once more,

And every arch you pass, you can

Roquet it o'er and o'er;

And then, when'er it suits your plan,

Can take a tight Croquet once more."

"I see," I said, "and, Jennie, dear,

If thou wilt whisper 'yea,'

We'll make our life all summer-time,

And always play Croquet;

I'll keep you ever at my side,

And often cry 'Roquet!' 'Roquet!'"

PAY PROMPTLY.

IF fashionable ladies would only make it a rule to pay promptly for their dressmaking, what a blessing it would be to some poor needlewomen. Many of these fashion worshippers are keen to find out needy skillful seamstresses, who are glad to take work at the lowest prices, and who toil day and night, often at the shortest notice, to finish some over-trimmed suit. They bear meekly all the sharp words that heartless or thoughtless woman chooses to utter about their slowness, or the high prices they ask for making a dress; words which they would never dare to use in the establishment of a fashionable dressmaker. These small tyrannies are the marks of a mind correspondingly small, and the spirit stamps itself indelibly upon the face. Don't think you can practice them, ladies, and the world not know it.

The delay of a week in the payment of these little sums, so little to you, but so great to poor toiling women, may be almost a matter of life and death in the humble abode of the worker. If you cannot pay promptly for the making, you have no right to order it made, except with a distinct understanding. A woman who does so is worse than unjust; she is downright dishonest. Time, to the poor who work for daily bread, is very precious. If a week's pay must be delayed for a month, or perhaps two, the rent may fall short and a removal be required, occasioning the greatest distress, inconvenience and expense. Food cannot usually be bought on trust by persons in their walks of life, and absolute want may come upon them, just because your pay is held back. There are women in all classes of society who are negligent in this particular, and that, too, needlessly. When the money is in their hand, there are so many temptations at every turn to invest it in something to please the fancy. But we must come to regard the money fairly earned as not our own, even while it is in our hands. To use it is really to defraud another. BIRDSEY.

In whatever path you go,

In whatever place you stand,

Moving swift or moving slow,

With a firm and honest hand,

Make your mark.

We go to the grave of a man, saying, "A man is dead;" but angels throng about him, saying, "A man is born."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

At His Gates. A Novel. By Mrs. Oliphant, Author of "Chronicles of Carlingford," etc. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co.

This is the initial number of a "Library of Choice Fiction." It is an interesting story, as a story by Mrs. Oliphant could not fail to be, and it is properly illustrated. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The Anthem Choir. By W. A. Ogden, Author of the "Silver Song." Toledo, Ohio: W. W. Whitney.

This book contains anthems, choruses and closing pieces, adapted to dedications, ordinations, installations, religious festivals, funerals and other occasions. A number of the best anthem-writers in the country have contributed to the work, and it seems in every way adapted to the use of choirs and singing classes. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Modern Leaders. Being a Series of Biographical Sketches. By Justin McCarthy. New York: Sheldon & Co.

For the past two years Mr. McCarthy has been contributing to the pages of The Galaxy a series of very readable articles, having for their subjects various persons of political, literary or religious prominence. These sketches as they are called are full of information, and display clearness of insight into character and superior critical ability. The most prominent men and women of the times, from Queen Victoria to "George Eliot," and from Archbishop Manning to Brigham Young, are sketched in turn. These sketches are twenty-four in number. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Daniel Boone, the Pioneer of Kentucky. By John S. C. Abbott. New York: Dodd & Mead.

We are provided a series of books about the pioneers and patriots of America. And as the leader of these, is given Daniel Boone, the backwoodsman, "one of the most mild and unboastful of men," and one of "nature's gentle men." The first chapter of this book is devoted to the discovery and settlement of America; and all through the narrative of the life of Boone is interwoven American history. The book is a valuable one, and will form an important addition to a boy's or girl's library. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Margaret. By C. C. Fraser Tytler, Author of "Jasmine Leigh." New York: Dodd & Mead.

A somewhat sombre yet not unpleasant story of a modest, self-abetting, yet talented English girl. It is well written, and though not sensational in character, will please the reader who prefers quiet thought and excellent sentiments to pretentious style. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

Elsie's Girlhood. A Sequel to "Elsie Dinmore," and "Elsie's Holidays at Roselands." By Martha Finley, Author of "Elsie Dinmore," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead.

This is a story which every girl will be pleased with. It carries the heroine of two previous books on from childhood to womanhood, telling the reader of the years in which her character is developing, and her mind and body growing and strengthening for the real work and battle of life.

The Lillingstones of Lillingstone. By Emma Jane Weybourn. New York: Dodd & Mead.

An English story bearing no special characteristics, which will probably repay the reader. The book is handsomely illustrated. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

For Conscience' Sake. By the Author of "Alice Lee's Discipline," etc. New York: Dodd & Mead.

A religious story which will find its appropriate place in Sabbath school libraries. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lippincott & Co.

The Miracles of Faith. A Sketch of the Life of Beate Paulus. By Mary Weitbrecht. With an Introduction by Rev. Charles S. Robinson, D.D. New York: Dodd & Mead.

"This story," says Dr. Robinson, "brings before us one of those most attractive and beautiful characters we sometimes meet with in real life: a faithful Christian woman whose entire existence seemed to be lost in the will and the wisdom of God."

Vick's Illustrated Floral Guide for 1873. Rochester, N. Y.: James Vick.

We have received this beautiful book. Mr. Vick has this year surpassed himself in the beauty, richness and variety of illustration of this Catalogue and Rural Guide. The cover is printed in colors, and the frontispiece is a handsome colored picture of the new Japan Cock's-comb. This Guide is in future to be published quarterly, and twenty-five cents pays for the year. Those who after obtaining the Guide send money to the amount of one dollar or more for seeds, may also order twenty-five cents' worth extra—the price paid for the Guide.

The American Drawing Cards. First and Second Series. By Professor Walter Smith. Boston: Noyes, Holmes & Co.

The first series of these cards contains an elementary and advanced course in flat outline drawing. The second series illustrates the elementary principles of perspective by the representation of common objects in outline. These cards are designed to be used with any ordinary slate, or for drawing on paper or in blank drawing-books.

The Teachers' Companion to the American Drawing-Slates and Cards. By Walter Smith. Boston: Noyes, Holmes & Co.

The Teachers' Companion contains full instructions for drawing and illustrating each example on the blackboard, and is a valuable aid in the use of the drawing-cards.

Helps over Hard Places. For Boys. Second Series. By Lynde Palmer, Author of "Drifting and Steering," etc. Troy, N. Y.: H. B. Nims & Co.

The first series of "Helps over Hard Places" has had a large sale, and a well-deserved popularity. This new volume is especially good and, in fact, one of the best juvenile books of the season, and deserves as wide a sale as its predecessor.

Musings of a Middle-aged Woman. By Ailenroc. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

An exceedingly well-written series of papers on social themes, by a woman who has evidently seen a good deal of the world, and had a life-experience, that let her down to the heart of humanity. Such "Musings" are suggestive and helpful. The book is a good one. We have marked several extracts, but find room for only one or two brief paragraphs. This is good advice:

"Do not spend time and strength in talking of each other's duty. 'Be not busybodies in other men's matters,' but do your own duty in that state of life in which God hath pleased to call you. Do it bravely, independently, conscientiously; caring not for man's censure or approval, but taking the Word of inspiration only for your guidance. Quietly and firmly do right, trusting to God to take care of the consequences."

To a man who is disappointed in his wife because she is childish and not intellectual, she says:

"Brother with the 'child wife,' be thankful it is no worse. It might have been in these days of unfaithful wives. Be thankful that your wife is a child in innocence, in purity, in truth. Be thankful that she does throw her arms around your neck and yours only; and that she does nothing more culpable than draw pictures and play with 'Gip,' when she should have been attending to the dinner. You can be good, if you cannot be great. You have chosen your lot, and must abide by it. You can make one little woman happy—one home blessed, if you cannot reform the world."

Heavenly Blessedness. What it is and How Obtained: In a Series of Discourses on the Beatitudes. By Rev. Chauncy Giles, Author of "The Nature of Spirit and of Man as a Spiritual Being." London: James Speirs.

Mr. Giles writes from the New Church, or Swedenborgian stand-point in theology, though he does not, in this handsome volume, present in any technical form the peculiar doctrines of his Church. The seventeen discourses with which it is made up are devoted chiefly to the work of showing how that heavenly blessedness of which our Lord speaks, in what are known as the Beatitudes, may be obtained.

Mr. Giles writes with a grace and beauty of style that makes his books very attractive, and with a simplicity and directness that holds the reader's thought. No Christian man or woman, no matter by what name he is called, or to what creed he may subscribe, can read these discourses without gaining in spiritual insight and power over his lower nature. We make a single extract, taken almost at random, from this handsome volume:

"The Church has ever been, and ever will continue to be, the saving power in human society. Corrupt as it has often been; few in number compared with the great mass of humanity as it has been, and continues to be, it is yet the salt of human society. It preserves governments; it preserves literature, art, science. It is the soul, of which these are but the body. The Church, directly and indirectly, is the moving impulse to everything which is good and true in human life. It may not seem so, for the combined operations of all the sects dwindle into insignificance compared with the armies of fighters and workers which the State employs. The money used to carry on her operations, is nothing but the crumbs which fall from the table of civil life; but her influence is more potent for good than all these natural agencies, which make so much noise, and occupy so much attention. The Church is the heart of humanity. It may be a feeble heart; it may be a cold heart, but such as it is, it is the vital force in human life.

"Demolish our Church edifices, disband our Church organizations, abolish the office of our ministers, silence the voice of the religious press, and let all the affection, the thought, the labor, the money, which is now employed in spiritual uses, be turned to natural and worldly affairs—let our ministers become lawyers, and doctors, and financiers, and teachers of science—let the little army of men who are now enrolled under the banner of the Lord, and who must depend upon others for their support, turn their energies to trade, art, commerce, manufactures, and the preservation of human society would be impossible. There would be universal corruption.

"Abolish the churches, and all organized effort for spiritual instruction and use in this city, and what would be the value of property, in twenty, nay, in ten, or even five, years? The city would not be habitable. It would be among cities, and in the body politic, what the unburied dead of a battlefield are to an army. Every form of human society would turn to corruption. No trust would be sacred; no right would be respected; no virtue would be regarded; no human life would be safe. Vice would breed corruption; every foul lust would multiply and breed pestilence; violence would rage, and death would reign supreme. Why have Babylon and Nineveh, and the populous cities of a former civilization perished? Because there was not sufficient salt of spiritual life to save them. They perished, as Sodom and Gomorrah perished, because ten righteous men could not be found in their midst; and every city, and every form of civilization, will perish from the same cause.

"If every building for religious worship was razed to the ground, and every means of spiritual instruction and culture could be abolished, or suffer to fall for the means of support, the men who own property in the city, and the nameless multitude of rich men and women, would find it for their worldly interest to rebuild the churches, support ministers, and support church organizations with sufficient means to reach every man, woman, and child, with the light, and saving power of pure spiritual influence.

"They could not invest their money in any form in which it would yield them so large a percentage.

"It seems strange that men, that good men, who have some knowledge of spiritual truth, and some desire for the spiritual good of humanity, should not see this more clearly than they do. It is strange that we do not see that the highest, and the most interior, are the most precious interests of humanity. Those who work for them are touching the secret springs of human well-being. They are putting their hands on the helm of human progress; they are purifying the fountain, which feeds the currents of human life. They are providing and administering the salt, which is to save human society."

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

DEATH OF MR. GREELEY.

IT is a long time since the death of an American citizen has so moved the hearts of the people. In the bitterness of a great political defeat, in the failure of, perhaps, a life-long ambition, and borne down by the saddest of domestic afflictions, Horace Greeley died, and in that instant political rancor, died.

It would take many volumes to contain all that has been said in his praise since the "golden bowl was broken." Few have written so tenderly and eloquently as Mr. Beecher, from whose tribute in the Christian Union we make an extract:

"On rich men's mansions and on settlers' cabins lies the shadow of a personal bereavement; and countless eyes grow dim with tears over the loss of a friend whom they had never looked on.

"Yet the dead man, lying awfully unconscious of this late-coming kindness, was but a simple citizen, not rich, not well-born, not well-bred, holding neither civil nor military honors. He has not been a successful man, as the world counts success; for he died with the dearest aspirations of his heart ungratified, and, all his life, went famishing for certain simple joys that most men have, and Heaven denied to him. Nay, at the last, it was out of the blackness of a great defeat, and the bitterness of a wide condemnation, that he stepped into the light and love of God.

"But in the hour when Horace Greeley died, unjust and hard judgment of him died also. For months, men have talked of him with eager attachment and advocacy, or with vehement hatred and abuse. To-day, his friends are hardly gentler towards him than his foes; for death is a beneficent spirit, and, taking away a comrade, leaves an angel; sealing his lips that they shall nevermore explain anything, touches our lips with a sweet charity and wisdom to explain all things that had looked dark in him. So now it is given to men who had honestly blamed Horace Greeley as a living force, now that he has passed away, to put aside the arrow aimed at his faults, and to lay with kindly hands a wreath upon his virtues."

"Perhaps there is no citizen left to us whose greatness is distinctively American as was Horace Greeley's. In no other country could he have been as great. For the common school and the equality of men before the law gave him his chance. Born to grinding poverty, but inheriting the quick and capable brain of his fair mother, he was at school and toiling away at the hard Old Testament nomenclature when a baby of four years old. The lad of ten found his school-days ended; for work pressed, and wages were small. And from the endless labors of a farm, the boy of fifteen went out to begin life for himself. Five years of indifferent success in country printing-offices sent him to New York to seek his fortune. Rustic, awkward, raw-boned, homely, unused to society, friendless, poor, his capacity found work, his simplicity made friends, his loveliness won love. He derived fourteen hours a day for six dollars a week. He lived on Lenten fare. His horror of debt kept him independent. His religious feeling kept him pure. Good-luck and ill-luck followed him. He took them with equal mind. Ten long years of labor went to the first number of the New York Tribune, a penny daily. To independent thought, to social science, to popular education, to all causes that should benefit mankind, it was dedicated at its birth. The making of money was a secondary and trivial pursuit. Money came, however, and honor, and fame. The greatest American journalist had conquered his place.

"So robust a mind, so vital a nature, so fresh and youthful a presence had this tireless worker, that sixty seemed the very prime and flush of manhood, and years of labor appeared to beckon him. But many griefs broke the great heart, and the strong body crumbled in a day. From his life a great legacy remains; the vast influence of a generation which learned from him that honesty, honor, simplicity, frugality, generosity, purity, temperance, are above all worldly gains. From his death the gospel of tolerance takes deeper meaning, the cruelty of partisanship looks meaner, the charity that believeth all things, seems divine. For the rest, his friends will keep his memory green. They are in the market-place, the churches, the wretched tenant-homes, the mansions, the frontier shanties, the mines. The poor and the ignorant and the miserable have left no other friend so powerful. That is the story of his humanity. In every village some heart mourns him. That is the story of his personal worth.

"There are bleak skies to watch above the dead, and the earth offers but cold shelter. Yet one fancies that he whose life was full of storms, whose aggressive spirit could not rest, whose thoughts run ever on and on, should find a deeper peace in the rigid fixity of the winter slumber than in the languorous 'thrill and stir of June.'

John G. Whittier, in a letter to Rev. Dr. Chapin, regretting his inability to attend the funeral of Mr. Greeley, says:—"When I heard of his death there mingled with my grief a feeling of gratitude that I had been preserved from saying one word, through partisan zeal or difference of opinion, which could add bitterness to his life—that I had none of the late remorse over the dead for unkindness to the living, which is one of the saddest burdens of humanity. No words of praise are needed. They would be lost in the general eulogy. With common consent he will take a place in the Valhalla of American worthies as one of the greatest and best."

Many distant readers will be interested in the following description of the decorations of the church where the sole funeral services were held:

"Dr. Chapin's church (in New York City) is of pure Gothic architecture, and its sharply arched roof mounts far up into space. From the highest point of the inside of the building to the lowest, from end to end, and from side to side, emblems of mourning were judiciously arranged.

"The pulpit, behind and in front of it, glowed with the rarest and loveliest flowers gathered together in the most beautiful and suggestive forms. To the left of the altar was a design of a plough, of full size, made of camellias and other exotics. Beyond it was the design of a pen, several feet in length, and at the extreme right was a crown. The crown came last, but it was his—even at the last.

"The clock facing the altar was also surmounted by the cross and crown, and its hands had stopped when his stopped at ten minutes of seven o'clock.

"The front of the pulpit was covered by a tablet of flowers bearing the words he last uttered, 'It is done,' and over all was sprung a gigantic arch composed of immortelles, bearing the legend, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' in letters of red, the border being green and the groundwork of white. In connection with these floral decorations it was remarked that in each and all of them, as well as in the other emblems in the body of the church, and over and about the coffin, the lurel and the immortelle held their places. It was life asserting itself over death."

A LESSON FOR THE PEOPLE.

THE death of Horace Greeley, and its attendant incidents, has set the American people to thinking. Here was a man of high integrity and blameless life, who had for more than a quarter of a century devoted heart, and brain, and hands to every good cause that claimed his advocacy. He was kind-hearted, self-devoted; a good citizen in all his relations; a friend of the poor, the humble and the oppressed. He had his weaknesses; but they were not on the side of vice or self-indulgence. They were of the head, rather than the heart. Now this man aspired to the highest office in the gift of the people, and was nominated for that office. Instantly he became the victim of a mean and cowardly and cruel political animosity, and journals published and edited by men claiming to be gentlemen and Christians, vied with each other in such coarse abuse and caricature, that a whole people were shocked and outraged; and even partisan papers devoted to the other side cried out, "Shame!"

Mr. Greeley's aspirations were not in the line of the people's wishes. Their choice was given to another. Disappointed ambition, and great domestic sorrow, were too much for the overtaken, overtried, worn down and exhausted man; and soon after his defeat he died.

The people have taken the lesson to heart, and there is sorrow and indignation all over the land, as well with political friends as political opponents, at the frightful indignities that were heaped upon this good citizen, now gone to his reward.

It is time that we learned a better way. Our political contests should be conducted in a different spirit. Because a man is a politician, it is no reason why he should be a brute and a liar. Because an editor or publisher is a politician, it is no reason why he should sink the gentleman and the Christian, and become the base and cowardly assailant of good men, seeking to destroy their reputations, and making their names a by-word with the people.

FANNY FERN.

THE last words of Fanny Fern were characteristic of her thoughtful love for the young, and in beautiful harmony with all that she had ever uttered. As the evening hours came on, and she knew that she was dying, her thoughts turned—not upon herself and the solemn realities she was experiencing—but to the one little motherless grandchild, who had been so unspeakably dear to her. "Put her to bed," she said, "and if I die in the night don't tell her till morning."

PIPSISSIWAY POTTS.

IF we were to attempt to publish all the good things that I have written to us about the author of "Other People's Windows," we should have room for little else in our book. Before us now lies a manuscript five pages long, from a subscriber in Virginia telling us how Pipesey is read and appreciated there. We have not room for one quarter of it. After speaking of the comfort and cheer Pipesey's kind words have brought her in times of trial, the writer goes on to say:

"Like Lily we are so glad that Deacon Skiles did not get his housekeeper from Deacon Adonijah Potts's family. It was infinitely more appropriate that Rhoda Bowles should move into that sphere than Pipsissaway Potts, who, I truly believe, is mistaken when she thinks that her 'field is very narrow,' and would have been enlarged had she taken charge of the Deacon's roystering calves and motherless children. There are in the world so many more calves and motherless children than his that need her attention, and would have been deprived of it had not the obliging Rhoda stepped into the shoes waiting for Pipesey. And we all hope that it is indeed her very last chance, for never spoke Paul a truer sentiment than that 'the unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord, but she that is married careth for the things of the world, how she may please her husband; and we would unselfishly(?) have her remain in a condition in which she may attend to the Lord without distraction. We girls need her to teach us how to cultivate sunny tempers, to beautify our homes, and to be useful members of the home circle. Our brothers need her wholesome advice to tone down their wild, irregular natures. Our parents will find the care of us more pleasant, and less overwhelming, if she will continue to tell them what to do with us. We, of all ranks and conditions, who are reached by her pen, will be the better for her words of wisdom."

A LETTER FROM A SUBSCRIBER.

EVERY mail brings us heart-warmed letters from old subscribers who have learned to love the HOME MAGAZINE. It is pleasant to know that it has cheered and comforted and helped so many. Here is an extract from the letter of a lady in Vermont that reaches us just as we are closing the present number. She says:

"You can scarcely appreciate the comfort your magazine brings every month to one so alone away up here among these Vermont hills, and just now so covered with a world of snow. It is said 'into each life some rain must fall,' and it seems to me that into my life more has fallen than is usually the case. But I know that 'God's ways are always right, and love is o'er them all.' I received the December number Thanksgiving Day; and such a lonely day it was, too, dear mother, brother and sister who used to be with us, gone to enjoy the upper and holier life, other friends away, and my heart seemed well nigh breaking, when I thought I will see what of comfort the dear Home brings me this time. The first I read was 'The Bachelor's Love Story,' that nearly choked my voice, and I read with tears falling thick and fast, for I could so well appreciate his life-sorrow. Then when a few friends came in to spend the evening, who love and delight in Pipey quite as well as I do, and that is well enough, I read the 'Windows' to them, it was almost too much for buttons and single-thread seams where the ends weren't fastened very well, and after Thanksgiving dinner, too, but we just survived the old deacon with his five roistering calves and. Pipey's dire disappointment. Long may she live to cheer poor world-weary mortals; wish I could just give her a good, sisterly hug. Long may the Home and its authors live!"

THE "GRACES."

ROSELLA RICE writes us: "A Wisconsin friend to whom I send your magazine wrote me the most rapturous letter about the 'Graces.' Her admiration of the picture is charming to hear. Think of that poor, lone woman on a farm in bleak Wisconsin, busy with her loom from morning till night, made so glad over the magazine and the beautiful picture!"

Another lady, who sent us a club, says: "Your pictures have arrived, and give universal satisfaction. One lady has hers in a frame. Says she would not take $2 for the picture, or $4 for the magazine. I am more than delighted with both. The magazine is a perfect treasure. The improvements far beyond my expectations."

PUBLISHERS' DEPARTMENT.

FREE TO EVERY SUBSCRIBER FOR 1873!

If anything sweeter, lovelier or more attractive than "THE CHRISTIAN GRACES" has yet appeared in this particular field of art, it has not been our good fortune to see it. There have been innumerable single figures of Faith, Hope and Charity, and groups of Faith and Hope; but this is, we believe, the only first-class picture in which CHARITY, "the greatest of these," come in as the central figure, and in a group of ideal faces of the loveliest type, shines sweetest and loveliest of them all—a fitting representative of our time, when Charity is coming forward and taking her true place as the first and greatest of Christian virtues.

Manufactured only by the Nutrio Manufacturing Co., 1520 South Ninth Street, Philadelphia.

DREER'S GARDEN CALENDAR FOR 1873.

—All who are interested in the cultivation of vegetables, plants or flowers, should send a three-cent stamp for a copy of the above; it contains 168 pages, illustrated with numerous engravings, with full lists of the best varieties. Also practical directions for preparing hot-beds, sowing seeds, proper soil and cultivation. Many new varieties of seeds and plants have been recently added to his collection, which will be found described in the calendar. Address HENRY A. DREER, 714 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

COUGH CANDY.—At this season of the year, when coughs, colds and bronchial affections generally are so prevalent, a box of cough candy is often found very useful, as well as very palatable. Dr. J. H. Schenck & Son, whose advertisement will be found on second page of cover, manufacture a very superior Cough Candy in connection with Schenck's Pulmonic Syrup, Seaweed Tonic and Mandrake Pills—see advertisement in this and former numbers of Home Magazine. Ask your druggist for Schenck's Pulmonic Candy. Manufactured by Dr. J. H. SCHENCK & SON, N. E. corner Sixth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia.

Mrs. ELIZA J. RAND, of Concord, Ky., has had a Grover & Baker Sewing Machine almost constantly in use for eleven years, and never had any repairs done on it. During the first year she made on it four hundred and twenty different articles, from the very finest to the very heaviest material, including leather. She broke but two needles during the eleven years, and those through carelessness.

MY FRIEND'S RAVEN.

A REMINISCENCE.

A YOUNG man of finer promise than was my friend Burkhart rarely steps across the threshold of manhood. I recall him now, after thirty years, with a distinctness of personality almost as vivid as if I had seen him only yesterday. Handsome, in the finer sense with which we use the word when speaking of the man; cultivated, social, ambitious to make the best of himself, gentlemanly in deportment, and kind of heart—he was my model young man.

Burkhart was a student of law when I first made his acquaintance. Our literary tastes drew us together, and we soon became warmly-attached friends. Then, as now, the greatest peril a young man had to encounter was social drinking. Especially among law students, in the city where we lived, was drinking the rule instead of the exception. Burkhart was fond of wine, and kept it in his room. If a friend called to see him, he always welcomed him with a glass of sherry or Madeira.

I had been, very early in life, made sadly familiar with the evil of drinking—had taken lessons of prudence into my heart; and, though I rarely refused a single glass of wine with a friend, always drank it with a sense of danger and with an inwardly-spoken word of warning. I never kept it in my room, and only on rare occasions procured it for the friends who visited me. I was thought to be a little of the milk-and-water order by some of the faster young men in our circle, but I took their jests, and occasional jeers, good-naturedly.

After Burkhart's admission to the bar, he drifted into politics. He was a fine speaker, quick in debate, well read, and gifted with language. These made him popular. His political associates were all drinking men; and, during an exciting canvass, in which he took the stump for a favorite candidate, I was greatly concerned to see that the constant free use of liquor was beginning to show its unmistakable signs. His voice was getting deeper and hoarser; his face puffy; his eyes bloodshot. He had taken cold, he said, and grown hoarse through constant speaking in the open air and at night. I knew that much more than a simple cold was at the bottom of his changed appearance, and that he was taking freely of something a great deal stronger than wine.

I dropped a word of caution—but he laughed at me, at the same time betraying a little annoyance. This betrayal quickened my concern. It satisfied me that he had his own convictions of danger, but was trying to push them away.

At the close of one of these political campaigns, during the latter portion of which my friend had been all over the county, speaking every night, and drinking so freely as often to be visibly affected, I called to see him at his room. He was alone. He had done the work for which eager and noisy politicians wanted him; and now, that the election was over, it seemed as if he were almost forgotten. He felt this, for he said, after the first warm greeting—

"If you had called an evening or two ago, you would have met a room full. But I'm of no more use now."

There was a slight shade of bitterness in his voice. A bottle of wine was standing on a table in his comfortably-furnished room. He filled two glasses. I saw his hand shake as he held the bottle.

"Frightfully nervous?" he said, as he reached me one of the glasses. "I've been on too great a strain for the last six weeks."

"Glad it's over," I replied; "and if I were you, I'd keep out of this thing another year."

"Can't just do that," he answered. "Got my way to make in the world, and nothing puts you before the people like politics. I aim high, you know."

I sipped the wine he handed me, while he emptied his glass before taking it from his mouth.

"What have you there?" he asked, seeing a magazine in my hand.

"Something new and strange from our friend, Poe. Beats anything for weird interest that he has yet done. I thought you would relish something purely ideal after your surfeit of politics."

"I shall relish it keenly. Thanks for any diversion!" he replied. "Is it a trip to the Dog-Star, this time?"

In allusion to Poe's "Journey to the Moon," in the Southern Literary Messenger, published not long before.

"No; it's a bit of the quaintest poetry you ever read. I don't know what to make of it. Can't see the allegory."

"Maybe he can't see it himself," said Burkhart, with a smile.

"Just as likely. And now prepare yourself for a treat in word-painting, and metrical art. The poem is called 'THE RAVEN,' and will, I am sure, make as much sensation, and give the critics as much to do and guess after as did the 'ANCIENT MARINER,' of Coleridge."

I opened the magazine and read the poem through, then lifted my eyes and looked at Burkhart, who had not spoken. He sat with one hand shading his face, and did not stir, until I said, "Well, what do you think of that?"

He started and aroused himself, and as he looked toward me I saw an uneasy look in his eyes, and a something like a quiver of feeling flash across his face. He glanced above the window, then down upon the floor, then shook himself and arose to his feet, and began moving about the room in a nervous, uneasy manner.

"It was like the spell of a sorcerer!" he exclaimed, with much excitement, and again looked, instinctively, to above the window and down at the floor. "I can almost see the foul bird and hear his croak," he added. "If I did not know Poe as well as I do, I should say that he had committed a murder, and that the raven was his conscience."

I laughed at his excitement, but he was so serious over the matter, and so nervous, that I thought it best, after discussing the literary merits of the poem, to get his mind away from it, and upon something, if possible, amusing. I was only partially successful. It was nearly eleven o'clock when I bade him good-night. What followed I will give in his own words, after saying, that on going to see him next day, I found him very ill, and learned that he had passed a terrible night.

"That poem finished me," he said, with an effort to smile, a few days afterward, when we were alone together. "Poe's raven was not half so real as the one that visited me. You saw how nervous I had become. Well, the moment you left me, I felt a sudden fear creeping into my blood. I did not know what it meant. Then a strange fancy possessed me. I was the poet in his lone chamber, and "Suddenly there came a tapping,

As of some one gently rapping,
Rapping at my chamber door."

"I felt my flesh creep and the hair move on my head. I could not rise, but fixed my gaze on the door. When

"The silken, sad, uncertain
Rustling of each purple curtain
Thrilled me—filled me with fantastic Terrors never felt before."

"Nothing was ever more real to me in the outside world than the vision I then saw. The door seemed to open, and a raven, black as night, with eyes that seemed coals of fire, fluttered into the room. A strange terror crept to my very bones. I started and shrunk back, shuddering, from the foul thing. As I looked at the bird, it seemed to lose itself in a dark shadow, out of which, in a moment or two, I saw faintly outlined, and then distinct in form, the head of a great serpent, the body slowly uncoiling itself in the mass of shadow.

"The abject fear I then felt it is impossible to describe. I would have leaped from the window had I been near it. As the serpent uncoiled, it began moving slowly toward me, its head rising higher and higher from the floor, until it was on a level with my breast. I caught up the nearest chair to defend myself and struck at the horrid thing wildly. The chair seemed to go through it, and break it into a hundred pieces, and then each piece became a serpent, and came crawling toward me on the floor.

"I could bear this no longer, but rushed from the room and ran down-stairs and into the parlor, where I crouched on one end of a sofa, shivering. I tried not to attract attention, for the true meaning of all this was beginning to dawn upon my mind. But I had been there only a few moments when that accursed raven stalked in through the door, and came flapping toward me!

"Not to have leaped up and cried out, would have been impossible. I made a rush for the door; but a strong hand was laid upon me, and a kind, assuring voice was in my ears.

"Much of what followed I do not remember. I can only recall it as a fearful nightmare, full of the most awful terrors, out of which I at last awoke, weak and exhausted, as from a spell of illness. You see my weak, nervous condition," and he held up his unsteady hand. "If I could tell the story of my 'raven' with half the marvellous skill at word-painting that Poe possesses, his "Gaunt and ominous bird of yore," would appear of little more importance than a common blackbird."

My friend tried to smile, but it was in a faint, weary way.

"One interview with the bird is quite enough, I should think," said I, speaking soberly. "It is not likely that it would improve its manners on further acquaintance, or bring you better company than on the occasion of its first visit."

His face grew very serious, and his lips settled into a firm expression.

"One visit will suffice," he answered. "It is well, perhaps, that it came when it did. I have heard of these frightful experiences, but never imagined anything approaching the dreadful reality."

My poor friend! So gifted, so ambitious, so generous in spirit, but so weak on the social side! The lesson of the raven did not suffice. Of course he set a guard upon himself; and for a long while afterward would take nothing stronger than wine. I ventured, on one or two occasions, to suggest strict abstinence, but he was annoyed and half offended. "Do you think," he asked, with a rasping tone in his voice, "that I am in danger of becoming a drunkard?"

I did not answer "Yes," for that might have caused a separation. I did think there was danger—great danger.

To my regret, Burkhart was nominated in the ensuing fall for the State Legislature, and accepted the nomination. The party that supported him being the strongest, he was elected.

Alas for my friend! He had too sensitive an organization to go through the fire of a political campaign and come out unscathed; for politics and whisky have become so closely allied, that unless a man drinks freely with anybody and everybody during a canvass, he cannot hope to have much influence with the men of the party on whom chiefly success depends.

I did not see much of him during the latter and more exciting part of the canvass that fall. But, when I did get sight of him, I saw, with deep regret, that he was giving way under the excessive strain. He looked far worse than in the preceding fall.

At last it was over. The votes were in, and my friend Burkhart was lifted to the honorable place he had coveted—the first step, in his ambitious thought, to higher distinctions.

I tried to get access to him on the night of the election, but he was too closely guarded by his crowds of political friends. I was anxious about him, remembering, as I did, so vividly what had happened a year before. He now had a room at one of the hotels. I lingered near this room until a late hour that night, feeling sure that when he came home he would need my care. And I was not mistaken. It was near one o'clock. I had been pacing the long corridor, upon which his room opened, for almost an hour, when, in turning, I saw him walking toward me. His steps were unsteady. Just before he reached me, he stopped with a sudden jerk back, and then swept in a half circle round some object on the carpet that seemed to fill him with disgust and fear.

"Oh," he exclaimed, calling me by name, and springing forward, "I'm so glad to find you here!"

And he caught hold of me with eager hands that I could feel trembling. He looked back, fearfully, and said, in a despairing voice: "It's that cursed raven again!" Adding, after a moment, and with a shiver, "and his infernal crew!"

I got him into his room, and tried to quiet him; but that was impossible.

I will not describe the night that followed. It is too dreadful. I have dropped a veil over it, and there it must remain.

My gifted friend never took his seat in the Legislature. The first step to a high and honorable career had been made ready for him, but his feet did not go up to it. When the morning broke, word went forth that he was dangerously ill. At nightfall he was dead!

and perhaps carry it away with them. A pilgrimage to this spot is toilsome and wearying. Gungootree is shut in by rocks and precipices. The traveller finds no well-prepared road ready for his feet. He must move carefully along the edges of precipices, avoiding loose stones, which may treacherously slip from beneath his feet, and send him headlong. Sometimes he must climb the face of the rock, and where there

THE SACRED RIVER OF INDIA, AND THE CITIES OF ITS VALLEY.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

AWAY up among the heights of the Himalayas, the Ganges, the sacred river of India, finds its first rocky bed. It enters the world from beneath a low arch of ice, the accumulation of ages; it is cradled amid the rocks and glaciers in almost inaccessible solitudes, and is nourished by the eternal snows. Here it pours its shallow waters over its bed of shingle, or springs in fantastic waterfalls from rock to rock until it reaches Gungootree, the Mecca of the Hindoo. Gungootree is considered the head of the Ganges, and here every year numbers of devout pilgrims come to visit the temple which rises above the infant river, to receive the benedictions of the Brahmins who have it in charge, drink of the holy water, is resting-place for neither hand nor foot, ladders reach from cliff to cliff. Sometimes a frail spar is all that supports him over awful chasms. Religious enthusiasm must be strong, indeed, to thus carry pilgrims over these almost invincible barriers. The grandeur and wildness of the scenery at Gungootree is past description. Rocks are piled upon rocks around the bed of the stream, magnificent trees cast their shadows over it, and in the distance the eternal mountains show their snow-clad summits.

Leaving Gungootree, the Ganges, or Bhagirati, as it is here called, wends its way through the mountain fastnesses, and receiving tribute from the snow masses on every side, soon becomes a dark, rapid and broad stream. As it passes through the mountainous region, which extends far southward of the Himalaya Range, it is fed by numerous tributaries, some of them draining the Himalayas, others flowing eastward and northeastward from the Aravulli and the Vindhya Mountains—ranges of Central India. The principal one among the latter rivers is the Jumna, a river itself of no mean magnitude. On this river is found the city of Delhi, a name familiar to us a few years ago, from the important part it played in the Indian mutiny.

But Delhi has a reputation other than this. It was once the capital of the great Mogul empire, and was probably unsurpassed in wealth and magnificence as much taste as Mogul or Persian art could give birth to. Domes of vast circumference and fantastic swell crowned the summits of the mosques, and towered above the other structures of the city; palaces, cool, airy, grotesque, with twisted pillars, balustrades of silver and roofs of fretted gold; elephants moving their awkward and cumbersome bulk to and fro, disguised in glittering housings, and surmounted with golden howdahs; and gardens shaded and perfumed by the most splendid trees and sweetest by any city in the world. In the days of its splendor it is said to have covered a space of twenty square miles, and its ruins at the present day but little less in extent. What its population must have been during this era, cannot now be ascertained, but previous to the Indian mutiny it had decreased to about two hundred thousand, and is even less now.

An old volume, speaking of this city, says: "Whatever Asia could furnish of barbaric pomp or gorgeous show, was there collected together, and disposed with flowers of Asia; such were the principal features of Delhi."

Its chief interest at the present day is in its associations and in its architectural remains. Unlike most Indian cities it is substantially walled. Its population is more Mohammedan than Hindoo, and stately forms of Afghans and Sikhs constantly meet the traveller. The great mosque, the Jumna Masjid, erected by the Emperor Shah Jehan, is the most imposing building of the town. It is placed on a natural elevation of ground which has been levelled on the summit so as to afford a space for an open square of fourteen thousand yards. This square has three great entrances, the most magnificent being toward Mecca, and all approached by noble flights of stairs. The mosque itself occupies the fourth side of the square, and is about two hundred and sixty feet in length. Its general color is deep red, relieved by the pure white marble of the domes. The minarets are one hundred and fifty feet in height, and are built of black marble, variegated with redstone, each relieved by projecting galleries of pure white marble. The domes are topped by gilt pinnacles.

Next in point of interest is the Palace of Delhi.

pearance of a conflagration. The peacock throne was of an oval form, and placed under a palm-tree, which overshadowed it with its foliage. A peacock perched upon a branch near the summit extended its wings like a canopy over the throne. Both the palm-tree and the peacock were of gold, and the wings and leaves so delicately and exquisitely formed that they appeared to wave and tremble at the slightest breeze. The rich green of the peacock's feathers was represented by superb emeralds, and the fruit of the palm-tree, formed of brilliant Golconda diamonds, mimicked nature so admirably that the observer might easily have been tempted to pluck them.

About nine miles to the south of Delhi is found a

THE CASHMERE GATE, DELHI.

It is three thousand feet long and eighteen hundred feet broad. Its open court affords space for ten thousand horsemen. The great hall of audience of the palace is two hundred and eight feet long and seventy-six feet broad. It is of white marble, the roof being supported by colonnades of marble pillars. Here the famous peacock throne once stood, but it has long since disappeared, and its untold jewels have been scattered over the world since the raid and massacre of Delhi, perpetrated by Nadir Shah in 1739. In the days of its glory this hall was lined throughout with crystal, and adorned with a lustre of black crystal exquisitely wrought, which, when lighted up, caused the apartment to present on all sides the ap-magnificent pillar or tower called the Khoodab-Minar. It is about two hundred and fifty feet high, and one hundred and forty-three feet in circumference at its base. It is built of red sandstone and is beautifully fluted, and four balconies encircle it at different heights from the ground. Within an irregular spiral staircase leads to the top. There are inscriptions a foot in breadth around the tower, containing verses from the Koran. Its builder, Kutub-ud-din, originally a slave, rose to be a general in the Turkish army, and finally succeeded his master, who had conquered Northern India, in ruling that region. He was the first of the Ghori or Pathian dynasty which commenced in the twelfth century, and was succeeded by the Moguls in the sixteenth. The Khootab is a great column of victory. It may have been intended as a minaret to a stupendous mosque which was never completed, the ruins of which still remain at its base. Close beside the Khootab is a remarkable pillar made at a single cast of wrought iron, weighing about seventeen tons, fifty feet in height—about half sunk in the ground—and five feet in circumference. Though built about the sixth century, it shows not the least sign of rust.

The plains round about Delhi are strewn with ruins. Once populous streets are now heaps of rubbish. Only tombs remain intact to tell of the heroes and rulers who have once existed. And these tombs are immense in size, and wonderful and beautiful in their architecture. It is a strange lesson which this region impresses on the thoughtful traveller. It speaks of past grandeur lost in death and decay. Its records are of a dead yesterday. There is no busy life springing up from amid the tombs and ruins, telling of an active to-day and a hope of to-morrow. The past is all, and with the dead past everything is ended.

Among the many tombs is one of a great Mohammedan saint, Nizain-ud-din, who died in the fourteenth century, and another of a famous poet, Chusero.

The siege of Delhi has become part of Anglo-Indian history. It was one of the most terrible sieges of the Sepoy war, and in it was displayed some of the noblest acts of heroism. Delhi was made the Mohammedan rallying-point. The English were slaughtered without mercy. The town was so remote from the seaboard that troops could be sent only with the utmost difficulty to the struggling soldiers. One force of infantry and cavalry, sent to the relief of the English within the city, marched from the Punjab, on the west, under a burning sun, five hundred and eighty miles in twenty-two days. The British troops finally arrived in sufficient numbers to force an entrance through the Cashmere gate, and, after an incredibly hard battle, resulting in terrible loss of officers and men, took possession of the city, relieved the little garrison within, and obtained the surrender of the old king and his sons. The few officers who survived this battle all received the Victoria cross.

On the river Jumna, almost directly south of Delhi, is the town of Agra, also remarkable for the beauty and magnificence of its architecture. Agra was once the Mogul capital of Hindostan, but it is now falling into decay. The whole plain is covered with the ruins of its ancient grandeur. It is, like Delhi, Oriental, rather than Hindoo in its character. The city rises on the banks of the river in the form of a semi-circle, commanded by the immense fortress, which includes the imperial palace. This palace, one of the finest edifices in Asia, was erected by the Emperor Akbar. The great square of the palace, filled with rows of plantain trees, and surrounded by a beautiful gallery, was formerly adorned by six triumphal arches, which served as the entrances to six broad streets. The architecture and decorations of the Zenana or ladies' palace rival those of the Alhambra in beauty and magnificence.

The late Dr. Macleod, who visited this portion of India a few years since, thus describes this palace: "As to the Zenana buildings, picture to yourselves rooms or boudoirs, call them what you please, opening one into another, all of pure marble; here a balcony supported by delicate pillars, with projecting roofs; there exquisite balustrades in delicate lace-like open patterns with no ornament save gilding;—the views extending over the country, and embracing the Taj and the Jumna. Imagine again rivulets of water streaming from room to room along marble beds; gardens of flowers, and precious exotics—the creepers running over trellises, and shading from the heat the pathways across the marble floors, and mingling with the flying spray of fountains; and this on and on, from room to room, from balcony to balcony, from court to court. And then there are two recesses impervious to heat, whose walls are formed of innumerable small mirrors, with lamps without number, by which tiny waterfalls used to be illumined from behind, as they flowed into marble fountains and thence issued in bubbling rivulets or sprang into fluttering jets of spray of delicious coolness."

But as beautiful as is this palace to the outward beholding, there are lower stories and covered vaults which fill the mind of the spectator with wondering miles from the town, on the west bank of the Jumna. Dr. Macleod thus describes this architectural wonder, as he just viewed it from the chamber of the gateway, and afterward entered it:

"From the arch in the gateway the eye follows a long, broad, marble canal, often full of crystal water, at the extreme end of which rises the platform on which the Taj is built. Each side of the white marble canal is bordered by tall, dark cypress trees, and on feast days about eighty fountains—twenty-two being in the centre—fling their cooling spray along its whole length, while trees of every shade, and plants of sweetest odor, fill the rest of the garden. The buildings which make up the Taj are all erected on a platform about twenty feet high, and occupying a space of about three hundred and fifty feet square. These buildings consist of the tomb itself, which is an horror. There are mysterious stairs descending into empty cells and dark caverns. There are tortuous passages apparently leading nowhere, but investigation has brought to light walled-up apartments at their terminations. In one of these chambers, shut in by a wall eleven feet in thickness, were found the skeletons of a young man and of an old and young woman. A well was there, but with no means of drawing water from it. A beautiful landscape could be seen from the cell, but there was no possibility of communication with the outer world. Curious explorers have found deep wells with ropes hung from bearers across their mouths, on which skeletons of females were found.

There are in Agra palaces, mosques and tombs of bewildering beauty. The pearl mosque is one of the most perfect gems of art in India. The Taj, the most remarkable of the tombs, is situated about three octagon, surmounted by an egg-shaped dome of about seventy feet in circumference; and of four minarets about a hundred and fifty feet high, which shoot up like columns of light into the blue sky. One feature peculiar to itself is its perfect purity; for all portions of the Taj—the great platform, the sky-piercing minarets, the building proper—are of pure white marble! The only exception—but what an exception!—is the beautiful ornamented work of an exquisite flower pattern, which wreathes the doors and wanders toward the dome, one huge mosaic of inlaid stones of different colors. Imagine if you can such a building as this—

'White as the snows of Apennine, Indurated by frost,' rising amidst the trees of an Eastern garden rich in color, fruit and flower, and standing against a sky of ethereal blue, with nothing to break its repose save the gleaming wings of flocks of paroquets adding to the glory of color; and all seen in perfect silence, with no painful associations to disturb the mind, or throw it out of harmony with the pleasing memories of a wife and mother buried here by a husband who loved her for twenty years of married life, and who lies beside her!

"We walk up from the great portal along the central marble canal, ascend the platform by twenty steps, and, crossing the marble pavement, enter the Taj with a feeling of awe and reverence. Our admiration is increased as we examine the details of the wondrous interior. The light admitted by the door does not dispel but only subdues the gloom within. We stand before such a screen as we have never seen equalled. Divided into several compartments and panels, it sweeps around the marble cenotaphs that lie within it, and represent the real tombs seen in the vault beneath. It is of purest marble, so pierced and carved as to look like a high fence of exquisite lace-work, but is really far more refined and beautiful; for everywhere along those panels are wreaths of flowers composed of lapis lazuli, jasper, heliotrope, chalcedony, cornelian, etc.; so that to make one of the hundreds of these bouquets a hundred different stones are required. The Florence mosaic work does not surpass it."

Fatehpore Sikri is within a day's drive of Agra, and was built by Akbar. "Its buildings," says Dr. Macleod, "remain as perfect as when erected—its tombs being like poems in marble, its palaces of rarest beauty, and its remains, in short, so exquisite as do not exist in any other part of the earth."

Lucknow, another town rendered famous by the Sepoy rebellion, is also found in the valley of the Ganges. It is the capital of the province of Oude. Oude is a small province, but, being well watered by large rivers and smaller streams, it is one of the most productive in India. It yields crops of wheat, barley, rice and other grains, sugar-canes, indigo, poppies for opium, and all the richer articles raised in India. Lapis lazuli is also a production of this province. Lucknow stands on the banks of the Goomty, about thirty miles north of the Ganges. Though one of the most imposing cities of central India, some of its streets are so narrow that two carts cannot pass each other, and are sunk, in the quarter inhabited by the lower orders, at least ten or twelve feet below the level of the soil. Every nook and angle swarms with beggars.

Differing from the Mohammedan type of Delhi and Agra, Lucknow is yet not Hindoo in character. It was once a town of two hundred thousand inhabitants, but since the mutiny its population has decreased.

The Kaiser Bagh, or palace of the deposed king, is one of the finest palaces of the city, though there are, or rather were, many others which rival it in splendor, but now all are silent and deserted.

Here, too, was a long-besieged English garrison during the mutiny. The incidents of their relief is already well known, but will bear repetition. For many weary weeks the little garrison had held out, though sorely pressed by their foes, and suffering daily loss at the hands of the enemy or by sickness. They waited, hoping for succor, until they were sick with hope deferred. One day one of the women caught with her quick ear the strains of "Annie Laurie," as it was being played by the approaching but still distant Highlanders, who were marching to their relief. The news spread like wildfire, and men and women who had borne danger, privation, and suffering with unflinching bravery, now gave way under the emotion of joy.

Lucknow is connected with Cawnpore by a railway thirty miles in length across a level plain. Cawnpore is situated on the south bank of the Ganges, and the river is crossed by a long bridge of boats. There is little at Cawnpore to arrest the eye of the traveller. It is a military station, situated on a broad, dusty plain, and contains many evidences of modern English civilization, but little of the really beautiful or picturesque. If it were not for the associations connected with the spot, it might be passed over as undeserving of notice. But here was perpetrated one of the bloodiest and most blood-curdling massacres of the whole mutiny. A band of Europeans, seven hundred and fifty in number, including men, women and children, had maintained their position in the barracks for twenty days, holding out in the hope of obtaining relief. At last Nana, or Nina Sahib offered terms of surrender, which were accepted, and the English were to be sent down the Ganges to Allahabad. Twenty boats were ranged along the bank for their use, and when these boats were crowded, at a signal from the treacherous Nana they were set on fire. At the same moment guns from the shore, from the temple, and from the banks, which had been carefully concealed, now opened fire upon the wretched people. All the men were slain except two or three, who escaped as if by a miracle, and upwards of one hundred women and children, wounded and bleeding, were brought back to Cawnpore, and locked up in narrow quarters during the heat of an Eastern summer, their number constantly increasing as new prisoners were brought in. When General Havelock finally reached Cawnpore, not an English voice greeted him. All had been murdered two days before and thrown into a well. Around this well a beautiful wall has been built, and a white marble Angel of Peace, by Marochetti, stands over it in commemoration of the dead.

Allahabad is situated on the Ganges, about mid-branch to take root in the ground, each, in course of time, to develop into a huge trunk, until a single tree assumes the magnitude of a forest, growing to a height and breadth which we, who are unaccustomed to such a development of vegetation, can scarcely imagine.

Benares is the next town of importance. It is a town intensely Hindoo in its character, and differs totally in appearance from Delhi and Agra, which may be considered representative Indo-Mohammedan towns. Its streets are narrow and winding lanes. The houses are built of solid stone, six and seven stories high. Carriages are impossible, and the traveller must even occasionally dismount from the elephant—the frequent means of locomotion—and do his sight-seeing on foot. Monkeys are objects of religious veneration in Benares and live and thrive in countless numbers and in perfect security. Holy way between its mouth and its source. Here the railway from Bombay connects with the trunk line from Calcutta to the Punjab. The town possesses a strong fortress, and played an important part during the mutiny. There is a magnificent palace within the fort, and there are other buildings of interest.

Allahabad, Mirzapoor and Chunar, situated along the bend which the Ganges takes at this point, are towns of more or less commercial importance. They lie nearest the great cotton fields of India. Huge convoys of cattle, bearing cotton upon their backs, or drawing rudely-constructed and heavily-laden carts, may be seen coming into these towns at the proper season of the year. The cotton is shipped at these points, and whole fleets of curious-looking boats bear it down the Ganges. Here and to the south will be found the famous banyan-tree of India—a tree of unequalled growth, which sends down branch after bulls were once allowed to wander unmolested through the streets, and all considered it a privilege to feed them; but regard for personal safety has finally led to a restriction of their freedom.

The most famous factory of Benares is that for the manufacture of brocade. Here may be seen magnificent gold brocades costing one hundred dollars and even more a yard. These fabrics are beautiful beyond description, and display a refinement and a culture in art, in comparison with which the manufactures of the western world seem simply barbarous.

Benares is the Holy City of Hindostan. It contains a thousand temples, and tens of thousands of idols and shrines. Here countless pilgrims flock from every part of India to bathe in the waters of the Ganges, and to pay their devotions before the shrines. The most devout among them, if their wealth equals their piety, build stairs or ghauts down to the river's edge for the accommodation of the faithful. These flights of stairs line the whole margin of the water and present every variety of architectural appearance. Here the learned men of India have lived, studying the Vedas, here miserable devotees have endured fiercest tortures, and here holy beggars have begged for alms. Here Hindooism flourished long before the Romans landed in Great Britain, and here it still flourishes as vigorous as ever.

There are about ten missionaries in Benares, but their hopes rest in the future rather than with the immediate present. The city swarms with Brahmins. Americans find a difficulty in comprehending the exact position of the Brahmins. They are the highest caste in India, the caste which is alone entitled to make priests of its numbers. But the Brahmins are a race rather than a class, and though very many find a livelihood as priests, carriers of sacred water, scholars, religious teachers, ascetics and religious beggars, still there is a large part of the race obliged to support themselves and families by other means. So they enter other pursuits besides that of the priesthood, and are even found in the Bengal army. But whatever their circumstances in life, however ignorant they may be, they never forget that they are Brahmins, and consequently entitled to look down upon the rest of the world.

Perhaps the most striking view which can be obtained of Benares is from the river. First of all, the Ganges, here broad and deep, is covered with boats of every conceivable shape; fleets of cotton boats going down to Calcutta; boats loaded with hay and grain; boats for travel, and boats for pleasure. Then along the shore are innumerable ghauts or stairways, some of them massive and beautiful, up and down which pilgrims are continually passing. Here and there is to be seen a Brahmin under his white umbrella, surrounded by a group eager to listen to his words of instruction or to receive his blessing. Here are the weak, the sick and the aged, come to gain strength or to die, as the case may be, in the sacred city and by the sacred waters. On one ghaut smoke constantly ascends from the burning bodies of the dead; on another the most dreadful crimes are being atoned for. And all this takes place, not on a single holy day or religious occasion, but day after day and year after year. It has been going on century after century. The religion which enjoins these customs was in its prime even before the Babe was born in the stable at Bethlehem. Behind these stairways, rising high up from the banks, is the city with the domes and spires of a thousand sacred temples, all of them more or less beautiful. Overtopping all are the stone palaces of the rajahs. It is a strange and bewildering picture to an European or an American, so old-world-like, so different from all we have been accustomed to see or even to think of. It overturns all one's preconceived ideas of religion and of civilization.

In front of Benares, even in the dry season, the Ganges is fifteen yards deep, and is a broad and rapid stream. It is no longer clear. Its tributaries pollute its fair depths with mud and mire. At Chetopa the Gogra pours in a considerable volume of water, and shortly after the Soane and the Gunduck add their streams. The Ganges then spread out like an inland sea, and rushes along at the rate of three leagues an hour between banks from six to eight thousand yards apart. As far as this point rolling hills have approached its banks, and mountains have undulated the horizontal line. But now the country becomes more level. The depth of the river is not greatly influenced by the melting of the snows, but during the rainy season it becomes much swollen, raising twenty-five or thirty feet, and overflowing the surrounding plains sometimes for a hundred miles in extent. Its channel is constantly changing, and occasional long lines of sand-banks indicate where the river has at some time found its boundary. The banks of the Ganges, for its entire length, often present picturesque views of groups who come to bathe in it or drink of it. In the estimation of the natives the river is itself a deity, and the most sure way to Heaven is through its waters. Hence, when possible, the Hindoo comes to its banks to die, and the naked dead are cast into the sacred stream, there to become a prey to the alligators or perhaps, the parish dogs, which watch the stream for food. Its banks are lined with ghauts, and dotted with temples. It is itself one continuous altar or shrine where offerings are constantly being made.

In this portion of India the poppy is extensively cultivated, and it is from hence that much of the opium consumed in the world is obtained. Rice is the most common crop in the portions annually inundated by the river.

When about two hundred miles from its mouth, the Ganges begins to divide itself. Upon one of its divisions, called the Hoogly, is situated Calcutta, the chief city of Bengal. This city presents a curious appearance. The English element makes itself here plainly visible, and is mixed, yet never blended with native. English commercial houses stand almost side by side with Hindoo temples; and English residences with the palaces of wealthy natives.

The Brahmapootra river joins the Ganges a little lower down, and then these united rivers are divided and subdivided, pouring out their waters by many mouths. On the southern border of the Delta of the Ganges is a thickly-wooded, swampy belt, known as the Soonderbunds. The entire region is a labyrinth of creeks and rivers, and forests of vast extent cover the whole soil and overhang the streams, so that the masts of vessels sometimes become entangled in their branches. These wild and wide-extended woods are useless for purposes of cultivation, and are only inhabited by a few fanatical fakcers. In the impenetrable jungles the tiger finds its lair; alligators of enormous size bask upon the sunny banks of the rivers; huge serpents twist themselves among the trees; paroquets scream overhead, and monkeys spring from branch to branch. It is a strange, wild country, on the very borders of a civilization, the oldest of which we have any record. It is a region given over to malaria, and to the dominion of wild beasts, and scarcely less wild and superstitious men. Through the hundred streams which divide the Soonderbunds, the Ganges pours its vast volume of waters into the bay of Bengal, and the mighty river is lost in the mightier ocean.

THE WANDERING ALBATROS.

THE Wandering Albatros is the largest of web-footed birds, the spread of its wings being sometimes twelve feet, and the weight twenty pounds or upwards. The wings are, however, narrow in proportion to their length. It is possessed of wondrous powers of wing, sailing along for days together

This bird is extremely voracious; it has been observed to dash at a piece of blubber, weighing between three and four pounds, and gulp it down entire. After this dainty morsel, the bird was not able to rise from the water, but yet swam vigorously after another piece of blubber on a hook, snapped at it, and was only saved from capture by the hook breaking in its mouth. The food of this bird consists chiefly of fish and mollusca, but it has no objection to the flesh of a dead whale, or to any kind of carrion. It is not a courageous bird, and is often compelled to yield up its prey to sea-eagles, and even to the larger kind of gulls. When food is abundant, it gorges itself, like the vulture, and then sits motionless upon the water, so that it may sometimes be taken with the hand.

THE WANDERING ALBATROS.

without requiring rest, and hardly ever flapping its wings, merely swaying itself from side to side with extended pinions. The plumage is soft and abundant, mostly white, dusky on the upper parts, some of the feathers of the back and wings black. The bill is of a delicate pinky-white, inclining to yellow at the tip. It is found in the Southern seas, particularly near the Cape of Good Hope, whence sailors sometimes call it the Cape Sheep. It often approaches very near to vessels, and is one of the objects of interest which present themselves to voyagers far away from land, particularly when it is seen sweeping the surface of the ocean in pursuit of flying-fish, or when it alights, as it not unfrequently does, upon the rigging of the ship.

Not unfrequently, however, on the approach of a boat, it disgorges the undigested food, and thus lightened, it flies away. Its cry has been compared to that of the Pelican; it also sometimes emits a noise which has been likened to the braying of an ass. Its flesh is unpalatable, being of a strong oily flavor, but some portions of it can be eaten, if properly prepared. The long bones of the wings are in great request for pipe-stems.

Angling for Albatros is quite a favorite amusement, and the bird often gives good sport, sometimes rising into the air, and being drawn down on deck like a boy's kite, but generally hanging back with all its might, and resisting the pull of the line by means of its wings squared in the water. It is no easy matter to haul in an Albatros under such circumstances, and the bird often escapes by the hook tearing out or the line breaking.

Nothing, however, teaches it wisdom; for, in a few minutes, it is quite as ready to take the bait again. Even those which have been captured, marked by a ribbon tied round their necks, and set at liberty, will follow the vessel as soon as they recover themselves.

When an Albatros is hooked the others become very angry, thinking that their companion is monopolizing the tempting food. Down they swoop accordingly, pounce on the spot, and when settled on the water, are very much astonished to see their companion towed away and themselves left sitting on the waves with nothing to eat.

Should one of these birds be shot, the remainder pounce upon it at once and soon entomb their late companion in their rapacious maws. These birds may, under some circumstances, be dangerous to human beings, as they have been observed to swoop upon the head of a man who has fallen overboard—and their long, powerful beaks are fearful weapons when urged by those huge pinions.

The Albatros makes its home on the lofty precipices of Tristan d'Acunha, the Crozettes, the Marion Islands, and other similar localities. It heaps up a rude nest of earth not far from the sea, or deposits its solitary egg in a slight hollow, which it makes in the dry ground. The egg is about four inches long, white, and spotted at the larger end; it is edible.

Mr. Erie, who visited their nesting-places, writes in forcible language of the strange and weird-like scene: "A death-like stillness prevailed in these high regions, and to my ear our voices had a strange, unnatural echo, and I fancied our forms appeared gigantic, while the air was piercingly cold. The prospect was altogether sublime, and filled the mind with awe. The huge Albatros here appeared to dread no interloper or enemy, for their young were on the ground completely uncovered, and the old ones were stalking round them. The young are entirely white, and covered with a woolly down, which is very beautiful. As we approached they snapped their bills with a very quick motion, making a great noise; this and the throwing up the contents of the stomach are the only means of offence and defence they seem to possess. I again visited the mountain about five months afterward, when I found the young Albatroses still sitting in their nests, and they had never moved away from them."

Albatroses appear in great numbers toward the end of June about the Kurile Islands and Kamtschatka. The Kamtschadales make various domestic articles of the wing-bones, and blow up the entrails for floats to their nets.

It is one thing to wish to have truth on our side, and another to wish to be on the side of truth.

I THINK it best not to dispute, where there is no probability of convincing.

TO OLD-TIME FRIENDS.

BY EDITH W. KENT.

HOW I miss the dear old faces
That were wont to gather round!
And the old, familiar voices—
Only in my dreams they sound.

When I journey into dreamland,
(Ah, that those bright dreams were true!)
There I see the old-time faces—
Loving hands I clasp anew.

The olden home—I miss it sadly;
The beauteous fields, the dell,
Grand old mountains, trees and rivers—
All the scenes I loved so well.

Tidings of sad changes reach me—
Joys that were can be no more;
Some friends absent, some are present—
Some have "only gone before."

Strange, though pleasant, are the faces
Of the friends who clasp my hand;
But they cannot fill your places—
Oh, loved ones of native land!

But the same sun shines upon us,
That made bright our early days;
All the same the shade and sunshine
Of life's joys and weary ways.

Moon and stars, with light as silv'ry,
Shone upon us long ago,
When our hearts, dear Al, were blithesome,
And our homeward steps so slow.

And the same skies smile above us—
Their still beauty o'er us bend—
In their constancy, faint emblem
Of the ever-present Friend.

For, as ever, bending o'er us,
Is the same kind, watchful care;
Of the Father's loving kindness
Proofs are here and everywhere.

Though so far apart our life-paths,
Dear old friends of native land,
Let us seek one Blessed Haven—
Trust one Father's loving hand!

"I NEVER knew a man," says an old author, "who could not bear another's misfortunes just like a Christian"—which reminds us of the old lady who thought every calamity that happened to herself a trial, and every one that happened to her friend a judgment.

You can never catch the word that has once gone out of your lips. Once spoken, it is out of your reach; try your best, you can never recall it. Therefore, take care what you say. Never speak an unkind word, an impure word, a profane word.

We should not only break the teeth of malice by forgiveness, but pluck out its sting by forgetfulness.

THE DEAREST LITTLE WIFE IN THE WORLD.*

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"YOU'RE the dearest little wife in the world," said Clem Sandford, kissing the sweet lips of his pretty Katie, and gazing at himself in the mirror of her tender blue eyes. "And I'm the luckiest man in town," he added, as he kissed her again.

Katie looked happy. She went with her handsome young husband to the door, and stood following him with her eyes as he walked down the street. She waited until he was nearly a block away, hoping he might turn to get another sight of her, but he walked on without looking back.

The happy expression faded off slowly from the young wife's countenance—faded and faded, until the serene aspect that succeeded gave place to a look of care and disappointment. A baby's fretting cry came down from the chamber. Katie started and ran up quickly.

"Baby, darling!" she exclaimed, as she lifted her sick child from its crib. The large bright eyes and pale face showed that the illness was serious. The baby's languid head went down upon Katie's shoulder, and a feeble murmur of satisfaction came from its fever-stained lips.

For nearly half an hour the young mother paced the chamber floor, baby's head resting on her shoulder, sometimes singing a low droning song, and sometimes moving to and fro in silence with a manner so absent and absorbed that she seemed like one in a dream. Long before she knew it the baby was asleep. She was still walking the floor with the child in her arms when the door opened, and the coarse face of a woman looked in.

"I bees goin'," said the hard mouth, speaking out of the coarse face, and flinging the words with a sort of cruel satisfaction at the startled little woman.

"Going, Mary! Going where?" asked bewildered Katie, but half comprehending the import of what she had just heard.

"Going to lave," was answered.

"You'll not go until I get some one in your place, Mary?"

The frail little woman stood almost suppliant before the brawny Irish girl.

"I bees goin' now. My wake's up," returned Mary, sharply, and with a toss of her head.

"But, Mary, don't you see that I shall be all alone, and that baby is sick? What am I to do?"

And tears rushed to Mrs. Sandford's eyes.

"I bees goin'," growled the unfeeling wretch, and turning around, went up-stairs instead of back to the kitchen. In a little while she came down, bundle in hand, and took herself off, leaving Mrs. Sandford almost in despair. She had asked for and received her week's wages on the evening before.

What could poor little Katie do but sit down and cry? and she did cry long and bitterly. In the midst of her despair baby awoke, and began fretting and moaning in the crib where she had laid him. At this moment the door-bell rang. Not until it rang again, and louder than at first, did it come into Katie's mind that there was no one but herself to answer it. Then she picked up baby hastily and went down-stairs. A man with an evil-looking face stood at the door. He had a basket of notions for sale, and made a movement to push by her into the vestibule. But an instinct of danger caused her to stand fast in his way.

"I don't want anything," she said.

"But let me show the lady what I have. Here are—"

The instinct of danger that led Katie to stand in the man's way so that he could not come in now caused her to step back with a quick movement, and at the same time to shut the door in his face. She heard him curse her as she did so. Weak and trembling, she went from the vestibule into the parlor, and sat there trying to collect her scattered and bewildered thoughts.

It took Katie some time to clearly comprehend the situation, and to see just what was to be done. She was young and inexperienced—knew little of the mysteries of housekeeping, and less of culinary art. So far, she had managed to get along "wonderfully well," so Clem told her on occasions when his comfort was specially secured; though it must be told that he was not chary of complaint when any jar in the home machinery disturbed his peace.

"What am I to do about dinner?" exclaimed Katie, as the actual state of affairs became clear to her mind. If she alone were to be considered, the case would have been simple enough. But she could not set Clem down to a cup of tea, and bread and butter. He must have his roast, and his vegetables, and his dessert. Clem always wanted "a good square dinner," as he called it, and he was particular about having everything "done to a turn."

What was poor little Katie to do about dinner? Baby fretted and moaned, and Katie could not put him down for more than a few minutes at a time. She cried a good deal in her helplessness. If it wasn't for Clem's dinners, and Clem's selfish regard for his own comfort, Katie would not have been so very unhappy. True, baby was sick, and she was anxious about baby. But the doctor had come in and pronounced him a great deal better than on the day before. So if only baby had been on her mind, the load would not have been very hard to bear. But, besides baby, she had her great, selfish, thoughtless husband to carry, poor weak little thing!

* This story with the accompanying fine illustration originally appeared in "TO-DAY," the new illustrated weekly published in Philadelphia, by McLEAN & STODDART, and edited by Dr. DIO LEWIS.

The hours went by. It was half-past twelve, and Clem would be home at two, and expect to find his dinner on the table. Katie had been trying for half an hour to get baby asleep, so that she could be free to see about dinner, but it was of no use: sleep was not in his eyes. So, at last, with baby in her arms, she went down to the kitchen.

She had been in the kitchen half an hour before to

"Oh, dear!" exclaimed Katie, in despair, as she saw the almost fireless range; and seizing the poker, she commenced raking it with all her might. But, of course, this didn't help the matter any, only made it worse. Then she went to the refrigerator and took out the quarter of lamb that had been bought for dinner. This she put into a dripping-pan, and set it in the oven of the range. Next she brought up from look after the fire, and found it nearly out and no coal in the scuttle. She had gone into the cellar with baby on her arm and brought up coal; she had raked down the fire and put on fresh coal; and now she was in the kitchen again to see about cooking the dinner. Alas for the fire! She had raked it nearly out, and the fresh coal looked almost as black as when she threw it on, filling the grate to the top.

the cellar a basket of green peas, and began shelling them, holding baby all the while. Her back was aching, her head was aching, and her limbs and hands unsteady from excessive nervousness. After shelling the peas, she got some potatoes ready for boiling. There were beets to cook, besides mint-sauce to make and some kind of a dessert to get up, for Clem never would go without his dessert.

Potatoes were put into one pot and the peas into another, with some water—the quantity guessed at in each case—and both vessels set upon the range. You might have held your hand upon it without getting burnt, the fire was so low. Away down at the bottom of the grate it had a bright glow, but the mass of coal heaped above to the very top was as black as when it came from the bin, and did not promise to be alive for an hour at least.

Steadily the hands moved over the face of the clock, and Katie looked at them in despair as they drew nearer and nearer to the dinner-hour, while the fire at the bottom of the grate made but slow encroachments on the mass of coal above. Half-past one, and the piece of lamb looked as raw as when placed in the oven. Not a bubble had yet risen to the surface of the water in which the potatoes and peas had been put to boil. As for a dessert, all idea of that had been abandoned. Baby was asleep, having worn out both himself and his mother with crying and fretting. With unsteady steps and an inward trembling, the result of sheer physical exhaustion, Katie now proceeded to arrange the table and get everything ready for serving the dinner as soon as the fire should accomplish its task. All she could do to help the fire she did, raking it with the poker every few minutes, and so hindering instead of helping. If she had let it alone after the first raking and too liberal supply of coal, it would by this time have got well ahead and been quite a respectable fire. But all it was able to gain in the five or ten minutes at a time that Katie let it alone it would lose when she made a new onslaught with the poker. Poor fire! Poor Katie! Poor dinner! A most unhappy and melancholy trio!

Ting! Ting! It was the clock striking two. At the same moment came down from the chamber a loud cry from baby. Katie threw a look of despair at the black and ashy range, and dropping the poker she had just lifted to give the fire another helping punch, ran up to her sick child. As she lifted him in her arms she heard Clem's key rattle in the door. It opened and shut with the usual bang. Clem was quick and emphatic in his movements. She sat down, weak and trembling. Up-stairs he came with two or three great bounds, clearing half a dozen steps at a time, like a great romping boy.

"Where's my little wife?" he cried, as he swept like a strong wind into the room where Katie sat, with pale face and tear-filled eyes, trying to rally her feelings and draw a veil over her countenance.

"Why, Katie!" exclaimed Clem. "Is baby worse?"

"He's a very sick child," answered Katie, trying hard to command her feelings.

Clem kissed them both tenderly, and said, in his light, confident way: "Oh, never fear about baby. He'll be all right in a few days. I saw Dr. Jones this morning, and he says the worst is over. And now, darling, ring the bell and order up dinner. I'm three minutes late."

"Dinner isn't near ready," answered Katie. "Everything's gone wrong to-day."

"Dinner not ready!" and Clem, as he said this in a tone of profound surprise, not unmingled with displeasure, drew out his watch and looked at the face. "It's five minutes past two now. If there's any one thing I insist on, it's punctuality. Not near ready! Did you say that, Katie?"

"Take baby, and I'll go down and see about it;" and Katie reached baby to Clem. "Mary went off this morning, and I've had everything to do myself." Katie tried to speak cheerfully, even to smile.

"That's too bad," said Clem, but in a tone of voice that showed how little he comprehended all that was involved in the sentence, "Mary went off this morning, and I've had everything to do myself."

"Throw things on the table as quickly as you can," he added. "I'll be down in a few minutes; am in a desperate hurry to-day. Must be back to the store by three precisely."

"It won't be ready for half an hour, Clem," returned Katie, a look of distress on her face. "I've tried my best to make the fire burn. Mary let it go nearly out."

"Half an hour! Why, Katie! When did Mary go?"

"Directly after breakfast," replied Katie.

"And you've been ever since trying to make the fire burn!"

The rebuke in Clem's tones hurt Katie more than the rebuke in his words.

She made no reply, but went down-stairs. In a few minutes Clem followed. He took in the prospect at a glance.

"Half an hour! Better say half a day!" he exclaimed, with ill-repressed anger. "What have you got? Leg of lamb; potatoes; peas. Humph! Poor show in every way! Guess I won't wait. Here; take the baby. Must be at the store by three—haven't a moment to lose."

"But you can't go without your dinner, Clem! I'm so sorry, but I've done the best I could," pleaded miserable little Katie.

"Poor prospect of getting it here," answered the selfish, unsympathizing Clem; and he put the baby into Katie's arms.

"You'll get something at a restaurant, won't you?" said Katie, more concerned for Clem than for herself.

"I don't know," returned Clem, in an injured tone. He was put out, and felt just ugly enough to let Katie know that he was annoyed and displeased.

But he did know, the selfish, ungenerous fellow! It was that he might have time to get a good dinner at a restaurant that he was so eager to get away.

So off he swept, not even kissing the dearest little wife in the world. Poor Katie was almost heart-broken. Clem's displeasure, added to the trouble and exhausting efforts of the morning, was more than she could bear. As the street door shut heavily behind her husband, great sobs burst from her heart, and she sat down with baby in her weak and trembling arms, moaning and crying in a way that if Clem could have heard it would have startled him into something like surprise and pity, if not shame.

And there she sat, crying to herself or hushing her restless baby in a sort of helpless despair—sat there alone, faint and sick in body and mind, while Clem was enjoying “a good square dinner” at a first-class eating-house.

After the pain caused by Clem’s selfish and unmanly conduct had lost some of its sharpness—only aching in a dull, heavy way—Katie went into the kitchen and removed the half-cooked meat and vegetables from the range. But just what to do with them she did not know. They had been intended for Clem’s dinner, but Clem had gone off, and there was no longer any use for them. As for herself, she had no desire for food—could not have taken a mouthful of anything. And now baby began to scream as if in pain. Katie rocked him in her arms, walked with him, sang to him, tried in all possible ways to soothe and quiet him, but all in vain. He screamed on, and writhed and threw himself about in evident suffering. Leaving the half-cooked dinner on the hearth before the range, Katie went up-stairs with her sick child. For more than an hour he cried on, and then from exhaustion became still, dropping off to sleep.

As soon as Katie, who had thrown herself on the bed beside her baby, found that he was sleeping, she rose up, intending to go down to the kitchen again, but as she raised her head everything grew dark. She knew nothing more until she found her husband bending over her with a pale and frightened face.

After Clem had eaten his “good square dinner,” he felt more comfortable in mind and body. His annoyance at the home irregularity and disappointment was over; he was at peace with himself and all mankind. He hoped that Katie was all right; had no doubt that she was, and would make amends for the dinner shortcoming by getting him up something specially nice for supper.

Toward the middle of the afternoon a business friend with whom Clem was personally intimate happened into the store.

“How’s that dear little wife of yours?” he inquired. Clem often bragged of his wife, and his friends, seeing how any reference to her pleased him, were in the habit of asking after Katie.

“Not over brilliant, dear little soul?” answered Clem. “Found her all out of sorts when I went home to-day. Sick baby, no servant and a half-cooked dinner.”

“And what did you do about it?” asked the friend, who knew Clem a little better, perhaps, than he knew himself.

“Me? What could I do about it?” and Clem opened his eyes with a sort of puzzled look.

“Sick baby, no servant and a half-cooked dinner,” the friend said, repeating his words. “Yes, what did you do about it?”

“The best I could. Had to be back to the store by three o’clock. Couldn’t wait for Katie’s dinner, and so went to a restaurant,” answered Clem.

“Didn’t go off in a huff and forget to kiss the dear little wife?”

The tell-tale blood mounted to Clem’s temples at this unlooked-for question.

“Why, Clem Sandford, I never would have believed this of you! The sweetest, dearest, daintiest little thing of a baby-wife to be treated so! I’m all amazement!”

“I was annoyed, that’s a fact,” confessed Clem, in a penitent voice. “When a man comes in on time, sharp set, and finds a half-cooked piece of meat in the range, servant gone, a wife with a crying baby in her arms, looking the picture of distress, and no prospect of dinner for half an hour, he must be next to a saint if he keeps his temper.”

“And doesn’t come down like a brute on his poor little overtaxed wife, whose head, maybe, is aching fit to burst.”

There fell a brief silence, the two men gazing, meantime, into each other’s face.

“Look here, Clem!” broke out the friend, a latent thrill of anger in his voice; “if I’ve really guessed at the truth, if you did come down on poor little Katie after this fashion, then you are a—”

“Brute!” said Clem, with an indignant emphasis. “But, you see, I didn’t. Not quite so bad as that, though I own up to having behaved a little shabbily. A hungry, disappointed, put-out man doesn’t always have the best control of himself—isn’t the most considerate animal in the world.”

“Went off in a huff,” said the friend, “to enjoy a good meal at an eating-house, without a word of sympathy for the dearest little wife in the world, who, without a servant and burdened with a sick child, had tried her best to get him up a dinner, but failed to be on time! I wonder what Katie was doing while he was enjoying himself at Price’s? I wonder if she had as good an appetite as her husband, and sat down to as tasty a meal? If there were no tears in her wine? Did I understand you aright?” went on the friend. “No servant? Alone all day with a sick child, herself a frail delicate little thing—a blossom that any sudden strong wind might blow away!” Clem began to move about uneasily. A look of anxiety crept into his face.

“You’d better get home as quickly as you can,” went on his friend. “I have little doubt, after a day such as Katie has had, you will find her in bed. What if baby were taken worse? What if Katie herself were to become suddenly ill, all alone in the house? Why, Clem, the more I think of it, the more astonished I grow! Take my advice, and get home as quickly as possible. You don’t know what may have happened.”

Clem, now thoroughly alarmed, was not long in taking his friend’s advice. As he hurried homeward, his excited imagination tortured him with a hundred frightful pictures. He called himself “a miserable, selfish brute,” “an unfeeling wretch,” “a cruel monster.” He was deeply grieved and penitent.

Turning, at last, the corner that brought him in sight of his house, he looked toward it anxiously. There was no sign of life; all the shutters, from the highest to the lowest story, were closed. He quickened his steps almost to a run. A great pressure was on his breast. He could feel his heart beating. How still it was as he entered! "Katie!" he called, eagerly; but only the sound of his voice came back to him in a faint and ghostly echo. "Katie!" he called again, and the startled cry of his sick child rose, wailing, on the air in one of the chambers above. With a bound he cleared the stairway.

Across the bed, on which she had fallen in a fainting fit nearly an hour before, he found Katie. She was still unconscious, her face like the face of death.

"Oh, Katie, Katie!" cried the horror-stricken husband, as he lifted her in his arms and looked into her ashen countenance. He saw the muscles quiver about her mouth and throat, and had presence of mind enough to lay her back upon the bed and run for water, which he dashed in her face. This soon revived her. She opened her eyes and looked at Clem half unconsciously, then closed them and lay still for a little while.

"Katie!" called Clem, in a voice tender and loving. The eyes flew open, and light flashed into them.

"Katie, dear!" Clem bent down and kissed her.

"What's the matter?" asked Katie, making an effort to rise; but Clem held her down, saying—

"You've been sick, darling, and must keep still."

"Sick, Clem? Oh, no, I haven't been sick! Is it dinner-time already, Clem?" A shadow crept over her face. "I don't know what's come over me," she added, faintly, and shut her eyes in a weak, exhausted way.

"Oh, baby!" she exclaimed, as baby's cry broke out suddenly in a piercing wail, and she started up again. But Clem's hand pressed her back.

"You must be very quiet," he said, softly, yet firmly. "I'll see to baby," and he lifted the sick child from where he lay behind his mother and tried to soothe and comfort him, but he only cried the more piteously. Every moment Katie's strength was coming back. She now arose and sat on the side of the bed, reaching out her hands for the grieving baby.

"Give him to me," she said; and Clem, finding all his efforts to hush the child unavailing, laid him in her arms, where he nestled his head on her bosom, and grew quiet. For a little while there was silence. It was broken by Katie.

"I'm so sorry about the dinner, Clem," she began, in a regretful voice; "but I did the best I could. Mary went off—"

But Clem put his hand over her soft mouth, saying, "You never should have tried it, darling, and I was a selfish brute to act as I did."

"No, no, no, you wasn't, Clem. I ought to have looked better to the fire, and—and—and—"

But the poor little thing broke down, she felt so weak and helpless.

"I'm not fit to be anybody's wife," she sobbed. "I'm not strong, and I don't know how to do anything."

"Now, hush, Katie! I won't have you talk so.

You're the dearest little wife in the world," answered Clem.

"I'm little and weak and ignorant, and not fit to be anybody's wife," persisted Katie—and she was more than half in the right. Certainly, with all these disqualifications, she was not fit to be the wife of so selfish and self-indulgent a man as Clem Sandford, proud as he was of the sweet little blossom upon which only gentle summer airs had blown until transplanted to his garden, where chill winds swept over it too often.

"Now, hush, Katie, I say!" Clem repeated. "I'm not fit to be the husband of a dainty little darling like you."

And Clem was much nearer the truth than he thought. He was not fit to be the husband of any one like Katie. His wife needed to have strong nerves and physical endurance, to be skilled in the art of housekeeping, and thoughtful in the work of applying this skill to her husband's comfort. He had married for his own convenience and happiness, not thinking of these homely accomplishments in a wife, however, but none the less annoyed and disappointed at not finding them in his pretty little Katie, of whom, as we have said, he was very proud, and tried in his selfish way to love.

"A knowledge of one's faults is half the cure," and "Never too late to mend," are clever sayings, and true in many cases.

The truth was coming to the minds of both Clem and Katie, but it did not come in helpfulness. The mending process involved too much for their strength of character—self-forgetfulness for the good of others, and a persistent purpose. The "dear little wife" was more an untaught child than a well-furnished woman. She had few, if any, of the needed qualifications for the high responsibility she had assumed, and her deficiencies were more and more apparent to her husband every day, because these deficiencies were perpetually marring his comfort.

Clem tried to be more considerate of Katie after this, and she, poor thing! tried in a blind and desperate sort of way to come up to the requirements of her position. But neither of them was equal to the situation. Katie fell far short in her work—not because of unwillingness or indifference, but for lack of strength, training and skill. She had never been taught anything really useful at home, and did not know where to begin nor what to do in the business of orderly housekeeping, and so was completely in the hands of bad servants, and at their mercy. And they led her a miserable life, choosing in most cases to do their worst instead of their best, while she was powerless in their hands.

As a measure of relief to Katie, as well as comfort for himself, Clem determined to get his dinner downtown. The "dear little wife" opposed this. She could not bear the thought of being left alone all day, and so made a new effort to have his dinners better cooked and more punctual as to time. But Biddy, who happened to overhear Clem's proposition, set herself to work to mar all this. She managed to spoil his favorite dishes, and to keep him waiting day after day until he would lose all patience and blame poor Katie for what she couldn't help, oftener leaving her with a tearful than a smiling face.

"I can't stand this any longer, and I won't!" he exclaimed one day, losing all control of himself, as the hands of the little French timepiece on the mantel pointed to half-past two. "If you can't make your cook have dinner in time, I shall go to a restaurant," and off he went to get a "good square dinner," while Katie betook herself to her chamber to cry helplessly all the afternoon.

After that Clem dined regularly at an eating-house, while Katie lunched without rely on anything that happened to come to hand, or went without food from breakfast to supper-time. Forlorn enough in mind as well as in appearance was Katie all day, but as the time drew near for Clem's return at evening she would put on a new exterior for her husband's sake, though as the months went by she grew less and less particular about personal adornment, and less careful to hide from Clem the weariness and discontent from which she suffered.

Another baby came, a dainty, perfect, fairy-like little thing, and Clem was in ecstasies over it. During the three or four weeks that followed—weeks of rest and freedom from care and annoyance, of rest from weariness and pain, of rest from a perpetual sense of incompetence—Kate seemed to be in Heaven. But when the nurse left her, and, weaker than before, she took up the old and new burdens, Heaven seemed to shut its gates upon her and to banish her into outer darkness.

To Clem she was no longer "the dearest little wife in the world," but a weak, fretful, complaining woman, who was no comfort to herself or anybody else. Poor Katie tried hard to be cheerful when Clem came home, but the faint smiles with which she greeted him did not light up her face with its old attractiveness, and so Clem did not respond with the old excess of fondness for which her poor heart longed. Out of her eyes the light would go suddenly, and the smile fade like an evening sunbeam, leaving her face cold and less beautiful. And so a wall of silence and reserve grew up between them, where once had been pleasant talk and sweet home sympathies.

So it went on, the husband and wife growing farther and farther apart, and less regardful of each other's well-being or happiness. The strong, healthy man, with the vigorous blood perpetually enriched by the "good square dinners" his frail little wife never saw or tasted, leaping along his veins and giving life and strength to nerve and muscle, and the weak, discouraged, exhausted woman, who was trying to keep step at his side, had little in common with each other, and that little grew less every day.

Nobody now heard Clem speak of the "dearest little wife in the world," and if any one asked for her, he would shrug his shoulders, and with an injured look, answer, "Sick," or, with a slight levity of manner, "All played out," or, "So, so, all that is left of her;" and then, to more particular inquiries, would, maybe, expatiate on the present vicious system of educating girls, by which they were better fitted for being kept in glass cases to be looked at and admired than for useful practical women who had homes and husbands and children to look after.

It did not take many years, under the excessive friction to which Katie was subjected, to wear out the machinery of her life. A third baby was laid on her bosom, and again she was in Heaven, peaceful and happy.

Again she saw in Clem's eyes, as he bent over her, the old tenderness and the old love; and he saw in her pale, sweet face, and tranquil orbs a new and higher beauty, that drew upon his heart and touched him with a sense of reverence. They were lovers again, and in his thought Clem repeated the words once so often on his lips, "The dearest little wife in the world."

Again she was in Heaven, and in the company of ministering angels, and their states of peace were flowing in upon her. The angels that "do always behold the face of my Father" were about the newborn babe, and blessing the mother with their presence.

Ah! to have her go back again; to have the door of Heaven shut, as it were, and she pushed out into the world to take up burdens too heavy for her weak and bent shoulders! But it was not so to be. She had finished her work, poor and imperfect as it was, and had entered already into her rest.

Clem was sitting by her, on the evening of the third day after the baby was born, holding her thin hand, through which you could see the light, and looking into her pale face, that seemed as the face of a spirit. Katie's eyes were resting upon him. Such peaceful, happy eyes Clem had never seen before. There was not in them the "shadow of a shade" of earthly care, but only the rest and peace of Heaven.

"Katie!" he exclaimed, suddenly, rising and bending over her.

A quick change had come into her face.

"Katie! Dear Katie!" he called, putting his arm beneath her, and raising her from the pillows. Her head fell gently down upon his bosom. He called her again and again in tenderest words and tones, but there was no reply. Then a shiver of fear ran through Clem's heart. He lifted the bowed head hastily, and looked into the face of his wife. A single glance, and the story was told. Katie had fallen asleep, and her waking would be with the angels.

THINK ye, that sic as ye and I,
Wha drudge and drive thro' wet and dry,
Wi' never-ceasing toil;
Think ye are we less blest than they,
Wha scarcely tent us in their way,
As hardly worth their while?—BURNS.

It is time, indeed, that men and women both should cease to grow old in any other way than as the tree does, full of grace and honor.—MARGARET FULLER.

HULDAH, JACK DICKEY'S WIFE.

A STORY FOR GRANDMOTHERS.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

EVERYBODY said, "what a splendid match; he's pretty fore-handed-like, and she's such a worker, no danger of the grass growing under her feet!"

They were married the first of April, and moved into their own little house, a cosey, square building between two weeping willows on the only knoll on the farm.

The first of April—well, the middle of May they had radishes, and lettuce, and onions of their own raising on their table, while other folks' lettuce leaves were no bigger than your thumb-nail.

A web of linen towelling that she had spun and woven herself lay out bleaching on the grass above the spring.

Old ladies in the neighborhood said she was a marvel of a housekeeper, and that they'd just as lief eat their victuals off Huldah Dickey's bare floor, as off their own tablecloths.

But, Huldah was a scold, he didn't do this, and he didn't do that, and she found fault, and too often her words ran high and loud.

To her there was no music like the clacket-y-clack, back and forth, of the unwearied shuttle in the loom, all through the long days, even until bed-time.

What was the song of the robin on the roof to her? what the soft plaint of the dove in the willow, or the cricket in the grass?

If she heard them at all she thought them shrill, or mournful, or piping, and wished the loom could entirely shut out the lovely sounds.

They made her think of graveyards and of the long grasses that swept over sunken graves, and death and burials were to her the gloomiest things she could think about.

The next spring, early, a little daughter came to them. Jack's heart was brimful of the sweetest joy he'd ever known, he never felt happier than when the wee baby lay on his broad bosom clutching aimlessly at nothing. He used to pull its pink toes and touch his hard, woody-looking palms to its velvety cheeks and call it all kinds of sweet names.

When its moist little lips could frame the gurgling word "ta-ta," Papa Jack's joy was ecstatic.

When it grew older he would take it out on the green sward and lie down and let it clamber over him.

It would tumble about as aimlessly as a pumpkin, now bundling over his head, now sitting on his chest, and now tugging at his stalwart legs, trying to lift them.

But Jack couldn't get far enough away that the monotonous clack of the loom was not the unmusical accompaniment of their sport.

Huldah grew more and more industrious, her face grew hard and stern, and the muscles in her neck showed like cords of hemp. When the baby cried she would weave all the harder, hissing out through her teeth: "bawl away, it'll make you grow."

And so the years passed by—the family increased to four little girls, small, shy, flaxen-haired creatures who had even their "stint of work" to do.

The eldest to sweep and wash dishes and "mother over" the others; the second to keep the hens out of the garden, watch the gap, water the calves, keep the baby out of mischief and wet the web that was bleaching. The child next to the baby could pick up chips and set the chairs back against the wall in a straight row. Two of the little girls had curly hair, but their heads were almost shaved because it took "too much time" to comb and brush and arrange curls.

And then, Huldah said, what good could curls do? you couldn't eat or drink them, or wear them for clothing, and they never brought a cent o' money into the house, and likely enough if they were left long the children would grow up to be vain and giddy and care only for dress. No girl of hers should go tossing her curls about to attract the attention of boys.

In the meantime piles of bed and table linen increased, and bundles of stocking yarn hung from the joists, some fine, some coarse and some "back-banded" and threaded different colors.

Huldah would weave as long as the light of day lasted, and then when the milking was done the two eldest children had to sit, one on each side of her, and learn to knit. She was such an adept, that she could knit all the time and never drop a stitch and watch both girls, too, almost at the same moment.

Oh, those were wearisome, lonely evenings!

They so hated the seam-stitch and the widening, and the narrowing, and the mystery of the heel, and the bungle of splitting stitches, and they learned to look upon life as one of bare servitude.

Everything seemed so bleak and dreary.

The worms had made nests in the weeping willows and Huldah gave her husband no rest until both trees, the charm and the beauty of their otherwise desolate home, were cut down and dragged away.

Jack begged, and the girls cried and besought their mother that the trees might be spared, but her will was law.

One day, when their mother was away at a quilting-bee, Aunt Hannah Simpson, a good old maid who lived with her aged mother beyond the pine cliffs, brought the girls a basket of pink roots and rose-bushes to set out in the door-yard.

They were delighted, and put them under the window and beside the door, and they rubbed their little hands and said: "We will make it look like Woodbine Cottage, where the preacher lives, and the birds will 'light in the rose-bushes and maybe make nests close to the house and the young birds will flit about our very feet."

But the calves and pigs had free access to the doorway, and just when the pinks were swelling ready to blossom, the calves nipped them all off in one night.

The mother laughed heartily and wiped her eyes on the wrong side of her copperas-and-white check apron, as she said: "You'll find that 'cheating luck never thrives,' it's just good for you both—what good do pinks do, I'd like to know. You couldn't eat 'em, or wear 'em, or make money out of 'em."

"Oh, mother, they make everything look so pretty," said the children.

"They don't look half as nice as a good pile of new towels or tablecloths would, and they last no time at all, either. I'd rather have one good pumpkin to make into pie than all the posies that could grow on a ten-acre lot," said she, taking down from the wall a bundle of warp and counting the knots and beginning to calculate for a new web.

Two precious boy babies came to the cottage home, and the little girls' burdens and cares were heaped almost to the responsibility of motherhood. Their hands were brown and horny, and their brows contracted, their shoulders stooping and their lips began to grow curved into the wearied, dissatisfied expression that older faces too often wear.

Life was to them a treadmill—a ceaseless round of care and anxiety. If they proposed going out to search for wild flowers, their mother would make them extend their walk on to the swamp for rushes to scour the tinware, or to the quarry for a chunk of sandstone ready for scrubbing-day; or to a neighbor's for a huck-a-buck pattern for table-linen, or to borrow a seven-hundred reed and gears to match it.

Poor beauty-loving little children! how they wearied of the clacking loom, the buzzing wheel, of the whirling spools, the sharp, scary thwack of the reel and the wailing creak of the wide, warping bars! Was life all work, and worry, and drive, and bustle? Were they never to know respite from thankless toil? Was there no pleasure for them? Were the bare, bleak walls of that desolate house to shut out from them all outward sense of beauty and grace, and was never knowledge to open wide her arms to receive them? Was there no joy in this world for them?

This they asked themselves in their own broken, untought way as they lay in their well-furnished bed in the gloomy chamber overhead; asked it with low, tremulous voices, broken with sobs and tears.

But the end was nigh. ways. are not as our ways.

One day in the early spring Huldah had boiled a kettle full of thread-flax and tow—rinsed it thoroughly and hung it on the line. The thread for linen webs is always boiled in lye, or in ashes and water, instead.

"Now, while everything is handy," said she, "I'll make a barrel of soap; here's plenty of water, good ashes, kettles and all that is needed," and forthwith she rolled up her sleeves and filled a barrel full of ashes and without the help of any one moved it, by dint of hard lifting, to the place she wanted it to stand.

Poor Huldah! at midnight her husband was awakened by a strange laugh beside him. He started—and reaching over he laid his hand on her forehead. She was burning with fever. He rose and lighted a candle and looked at her face. It was purple, and her eyes, wild and bloodshot, glared at him strangely.

"Did you come for your web, sir?" said she; "I worked hard to get it out, but I couldn't quite do it. I must get to work at it now," and she rose and flung herself from the side of the bed, before her husband could prevent her.

She raved all night—scolding the children, filling quills and putting them into the shuttle, working with yarn too finely spun, tying knots, sizing, measuring yards, counting threads, turning the beams and dropping the shuttles. Sometimes she would chill, and then a fever would burn her to madness.

Suffering all the agony of intense pain, she lived three days, not recognizing a face about her, believing herself in her loom, and among strangers—not at home.

The last words she spoke were: "I told you, Jack, that the web might have been laid almost a finger's length wider, just as well as not, it would have been that much saved, you know—after this let me alone when I am—am—cal-cu-la-ti-n-g a w-e-e—" and poor Huldah gave a shuddering gasp, drew up her writhing limbs—clenched her hard, little, knotty hands—then the muscles relaxed, and—the warfare was over.

A new little life went out with her own—it was well.

And this was the end of the "splendid match." Energy enough to fire the souls of a half dozen generals had been centred in that one little swollen form—a heap of clay now, pallid, cold, dead, gone. What did she do and what did she leave behind her? Who was the happier or gladder or better for Huldah Dickey having lived?

If I wanted to, I could not stop here. I must tell the rest.

When Hannah Simpson's mother died, dear Hannah! it alone among her roses, and pinks, and asters, and with all her sweet, loving, old-girlish ways still clinging to her.

She was left lonely, and so was Jack Dickey, and so were Jack's little old-women of girls, and little, old, work-a-day, mannish boys; and one day when Sammy Dickey was sitting trying to mend his chestnut whistle that wouldn't blow right, he got out of patience and blurted right out: "Father, I don't like this house—I'm a good notion to run off—right now!"

"Where would you run to, dear?" was the question.

"W'y over to Hanner's, and be her boy. She has no boy, sir, to pick up a single chip, an' she needs me, too!"

"I couldn't spare my little Sammy," said his father, tenderly.

"Well, then, let's all go and live with Hanner, an' have her for our mother. I tell you I like 'er, and if you'd taste the pie an' dinner she makes you'd like 'er, too. She can mend trousers—oh—like—everything," and he essayed to lay one of his little, stubby legs up on his father's knee for a closer inspection of the late patch. "She never gets mad, an' she don't say 'git out, Sam,' and don't you think she says she likes little boys an' girls, and she—"

"Oh, father, do get her for our mother," said Tommy, "it'd be so nice to have good Hanner be the mother, and then we'd have such fun, you know, father, all of us together."

"Well, I'll see about it," said the father, hushing the clamor of tongues, and shoving the little, stained hands off his knees. He put on his hat and went out.

There was no romance or sentiment about sober Jack Dickey, and he went right over to Hannah's that afternoon, and told her what the children said, and then what he thought, and Hannah blushed, and cried—and—they both cried together, a gentle rain of tears.

Sammy's exhortation had been to the point, and his advice found favor and proved good.

In a fortnight Hannah was duly installed as wife and mother at the dreary, desolate cottage.

Then a change came. The neighbors pronounced it a "splendid match," likewise, and this time they were correct.

That event was the gate of gold that swung open and let the glory and excellence of this life pour in upon the old-young family. Love ruled instead of fear, caresses fell instead of blows.

A little, muddy step upon the sill, or a suggestion of apple-butter on the door-latch, never brought forth an angry word.

The flaxen heaps of bed and table linen, white as snowy drifts, were all laid aside for the four little dwarfed daughters.

Hannah said they cost a human life, and she could not bear to use them.

No one would recognize that bare home to-day. Flowers and vines and shrubbery surround it, and smooth grass-plats sweep downward beautifully from the picturesque eminence on which the newly-modelled house stands.

The cold, hard floor is carpeted, and the staring windows curtained, and climbing roses reach lovingly over the sunny walls and hang from the broad eaves.

And so, after much tribulation, came the angel of peace and folded its wings over the old-time home of Jack Dickey's Wife.

If we would build on a sure foundation in friendship, we must love our friends for their sakes rather than for our own.—CHARLOTTE BRONTE

FULL of sad strife the days wherein begins
The untutored soul to seek the "better way."
A thousand charms entice, and the old sins
So sweetly lure—'tis hard to say them nay.
Passion cries "give," but Reason says "withhold."
Ah, th' unlovely truth that must be told—
Evil the oftener wins.

Not that we love the ill for the ill's sake,
(A latent good lives in the hearts of all.)
But the besieging power of sin doth break
The weak walls of our purpose, and we fall
Unwilling captives to the might of wrong—
An armed host whose columns dense and strong
God's breath alone can shake.

And evil bears a countenance of light,
And hath a winning tongue, and though we try
And ever more do mean to live the right,
The tempter whispers, "Eat, ye shall not die,"
And all our good resolves drop in an hour,
Like precious fruit, stricken in the full flower,
By an untimely blight.

To do were easy if the deed were done
When we had willed it, but we find, alas,
The battle must be fought ere it is won,
The strong wall beaten down ere we may pass,
And while we count on victory, and dream
Of glorious deeds, swiftly away the stream
Of golden chance doth run.

The growth of Truth within our souls is slow,
But all things false must find their death at length,
Praises to Him Who giveth us to know
The measure of our weakness and His strength.
So, building not on sand, but on the Rock,
We fear nor tempest breath nor thunder shock
Of earthly ill or woe.

A TRUE WIFE.—The wife of D'Israeli, the eminent English statesman, is dead, and he has lost a companion who was a true helper in his struggles for literary and political success.

Many years ago, when he was just rising to eminence, she rode with him to the House of Commons, where he was to speak on an important question. He parted with her at the door of the House, and she rode on. As the door of the carriage closed it shut upon one of her fingers, crushing the bone.

She screamed, involuntarily, and he hurried back to inquire what was the matter. Fearing that if she told the whole truth it would weigh upon his mind and interfere with his speech, she replied, "My finger was pinched in the door," and gave him her unharmed hand to kiss. It was only after his return from a brilliant speech that he learned her self-denial and strength of will, through the greatness of her love.

CHAPTER V.

MILLICENT'S PROMOTION.

THERE is no use in denying that Mrs. Harvey felt a keen thrill of pleasure and triumph the first time that her daughter Millicent was included with George in an invitation to an evening party. Superficial people might suppose that the courage of her justice and the brightness of her self-sacrifice would have raised her above the minor pleasures and triumphs of life. Never. The great includes all beneath it. Nay, small pleasures are bigger and more important in large hearts than in small ones, only they are kept in due proportion. The quaint gargoyles of a cathedral are larger than those of a domestic chapel, yet they neither darken the painted window, nor obscure the vaulted roof.

Milly's social promotion delighted the mother twice as much as the girl. It was so strange to Milly, that it rather troubled her. To Mrs. Harvey, it seemed a delightful, easy and natural return to old ways.

"I'm sorry I have not lace to give you, my dear," were her first words on the occasion. "Your grandmother left me some beautiful pieces, but it was all sold with the other things. But fine white net is always lady-like, and it is not expensive."

"Am I to go, then?" Milly asked, with a slight flush deepening on her pale cheek.

"Of course you are, child! Why should you not go to your vicar's house, when he honors you with such a kind invitation? The vicar's lady has written the note herself, for I know her handwriting."

"I wish they had asked you instead, mother."

"Nonsense, child. What can they know of me, or expect me to be, but a poor working-woman? They pay me the highest possible compliment by acknowledging that my children are fit for their society."

"I'd rather they'd set me down as the same as you, whatever they think that is, mother," said Milly, sturdily, with a slight toss of the head, and a bewitching pout that gave a piquancy to the characteristic nose and lips.

"They'll see she's pretty at the vicarage," thought the mother, fondly, "though they'll be too well-bred to tell her so, as Hatty's set did."

"We'll take a drive to the West End," Mrs. Harvey observed, presently, "and go shopping at the establishment in Pall Mall, where my mother and I always dealt. I never see anything like the things that came from there. I would sooner wear one of their calicoes than other people's poplins. Plain things may be as cheap and humble as one chooses, or one's purse compels, but anything like luxury is not always good. Cheap necessities are respectable. Cheap finery is low."

Mrs. Harvey's heart was in a secret flutter when they started on their expedition. She had never been in that particular section of the West End since she left it in the forlorn first days of her widowhood. Life makes little distances very long sometimes.

The going back to an old long-unvisited haunt gives one a strange, sudden realization of the full weight and meaning of all that has happened between former times and the present. Among all the strange people thronging the familiar streets, none seemed so strange to Mrs. Harvey as the vision of her old self. What a weak, perplexed, despairing self it seemed! The consciousness of gained height and strength came to her, as in another sense it comes to the wanderer who returns home to find that the inaccessible mountains of his childhood are but mole-hills to his travelled eye.

The memory of herself in her widow's mourning, with hot eyes burning beneath her black veil, and heart torn with its own desperate energy and determination, seemed so strange that Mrs. Harvey caught herself recalling it as "poor thing," and pitying it as if it were a stranger!

The pair looked very insignificant customers in the great, wealthy, magnificent West End emporium. They were very careful not to buy an unnecessary yard of black silk, though to Milly her mother seemed recklessly extravagant over the fineness and quantity of the net, and the perfection of the Limerick lace gloves, of which a pair was bought at last, folded in a walnut-shell tied up with pink ribbons. But it was not silk, or net, or lace that Mrs. Harvey was buying, but the halo of old days, the long-abnegated graces and daintinesses of her early life, like jewels that had seemed lost, while only secretly taken away by some kind hand, that they may be given back re-set in the finest gold. Staid Mrs. Harvey, eagerly directing her daughter's purchases, felt oddly like the light-hearted girl who had once gone to that shop with that dear mother dead so long ago.

Then they came out of the shop and peeped about St. Martin's church, and Mrs. Harvey confided to Milly some of the glories of her wedding-day. Then they sauntered past a rich, staid-looking goldsmith's shop, the abode of one of Mrs. Harvey's old sweet-hearts, but she said nothing about that—only remarked that "Mr. Needham was still in his accustomed place." Then they went down Buckingham Street, and surveyed the Willow Walk. Their old house was sub-let in sets of chambers. Hundreds of old reminiscences came crowding back on the widow's mind. Things that had lain apparently quite forgotten, rose before her as freshly as if they had happened yesterday. And Milly saw a light come into her mother's eyes, that brought tears to hers.

"Dear child," whispered Mrs. Harvey, pressing her daughter's hand within her arm, "do not cry for me. It has all been so well and so good, and I'm so thankful to God that it is all safely over!"

And then they returned home, and set themselves to their pretty needle-work. Millicent herself was quite docile in the hands of her mother and Miss Brook. She was sure they wished to make her look nice, and that they would know better on such matters than she did. At least, if they and George were pleased, anyhow, that was all she cared about. She enjoyed their interest intensely, and thought that the party would at least give her something to tell them. She would have plenty of time to notice everything, for she did not expect to know any other guests at the vicarage, and quite realized that George's society was likely to be claimed by people who would not trouble themselves about her. Milly was in much the same mental and moral state as George had been in his early working-days—far more inclined to look on the world, than to mingle in it.

But Mrs. Harvey caught sight of her daughter's mood, and straightway exhorted her. Her etiquette was of that perennial sort which grows from Christianity.

"You have not only to be happy in your own fashion, Milly," she said; "you must help other people to be happy, and you must make your hostess's task easy, by letting her see that you are happy. That is the reason why we wish your dress to be pretty and pleasing; we owe it to our fellow-creatures to make ourselves cheerful and agreeable in their sight."

"Then, I'm sure it's a debt most people are willing to ruin themselves to pay, mother," said Milly.

"No, no, child," Mrs. Harvey answered, "the dress which ruins people is not planned out of kindness, but out of malice, not to please, but to provoke. I have known people who were always slovens among those they professed to love, take the greatest pains with their toilets when they went among rivals whom they disliked."

"Well, mamma, I can understand that," said Milly, "for, when we were in the mercer's, the other day, I could not help wishing that papa's cousins might happen to come in and see us!"

"My dear, my dear," replied Mrs. Harvey, "don't let that feeling creep into your heart. Why cannot we drink up our own cups of innocent delight, without leaving a drop to turn sour and physic others?"

Young Mrs. Webber was in and out constantly during those days. Last of all, she brought a gift from her husband for Milly.

"The only thing I ever longed to have!" the delighted girl cried, as she held it up. It was a delicate little miniature of Mrs. Harvey set in seed-pearls. "It must have been you who thought of it, Hatty."

"That it wasn't," Hatty answered, eagerly. "James is just the man to know what to give everybody. I was thinking of buying you a big gold brooch; but, says he, 'Hatty, won't it be better to give something worth twenty times more than the money it costs?'"

Miss Brook had her offering also. It was a coral necklace.

"I've worn it myself, in my time," she said, frowning. "I don't know whether you'll think it's any the worse for that. Mind, I don't say you will. It's forty year old, but it's the kind of thing that when it's fashionable, it's fashionable—and when it ain't, it's everything else."

Mr. and Mrs. Webber and the little Webbers came to the evening before the party, and Milly indulged them by dressing herself in her gala robes and giving them all ten minutes' sight of her. They might be only the "every-day wear" of thousands of women—the neat black silk, the net kerchief and ruff, and scarlet posy, the quaint necklet and the loving pendant. Little things, mere outward, transient things maybe. But the royal crown and sceptre are only outward things, too—the sovereignty is not in them. They are only symbols. Every palpable thing in this world is only a symbol. Let those who despise the symbols, beware lest they lose the things symbolized.

The two old women and the little children, the middle-aged man, and the happy brother and sister, crowded round the laughing girl and twined her this way and that, and commented and praised.

"I like the look of it, because it's a dress fit to live in—not only got up for an occasion," said Mr. Webber. "I've seen ladies with artificial flowers and false pearls sewn over their skirts, that all went smash when they sat down."

"Don't the red coral and ribbons come out beautiful, among the black and white?" remarked Hatty.

"You're like your grandmother, child," said Mrs. Harvey. "You know she was smaller than me. I've always wished I could have kept her life-size portrait, painted in just such dress as that. But God has given me a living picture instead."

"I've never seen anything prettier," said George, adding playfully; "and I'm an authority, because I've been to many parties already."

"Ah, but I won't believe your praises," Milly retorted, archly; "because you are my guardian, and you'll want to make me contented with myself to keep me from being extravagant." And with a roguish tug of his hair, she ran off to disrobe, followed by Miss Brook.

"It's all very nice, Millicent," she said; "and it's quite natural and right; but you'll find there's nothing in life that holds, except one's prayers and one's work."

CHAPTER VI.

A CASE OF CHRONIC DISEASE OF THE TONGUE, WITH HEART-COMPLICATIONS.

GEORGE Harvey was not destined to carry to his innocent evening party the light heart he had borne the night before.

He had recently published a small book of essays and dramatic conversations, and had thereby got into the hands of the reviewers. George was by no means a person to be killed by a word; indeed, the sooner such sensitive people are put out of their misery the better. He had stood his beatings like a man, laughing to read meanings assigned to him which he had never meant, amused to find himself condemned for ignorance because of the grammatical or other blunders he had depicted in characters where such were natural, humble and attentive under honest criticism, warmly thankful for judicious praise.

But on the morning of the party, chancing to go into a bookseller's shop, he took up a certain paper, and read a fresh review of his "Talks and Meditations."

"What a delightful title!" it began. "We suppose it is intended to be redolent of the learned leisure of the cathedral cloister, or the well-appointed vicarage. Some green 'prentice boy, who can get nobody to talk to him, has talked to himself, imagining that his own poor, thin individuality can evolve other characters from its own non-existent moral consciousness. Mr. G. Harvey, whoever he may be, thinks that if he had been permitted to take a hand in the creation of the world, he could have been of material assistance to the Creator. Having arrived on the scene too late for this, he feels his next best step is to declare himself in the secret of the universe, and pass judgment on the mysteries of existence in much the same spirit as a pigmy ascertaining the stature of a giant by measuring his little toe! This raw youth must have been brought up among the muffins and toast of Little Bethel tea-fights, for he is actually narrow-minded and foolish enough to believe in the antedated Scriptural dogma that 'godliness is profitable unto all things, both in the life which now is, and in that which is to come.' He thinks that 'he is the man,' and 'that wisdom will die with him,' a fault which one never finds except among religionists, and which really puts such below the notice of easy, tolerant and cultured people. In fact, it is hard to say why we do notice such a nonentity as Mr. G. Harvey. Perhaps it is because we want to revenge ourselves upon him for burdening our library-table with such crude doctrinal trash as might be in its place in the reticule of an old maid on a mission to convert servant-girls and plough-boys. We can imagine that he may be very acceptable to some people, whose narrow minds think that going to church, hearing sermons, reading 'goody' books, and acting model husbands and fathers, or rather, we ought to say, wives and mothers, are all and the best which life has to give. Such people will take a pious pleasure in Mr. Harvey's coarse story of the drunken suicide, and, of course, prospective damnation of the poor, vain, heartless beauty, for whom one would have hoped some friends might have been raised up, although she had broken her father's heart, and refused her sister's counsels. To our mind it is sad to think of her golden hair dabbled in the gutter mud, and of her felon's funeral at the cross-roads by torch-light. Mr. Harvey is full of maudlin sentiment over the old father's death-bed, and the mainly sister's loneliness and struggles.

Readers of the class we have referred to will also be deeply interested in the metaphysics of the 'conversion' of the infidel French governess, Madame Gérard. In passing, we may notice that in the letter supposed to be written by this lady, Mr. Harvey spells 'agreeable,' 'agreable.' In fact, he is altogether too pious for spelling-books, the study of which he doubtless considers a sinful waste of precious time. In the last story of all, he spells 'perhaps' 'prehaps.' In fact, he knows nothing of any sphere of life but his own, which is one which nobody else wants to know anything about. The density of his social ignorance is such that he makes a fast young college man talk about his sister's 'blonde petticoat?' We should advise Mr. Harvey to turn his attention to penny-a-lining, by which his wonderful powers of spinning out will enable him to make a comfortable living. The whole contents of this volume might have been condensed into two pages, just as they may be described in two words, 'Arrogant impertinence.'"

Perhaps it was altogether wrong and foolish in George to feel the least pang at this tirade. He should have accepted it in its proper light, as a proof that he was sufficiently important to provoke enmity.

But it was its utter injustice that galled him. If his critic wished to make sweeping statements of his arrogance, self-conceit, and harshness, was it not his bounded duty to have brought forward extracts in proof thereof? From far different reviews George had already learned that a quoted sentence may be as fair a specimen of a work as a single brick of a wall. But still, that was a move toward fairness.

How aggravating, too, was the critic's fatuous belief that his own sympathy for a sinner was a genuine and beautiful thing, while the poor author's sympathy for those whose hearts she had broken could only be described as "maudlin!"

How hard, too, that the same reviewer who professed to despise as nothing the conversion of a wild, passionate, evil Frenchwoman to godliness, gentleness, and self-restraint, should often "be enthralled" by the "plot" of books whose only human interest lay in which of two equally worthless men, some vacillating girl would choose for a husband! And how intensely cruel that a person, vaunting a sweetness of charity even above "that which is written," should, in eagerness and haste to find fault anyhow, carp at a word which was quite natural in the English-French letter where it appeared, and condemn the author's ignorance for a printer's typographical blunder!

"If I could set up my books as well as write them," said George, "the fellow would not have to say that I could not spell 'perhaps.' But this is the sort of review which no man would be small and low enough to write, if he had to disgrace his own name by signing it."

The pity was that, even in his very first indignation, George did not remember that most people would be as able as himself to detect the bad logic and petty malice of his assailant.

Then there entered a temptation. George said to himself: "I could not write a word that I do not think. I could not dishonor myself by black-leg heroes or adulterous heroines. But, perhaps, it is not my bounden duty to write everything that I do think. If they would prefer the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out, I know I could please them. I will write of good people, and their patience and brightness, and their conflicts and their heroic sacrifices, but I need not so carefully hold up that this goodness is not of the natural, but the renewed, man. People who could understand it, if I said it, will know it without my telling. What good does my plain speaking do, if it only raises a scoff? Perhaps I should only be 'wise as a serpent' if I dealt my goods so subtly, that some might receive a healing medicine in the belief that it was an intoxicating cup."

George said nothing about his review to the excited, merry little circle that gathered round him at dinner. The habits of his youth had made it an instinct with him to keep secret all unpleasantness. A wise and good reserve in many cases, yet sometimes a barrier that shuts out the open air and sunshine of common sense, for while to name some pains is to fix them, there are others that fly and vanish before plain description, like ghosts before the dawn. But once the barrier of reserve is built, it is hard to break it through, and it can be seldom perfectly done except for some new love, round which such silence has never been necessary.

Another talk with plain James Murray would have done the genius good that day.

CHAPTER VII.

A SIGN SENT FOR COMFORT.

THE vicarage stood within its own garden-walls. It was a prim red house of Queen Anne's time, with long rows of high, narrow windows. As George and Milly walked up the carriage-drive, the brilliant illumination within came glowing down upon them, through rich bits of stained glass with which the vicar's wife had enriched the stiff old casements.

There was an atmosphere of welcome in the very porch, where the door flew open before the knocker was touched, and a ready, pleasant maid stood prepared to receive the ladies' wraps, and the genial warmth went on rising till it culminated in the spacious rambling drawing-rooms, where the vicar's wife, Mrs. Devon, was waiting with a cheery word and smile for every one. Her quick eyes understood George and Milly at once. The young author she had often seen before, but the keen lady could read his whole family history in the simple little figure beside him, with its touching mixture of timid reserve and dignified composure, and its old-world etiquettes and graces hanging round it, like a soft old perfume.

"My young ladies must know you, my dear," the lady said kindly. "For they have just been reading your brother's book, and are full of questions that he must take neither the time nor the trouble to answer, but I know you'll be glad to do it—just as I am glad to talk over Mr. Devon's sermons. We women may well be thankful when we can be proud of our men-folk. The girls are in the back drawing-room. Let us go there, and find you a seat with them. Here they are. This is my daughter Grace, Miss Harvey; and this a dear Scotch cousin of ours, Miss Christian Dunbar."

The two young ladies made room for Milly on the sofa between them. They seemed very different from each other. Grace Devon moved with a bird-like quickness, and shook up her frills like a bathing sparrow. Christian Dunbar was soft and quiet. Grace Devon poured a volley of chatter into Milly's ear before Christian said a word. And then Grace fluttered off to be hospitable to some "dear darling old lady," who presently arrived, and Christian and Millicent remained alone together.

Some visitor went to the pianoforte and began to sing. She had a sweet voice, and Milly asked Miss Dunbar what was her name.

"I do not know," she answered. "I am quite a stranger here. I have just come from Scotland for a visit."

"Have you ever been in London before?" Milly inquired.

"Oh, yes," she said. "I lived in London till ten years ago, when my uncle died."

"I fancied I had heard your name before," said Milly. "Very likely you always attended St. John's."

"No," Miss Dunbar answered. "My Uncle Robert was a Scotchman and a Presbyterian, and while he lived I went with him to his chapel. I hardly went out anywhere in those days. We lived very quietly together—he, my brother and I—in the old house over the shop in Paternoster Row."

"Mr. Dunbar—Paternoster Row!" Milly exclaimed, springing up in her eagerness; "why, that was the gentleman who did so much for George when he was nobody!"

A flood of passionate tenderness rushed instantly to Christian Dunbar's quiet blue eyes.

"Oh, don't say so, till you are quite sure," she said, "or I should be so disappointed. I'd sooner get a new pleasant memory of uncle, than find he had left me another legacy!"

"I know it was a Mr. Dunbar, of Paternoster Row, who was so kind to George," Milly said, decisively. "George has always kept on mentioning him, only I don't know many particulars. George has a way of keeping in things. But I'll fetch him—I'm sure he'll tell you."

"What a difference to what I thought!" reflected eager Milly, as she threaded her way in and out among the increasing guests. "I shall like going out after this. It isn't all stupid and superficial." It was her first personal discovery of the old truth, that we need but enter any sphere, from a prince's to a beggar's, and human interests instantly enter with us.

She brought back George in triumph, breathlessly exclaiming: "It was a Mr. Dunbar of Paternoster Row who was so good to you, was it not? This lady is his niece."

George Harvey and Christian Dunbar were both a little confused at this quick, direct introduction. George slipped into the place Milly had vacated.

"I am thankful indeed to meet you," he said. "It is a pleasure to tell my gratitude to one who loved Mr. Dunbar, as I can never tell it to himself in this world. A few months after he showed me kindness, I wrote to him, and my note being never acknowledged, I called at his office, and was told he was dead. I believe I was introduced to a nephew of his. I often wished I had known his name, that I might have told him of my sorrow that Mr. Dunbar could never know how serviceable he had been to me. But I feared that even if I found him out, I might only be troublesome."

"I wish you had," said Christian, for the first time raising her eyes full to his. "My poor brother had many private trials, and often got depressed and despairing about the world and human nature. A bright gleam might have done him so much good. I have lost him, too—he has been for five years with God. I wish you had found him out, Mr. Harvey."

"I wish I had," said George, earnestly. "I know his kindly enthusiasm, 'We shall hear of you some day,' seemed to do me almost as much good as your uncle's practical advice."

"That is it," said Christian. "It is not what is said, but when it is said, that gives words half their weight; and so I think the best way to be sure of saying cheering words at the right time is to say them always!"

"Indeed, they are often wanted when the want is not apparent," George observed, rather pitifully, though there was something in the pure and peaceful atmosphere about this quiet woman that seemed to set the jar of that hateful review as far from him as the coarse broils and blasphemy that must have been at that moment going forward in many not far-distant places.

"And yet I know it is so easy to be silent, for fear of being intrusive or impertinent," Christian went smiling. "If we read a book, and are specially touched and helped likewise, and think that we need not trouble the author with a letter assuring him of what he must know well enough already? If it be possible to carry on two trains of thought at the same time, I must confess that while I have been lecturing you on your reserve, I have been wondering whether you would be at all interested in a little incident I could tell you about your own book."

"Mrs. Dunbar," said George, "I am human—very human. And humanity is vain and—inquisitive!"

"Well, then, you must know that I travelled down from Scotland by coach, because I am a bad sailor," she began. "I was the only passenger from Edinburgh to London. All the Scotch people stopped at York, and I thought I was to finish my journey by myself, for the guard told me nobody else was booked. But just before we started in the morning a lady came up, wanting to go to London. I saw that the guard looked suspiciously at her, and spoke gruffly. You know how quick those men are to detect anything wrong or queer. For luggage, she had only a little hand-bag. She was a tall, slight woman, and wore a long thick gray cloak, reaching down to the ground. But when she unfastened this, as she took her seat in the coach, I saw that her other garments were very unsuitable for a journey, for her dress was made of dark rose-colored satin, with white lace trimmings about the bodice—in fact, an evening dress, as if she had started on her journey in hottest haste. I should think she was about my own age—six or seven-and-twenty—and a very handsome woman, but with a beauty like that of burning ships or volcanic eruptions. I felt a little eerie at being shut in with her, after the sonsie good-wives with whom I had chatted and nibbled and napped during the early part of my journey."

"I should think so, indeed," said George. "It was too brave of you to travel alone."

Christian smiled. "I don't mean I was afraid," she exclaimed. "But it was awkward to have her sitting opposite me, death-mute, and staring straight before her, as if she did not see I was there. After we had driven so for an hour or two, I began to fidget about, and repair to my biscuits and sherry-flask. I offered her this and I offered her that. She shook her head, and answered, 'No, no,' without a word of thanks, but not rudely, only as if she could not be troubled. She made me think of that poor girl, Charlotte Corday, going up to Paris on her dreadful errand of assassination. At last I remembered your 'Talks and Meditations,' and I offered her that, asking if she would like to beguile the journey with it, for it was very interesting."

"She did not say a word, but took it, thinking, I fancy, that it would be a convenient refuge from further interference. She sat with it in her hand upside down for about half an hour, then detected herself, and reversed it with a start. Then she turned the leaves over and over and over, as if she were searching for something between them. Then some sentence seemed to catch her eye, and she read for a minute or two, and then again stared blankly out of the coach-window, but kept her finger in the place. Presently, she turned over the leaves to the beginning of that particular story. Then she leaned far back in the coach corner, and put up her hand so that I could not see her face. But I could see big tears falling fast. By and by, she let the book fall, and turned completely round, and hid her face in the carriage-pillows, and sobbed and moaned passionately. I tried to say something to soothe her, but she never answered nor heeded. At last she sat up again, with her face worn and wrung with agony. As we neared Lincoln, she began to draw up her cloak and make preparations for departure. 'We are scores of miles from London yet, madam,' I said, thinking she might be such an utter stranger as to mistake it. 'I know,' she answered, and picked up 'Talks and Meditations,' and handed it to me. 'Would you like to keep it for the rest of your journey?' I asked. 'I shall have another copy for myself where I am going.' 'May I?' she said. 'Then God bless you!' and as she said so the coach stopped and she got out, and took out her bag, and feed the guard. 'I thought you was going to London, mum!' said the man, roughly. 'So I was,' she replied, 'but I have changed my mind.' 'Well, you can do that, so long as you don't expect us to return money,' he said. She did not answer him, nor did she go into the coaching, but walked quietly away, with her portmanteau in one hand and your book in the other."

"Do you know which story it was that she read?" George asked.

"Yes, I spelled out the title backward, as she sat sobbing over it. It was 'The Repentance of Madame Gérard.' I cannot help thinking, Mr. Harvey, that you have saved a vessel of life from a reckless shooting of some terrible rapid."

"Then God be praised for it," said George, earnestly; "and God be praised for bringing me here to hear the story;" and before he noticed that he was confiding to this lady, never seen before, what he had not confided to one of his familiar household, he had told her the whole history of the bitter review, and of the doubt and despair it had raised within him.

"But they were only for a moment," answered Christian Dunbar; "one feels thus for a moment. But one so brave as you would never long suffer from any enmity but God's."

"How do you know that I am brave?" George asked, sadly.

"Because you ought to be," she replied, "and as you are a Christian man, God Himself will make you all you ought to be."

"I should like you to know my mother," said George. "She would love you."

"I will call upon her," Christian promised, frankly; "is she anything like that dear, frisky, little kitten of a sister who was talking to me just now?"

"No, my mother is tall, and grave and sedate," George answered. "She has looked spiritual giants in the face and conquered them, and as the old tradition runs, has gathered their defeated strength into her own."

"And now let us go and look for Miss Harvey," said Christian, rising. She had that sweet, strange, womanly instinct of something in the atmosphere that made her withdraw into herself. A fancy-free maiden will not look at once into the depths of a man's heart, lest it be open to her only unguardedly. She will turn away, that he may solemnly lead her back again. She will not usurp her queendom. The crown seems nothing to her, till consecrated in the coronation.

Milly had left Christian and George together and wandered away. She went and stood near the piano, and listened to the singing. Her delight at the pleasure she had found for George made her feel quite at home. A young gentleman brought a chair to her, and invited her to sit down. She did so, and then he asked her if she played or sang. She said no, neither. Then he said, he was sure she drew, and he smiled mischievously as he said it. Milly admitted it, and wondered how he guessed. And then they began to talk about pictures, and went round the rooms to study the engravings on the wall.

Reader, reader, do not laugh. There have been men—not poets or sentimentalists—but hard-headed, famous men of science—who in their youth have loved for years without a word. Little prim Milly, whom nobody had ever yet flirted with, had won such a love as this! This youth, whom she had never wittingly seen before, whose very name she did not then know—for Milly naively forgot all about an introduction—had for months watched her going to and fro with her pattern portfolio. He knew her name, and who she was.

She had a very pleasant time of it. The good old vicar, watching her dark eyes flashing in her excitement, said to his wife, "And so that's young Harvey's sister. We must look after all that family. There's more than genius in them. Genius may grow wild anywhere, but they are surely the stuff that makes its natural soil. I never saw young Maxwell so gallant before. Well, well, he is a good lad, and if he were my own son, I should think he might do worse than try to find out what sort of heart goes with that bright girl-face."

"Oh, George," said Milly, clinging to his arm, as they turned from the vicarage homeward through the dark lanes. "If parties are often like this, they are worth going to!"

And George thought so too.

They found Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook awaiting them by the parlor fire. They both sat down and opened their budget of news. And actually before he went to bed, George had told them all about his review, and laughed over it! A secret drawer that has once been opened is never so stiff again, but still one does not show everything that is in it, and George did not then tell the story Miss Dunbar had told him. One maintains a sweet, curious feeling of confidence with another, by keeping something that one talks over with nobody else.

"Well, my son," observed Mrs. Harvey, "it is well to remember, especially among so much praise as you do get, that 'the friendship of the world is enmity with God.'"

"Miss Dunbar used almost those same words, mother," he said.

But Miss Brook punched the fire severely.

"Why can't people keep their tongues off what they can't understand, and won't try to," said she. "If a cat criticised a dog, what would her criticism be worth? If I was George, next time I wrote a book, I'd put on the title-page, that 'no one need trouble himself to review it, that didn't believe in God, read the Bible, live with one wife and pay his debts.' Let wicked infidels get their living by reviewing wicked infidel books—and a precious poor living they'd get."

"Oh, let them do as they like!" said George.

CHAPTER VIII.

GEORGE'S GIFT FROM THE LORD.

CHRISTIAN DUNBAR paid her promised visit to Mrs. Harvey. She did not come very soon, and she brought Grace Devon with her, and they arrived in the early afternoon, and found nobody at home but Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook.

George was particularly anxious to hear every detail of that visit, and he heard all there was to hear, but Grace Devon had evidently talked a great deal more than Christian Dunbar.

And so friendly relations were established between the stately old vicarage and the Harveys' quaint green cottage. The worst of it was, Christian Dunbar was only staying with the Devons for three months.

"There does not seem to be half enough time in life," George observed, one day, apropos of nothing in particular. "So much has to be forced on, and may be spoiled in the forcing. If one could only take a little more time!"

"When an Indian chief heard some one make that remark," said Miss Brook, "he answered, 'I suppose you have all there is.'"

Somehow, at that time, there crept into the Harveys' household conversation a great many discussions about marriage. About the necessary means for marriage—about the proper time for marriage—about the duties and rights of lovers in sundry and divers positions. Miss Brook was a great deal more certain on all these points than Mrs. Harvey, and maintained her right so to be.

"Married people ar'n't half such good advisers in love affairs as single ones," she asserted. "They've muddled their minds with their own mistakes, and they go on giving you the particular good advice they wanted themselves, instead of what you want. Just as when you have the toothache, some good souls think it could do you no harm to take their pet gout-specific."

Therefore Miss Brook uttered her axioms like an authority.

"The necessary means for marriage are a sound head-piece and a strong right hand," she said.

"But it is generally fools who think themselves wise," put in Milly; "and the surest sign of one's sanity is to doubt it a little."

"Hold your tongue, child," Miss Brook retorted. "And the proper time for marriage is when one meets the proper person."

"Always provided he or she is equally agreeable, I presume," said Milly, wickedly.

"But when a poor man feels that nothing is too good for the woman he loves, it seems selfish for him to ask her to share his poverty and struggles," observed George.

"If she loves him, she's longing to do it," answered Miss Brook; "and isn't it selfish of him to balk her wishes for the sake of his own stuck-up pride?"

The fact was, George had not taken long to discover that life could never be what it had been before he had seen Christian Dunbar. Her coming had been like a burst of sunshine over a landscape—river and rock and tree are the same, but, oh, how different!

Perhaps one of her greatest charms for him was that she drew him entirely out of himself—that he could talk to her with a freedom with which he had not hitherto communed even with his own soul.

With all George's fear of selfishness, it must be admitted that he felt it to be a happy day when he heard that Christian Dunbar had a bare five hundred pounds for her whole portion, and that like the sensible woman that she was, she intended to leave it untouched, and to earn her own living as a teacher. She was not an accomplished woman: she neither painted, played, nor sang, but she was a good writer and arithmetician, and had persuaded her brother to teach her Latin, as a diversion during one of the melancholy fits from which he had suffered. She did not aim to do what she could not, but diligently sought to find what she could, and so engaged herself at a moderate salary, in "a preparatory school for young gentlemen."

It was within three days of her departure, when she and George met in an old church-yard, not far from both their abodes. Never mind how they happened to meet. Perhaps Christian had said something about passing through that church-yard on her way somewhere. And perhaps, on the strength of those words, George had waited there two or three hours. How could Christian know he would be there? And yet if she did not, why did she walk so slowly, and why did her heart beat so fast?

She came along under the new-budded trees, and George sprang out from a cross avenue, and took her hand, and drew it through his arm. He never knew he did not shake hands formally, and Christian did not notice the omission at the moment, but remembered it distinctly afterward.

What is the use of repeating what George said? It will sound stilted and unnatural to the reader who has not said it himself, and he who has said it knows all about it without hearing it over again! What did Christian say? Well, Christian was cooler than George; which is not uncommon, for while we poor men are in agonies of suspense, the dear ladies know their own answer, and either that it makes all right, or else that they do not care at all.

And then there came a girl-and-boy feeling into two glad hearts, and without heeding it, they went walking together hand-in-hand!

Let one fact reveal the love and unity of the Harvey household. George went straight home to his mother and sister, and told them of his engagement, and knew that the greatest pang of the telling lay with himself, and that they rejoiced wholly for his sake. He was the man of the house, and one who had been enabled to give the family a distinction that it would not have without him, but they were not women to make their gratitude a blight, and their love a fetter. It might be that their lives helped them to such right-mindedness. They were no parasite women, trailing forlornly unless propped. They had learned to respect and trust themselves, and to know that life had plenty of flowers and fruit within their own reach. Beyond such tokens of brotherly love as he would continue to give, Milly had neither taken nor expected anything from her brother. She had been trained to feel it no wrong, but one of her noblest rights, to be independent. And when more women shall have sacred interests of their own, the will and the power to create their own spheres, and to clothe their own lives with appropriate beauties and duties, then surely the antagonism of mothers and sisters-in-law will cease, and the man without female relations be no longer justly regarded as the most eligible lover! Oh, if some of those who fear that the bloom of womanhood is so evanescent that it will perish in the first brush with the realities of God's world of work, would but reflect how it already turns to driest and bitterest dust in the stagnant atmosphere of helpless spite and repining.

George and Christian were not married till the first anniversary of their engagement. Christian went to her school, and earned enough to cover the cost of her marriage outfit, without breaking the little fortune that was her uncle's legacy. She made her outfit nearly all herself—all except what Milly and Grace Devon and Mrs. Webber begged from her. There was not a hireling seam in it. Womanly love and hope, friendliness and good wishes, were in every stitch.

But Christian came back to the vicarage to spend the last two months of her maiden life. She wanted to have her rightful share in the building of the pretty home-nest that George had found midway between her Uncle Devon's house and his mother's cottage. Mrs. Harvey and Milly were to remain just as they were. Perhaps, by and by, they might receive another boarder as well as Mrs. Brook, but it was no matter of stringent necessity. For Milly's little income went on regularly increasing, so that she was even inclined to pout and be a little affronted that George should be so determined still to set aside a certain allowance for his mother!

George and Christian lived in a fairy tale for those two months. They were privileged now to take long sweet lonely walks. Sweet and lonely—though they were often through noisy crowded streets. For Christian loved to be taken among the scenes of her lover's stern boyhood, and George loved to take her there. He took her over the old printing-office, and gave half-a-crown to a little red-haired lad who was sitting in his former place. He took her to the wretched little terrace where James Murray had lodged, and where he had gone to clean the boots. He showed her the boiled-beef shop. He made an effort to trace Mr. Rollo, but that failed.

"The mystery is," said George, "that as I revive the old associations, I cannot revive the old self that did not know you! I remember how I studied the sizes of penny rolls, but I cannot remember how my heart felt when it was empty. I think you must have been always there, shut up, till that night when you opened your shrine, and let in the sunshine."

Christian begged for the little manuscript book that had been bought with so much self-denial. In long years after George had occasion to ask to look at it, when he discovered that his wife kept it in an antique oak dressing-case, among her jewelry and lace.

The wedding-day came at last. Of course, Christian was married from the vicarage, and Grace Devon had the arrangement of the wedding presents. Conspicuous among the dainty little bits of china and silver, stood an elaborately-carved bread-plate and butter-dish stand, which had arrived with a fancy card announcing them as "small tokens of the respect and love of James Murray, and Sarah his wife, with all good wishes."

The curate read the marriage service, because the vicar gave away his niece. Grace and Milly, and little Ellen Webber, were the bridesmaids. Christian insisted on Ellen Webber, because she wished to associate Hatty with the immediate marriage group. Christian found a great share of affection to spare for beautiful Hatty.

"It is such a pleasure to look at her," she said, "and I am sure it takes a great deal of goodness to keep beauty beautiful."

Richard Webber, our old friend "Dick," now growing a tall and very interesting lad, acted "best man." The whole made a group thoroughly typical of the best side of English life—of that free and yet conservative state of society, which binds such different men as the stately old vicar, and the homely tradesman, Mr. Webber, in bonds of mutual respect and amity, and yet leaves them far apart, where each can be happier, better and more useful than either could be in any false and affected "equality."

Mrs. Harvey shed two or three tears of thankful joy to see how wonderfully God had supplied the particular want of her son's position by leading him to a bride, in breeding and character every inch a lady, and yet with the simple ways and tastes, that would make her happy and useful in the household exigencies of "a poor gentleman."

"God bless you, George," she said, when the ceremony was over, "and be you thankful to Him that He has given you a wife whom He Himself loves better than you can."

"I say, Aunt Milly," said Dick Webber, as they drove back to the vicarage; "did you see that Mr. Maxwell peeping round the nearest pillar behind us, and he had on a rose-colored neck-tie, like your ribbons?"

But when George and Christian were seated together in the coach that was to carry them away for a fortnight among the Surrey hills, Christian suddenly turned to George and sighed: "I wonder what has become of that poor thing who travelled up from York with me scarcely more than a year ago?"

"What makes you think of her now?" asked George. "I don't know," Christian answered; "unless it is because I am so happy, and she was so sad."

REMARKABLE STRUCTURES OF THE ANCIENT AMERICANS.

IN a review of the work on "Ancient America," by John D. Baldwin, the London Athenæum says: Not many, perhaps, of those who habitually speak of the "Old and New Worlds" as a geographical expression, fully realize the idea of a dual world of civilization and progress; yet it is certain that, side by side with that of Egypt and Assyria, there grew up in America another culture, equal, at one time, in art, power and extent, and although, in so far as our existing evidence enables us to judge, unconnected, yet greatly resembling in system that on which our own civilization has been established; and were it not that these two cultures unfortunately came in contact during the climax of Spanish ecclesiastical bigotry and intolerance, the so-called new world might have boasted of an ancient history corresponding to our own. So completely, however, has the law of the survival of the strongest asserted itself under the influence of the monkish exponents of Christianity—so effectually did they succeed in snuffing out all trace of art and culture amongst the people whom they had conquered—that writers may now be found who, in the face of the evidence afforded by ruined cities, palaces, aqueducts and paved roads, deny the claim of the American continent to any ancient civilization higher than what might have been derived from the wild Indians, such as the Iroquois and the Algonquins, whom the Pilgrim Fathers encountered in the seventeenth century. Such views as these receive no support from Mr. Baldwin. The relics of ancient American civilization are to be found in these separate but nearly contiguous areas situated near the point of junction of the two continents.

Commencing with the northernmost of these divisions, commonly known as the region of the mound builders, we find in the neighborhood of the lakes, at the northern apex of the triangular region above mentioned, in Michigan, Iowa, Missouri, and particularly in Wisconsin, a tract of country characterized by the presence of large mounds designed in the form of animals, birds, serpents or men, in huge relieves. Next to this we have a district of which the State of Ohio may be regarded as the nucleus, but which occupied the whole valley of the Ohio and its tributaries, extending into Western Virginia, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri. The special characteristics of this area consist of pyramidal mounds, usually from six to thirty feet high, but rising in some cases to sixty and ninety feet; they were generally square or rectangular, and were surrounded by winding staircases on the outside. This district is also remarkable for lines of entrenchment, from five to thirty feet high, inclosing usually from one to thirty acres, but extending at times to one hundred, two hundred and even four hundred acres. They frequently consist of combinations of square and circular figures, the accuracy and perfection of which prove, as Messrs. Squier and Davis have remarked, that the builders possessed some standard of measurement, and had the means of determining angles. There are no less than ten thousand of these mounds and fifteen thousand inclosures in Ohio alone. Lower down in the valley of the Mississippi, and along the fertile plains bordering the Gulf of Mexico, and to the westward over the Rio Grande, the inclosures are smaller and less numerous, and the mounds, though of the same character and more plentiful, are lower, and consist of truncated pyramids and pyramidal platforms. Broad terraces, elevated passages, aguadas or artificial ponds, and the use of sun-dried bricks, are peculiar to this region, the remains of which approach more closely in character to those of Central America than the ruins to the northward. Taken as a whole, the mound builders appear to have been inferior in culture to their Central American and Peruvian neighbors. They were an agricultural people; yet they made use of spun cloth, their pottery was in some cases almost equal to that of Peru, and there are grounds for supposing that they had a knowledge of astronomy. Their tools and other relics were composed of copper, silver, porphyry, greenstone and obsidian. Metallurgy, in the proper sense of the term, does not appear to have been introduced amongst them, for their copper tools were beaten into form, and contained in some cases blotches of silver just as it is found in the matrix in the pure state on the shore of Lake Superior, where they worked it in open cuttings from the surface.

Turning to Mexico and Central America, we find here also the antiquities of this central region distributed in three distinct areas. In Chiapa, Tabasco, Oaxaca, Yucatan, Honduras, Tehuantepec and Guatemala, the ruins consist of stone-built cities of great extent, palaces richly ornamented, and standing upon raised platforms similar to those found in the lower portion of the Mississippi valley, in all probability, served the same purpose. Most of these ruined cities are thickly overgrown with trees; and it is known that other cities lie buried in the forest districts, which have been as yet but little explored. More is known respecting the Mexican area from its having been the centre of Aztec civilization at the time of the conquest; and though some doubt has been thrown upon the accounts of the City of Mexico given by the Spaniards, it is certain that a comparatively high state of civilization, although inferior to that of Central America, existed in the valley of Mexico at that time. Their city had considerable architectural pretensions, and their temple was a rectangular terraced pyramid, ascending by a flight of steps on the outside, like the pyramids of the mound builders; but they did not possess the phonetic alphabet of the Central Americans, and their records consisted of picture writings.

The third sub-division of this central area is found in New Mexico and Arizona amongst the Pueblo Indians, the chief characteristic of whose culture consists in their residence in large communal buildings, each of which contains an entire town or village of small rooms ranged in three or four stories above each other, forming a huge rectangular structure not altogether unlike some of the great edifices in the ruins of Central America, such as the palace of Palenque or the Casa del Gobernado at Uxmal, but yet differing from them both in character and purpose. These buildings were in use at the time of the conquest, and are still inhabited in some places. The Pueblos are vastly superior in culture to the wild tribes of Indians on the north, with whom they are constantly at war.

The Peruvian ruins consist of cities, palaces, fortresses, aqueducts, one of which is four hundred and fifty miles long, and great paved roads, admirably constructed throughout the whole length of the empire, which latter were originated during the earlier civilization, and restored by the Incas. Their work was admirably done; but it is everywhere seen that their masonry, although sometimes ornamented, was generally plain and massive in style. They had no inscriptions, though it is thought that at the time of the conquest they possessed the art of writing in hieroglyphics. Their temples were not high truncated pyramids, and their great edifices were not erected upon terraces, as in Central America; but the doors in the older buildings around Lake Titicaca had the peculiarity of being narrower at the top, like some of the pre-historic structures of Europe. Their tools were of bronze; but it has been conjectured that, although iron was unknown in the times of the Incas, it may have been employed in the earlier times, as that ore is abundant in Peru, and some of the existing languages, if not all, have names for the metal. In their knowledge of astronomy, they appear to have been inferior to the Central Americans.

The antiquity of the mound builders is established by the growth of forest surmounting their remains. In the debris covering the ancient copper mines of Lake Superior, trees showing three hundred and ninety-five rings of annual growth have been found growing; and Sir Charles Lyell counted eight hundred rings in the trunk of a tree growing on one of the mounds at Marietta. It is evident also, in both cases, that several generations of trees have preceded those now standing in the soil. In the valley of the Mississippi, four terraces are usually seen, marking four distinct eras of subsidence since the river began to flow. The ancient works, mounds and enclosures are found on all these terraces, except the fourth or lowest; showing that this last terrace, which probably marks the longest period of any, was formed since the works were erected. Some of the mounds have also been destroyed by streams that have since receded more than half a mile, and which, at present, could not reach them under any circumstances. The antiquity of the latest relics of the mound builders is further confirmed by the state of decay in which all the skeletons of these people are found. Although the soil is not unfavorable to their preservation, only one or two skulls have been found in a condition to be restored. In Central America, similar evidence of great antiquity is afforded by the growth of timber, and by the fact that everything perishable has disappeared, except the lintels of some of the doors of the more modern structures of Yucatan.

In Peru, Mr. James Wilson found, at various points on the coast near Quito, ancient pottery and other manufactured articles finely wrought, and some of them of gold, beneath a marine deposit of six feet, having trees growing on the surface which were older than the Spanish invasion; which proves that this land must have been submerged beneath the ocean, and again elevated to its former position since these relics were deposited.

WHEN I AM DEAD.

BY ELLA WHEELER.

WHEN I am dead, if some chastened one,
Seeing the item, or hearing it said
That my play is over, and my part done,
And I lie asleep in my narrow bed—
If I could know that some soul would say,
Speaking aloud, or silently,
"In the heat and burden of the day
She gave a refreshing draught to me."

Or, "When I was lying nigh unto death,
She nursed me to life and to strength again;
And when I labored and struggled for breath
She soothed and quieted down my pain."

Or, "When I was groping in grief and doubt,
Lost and turned from the light o' the day,
Her hand reached me and helped me out,
And led me up to the better way."

Or, "When I was hated and shunned by all,
Bowing under my sin and shame,
She, once, in passing me by, let fall
Words of pity and hope, that came Into my heart like a blessed calm
Over the waves of a stormy sea;
Words of comfort, like oil and balm,
She spoke, and the desert blossomed for me."

Better by far than a marble tomb,
Than a monument towering over my head,
(What shall I care, in my quiet room,
For head-board or foot-board, when I am dead,)
Better than glory, or honors, or fame,
(Though I am striving for those to-day,)
To know that some heart will cherish my name,
And think of me kindly, with blessings away.

A MAN who will disinherit his wife if she marries again, bears her the same kind of love that the Turk bears toward the women of his harem, and not the love which a free, true man bears toward a free, true woman. If he finds happiness in a married life, what a cruel brute that he should deliberately provide that when he dies, and his widow, recalling the happy days of her married life, should consent to marry again, she shall be deprived of the fortune which he leaves her! Such men were married in body, but never in soul.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPESEEWAY POTTS.

No. III.

I LIKE Ida's plan of making sheets.

Instead of the old over-and-over whip-stitch, she overlaps the two edges and sews them up on the machine.

Two seams close to the selvages are better than one. Some may object and say the seam will draw, but any seam in new muslin inclines to draw the first few washings. Let them be gently but firmly stretched when washed and hung upon the line, and, when shaken ready for the ironing-table the seams should be stretched again.

Her way saves a great deal of time.

The hem on the upper end of sheets should be made wider than the other to distinguish them, for surely no one would care about having the same snowy muslin about his face one night that had done good service for his own or some other one's feet the night previous.

Granny has been making us some new collars. Since Deacon Skiles is married I've taken to dressing up more than usual. I'm bound that folks shan't say of me:

"She let concealment, like a worm i' the bud, Feed on her damask cheek."

I have too much grit for that. No sorrow will feed on my cheek while it is warm with the mingled blood of the Broadys and the Snobseas.

I let Granny make the collars to suit herself—some were broad, some narrow and some notched. One made of eluiny lace to wear on special occasions was very pretty.

Every woman knows how difficult it is to sew lace, and keep the thread from slipping out of the needle. It will work out. I observed that every time granny threaded her needle she tied the thread in the eye—just as women do when they give a little girl a needle and thread and something to sew at to keep her out of mischief. The plan will be found good.

Had a little tiff with one of my neighbors this morning! Everybody calls me a good Baptist sister, and here I forget and have ill-natured spells often, and that's not what would be expected of a woman professing godliness. It came about in this way.

Some of my house-plants froze last night, and it nearly broke my heart for a little while. It seemed so hard to go right on and cook breakfast in a worldly way—broil steak, bake potatoes and have the aroma of coffee filling the kitchen, and the loaf lying on the white cloth, and the bread-knife beside it—all as if nothing had happened, when only a dozen steps away stood my darlings, cold and stiff in death.

A jewelled Madam Le Moine, with dazzling flowers shooting up like red flames through the mass of green, touched me sorest. Only the night before, the last thing before I went to bed I stood with bared feet and hanging hair beside her in the treacherous white moonlight, and tenderly gathered her crowned head in my softest touch and kissed her, saying: "Oh, you old darling! you're too beautiful!"

Yes, she was too beautiful for the fate that so cruelly awaited her.

A rose geranium, three years old, that stood beside her, was bristling like a pointed bayonet. It looked as though it meant "war to the knife."

Just after breakfast my neighbor, Uriah, came in. I kept my back toward him and tried to talk as usual. At last he caught a glimpse of my face and blurted right out: "Been a cryin'? What's the fraction now?"

"Why my finest plants froze—last night—and I—I," and here I leaned my arm and my head on the table and cried aloud.

"Why you old goose you! would you howl over a few paltry, worthless weeds that have already lived past the season of green things? You astonished at you, Pipesey Potts," and he came up and laid his big hand on my head as gently as its avoirdupois weight would allow.

Touched? I guess I was! All the blood of the Broadys was boiling.

"Go 'way, you old virago!" said I, starting up, "I only know of one green thing living past its time, and that's you. You had no right to ask me what was the matter; you're impertinent, calling me a goose, when I'm a member in good standing in the reg'lar Baptist church. If you'd had one spark-o' kindness about you, you would have said you were sorry for me, and pitied me. That would have cost you nothing and would have done me good. I don't think you have much religion; old meanness!"

I looked up at my neighbor supposing that he would be standing there almost annihilated.

What was my surprise to see him doubling over with his hands resting on his knees, quite convulsed with laughter.

I stared at him as cold as granite.

"I declare, Pip," said he, "it does you good to get angry. I wish old Elder Nutt over at Bloody Run Church could see you with your bright eyes and red cheeks and scarlet lips, you'd make a conquest, sure. Let me see! you're five feet seven, ha, ha, ha! well I declare if you didn't look like six feet seven!"

Would you believe it? His laugh was so full of magnetism that I got to laughing, too. Uriah is such a droll fellow one has to laugh at him.

After it was all over and he had wiped his eyes, he said: "One thing, Pipesey, I don't just know what you meant when you said I hadn't much religion. What did you mean by that?"

"I can soon tell you what I meant. I had been thinking all day yesterday that what we most need in our everyday life is more religion.

"Not that kind that shows itself in going to church regularly, and wearing our Sunday clothes, and sitting up straight in our pews, and singing hymns, and dropping something into the contribution-box, and discussing regeneration and sanctification with long faces—not that kind.

"We want a religion that comes right into the heart of the family, and keeps the father from saying spiteful things if dinner is late, or his coat or boots have been moved, or if the pigs get into the grain-field, or if a neighbor's cattle throw his fences—a religion that keeps the wife from fretting over unkind words, or grease spots, or tattle, or a cross baby. We want a religion that will make us speak kind words and think kind thoughts, and cherish charity instead of malice—a religion that will make us withhold unloving words, and give pity and gentle and generous words instead."

"Yes, yes; well, that's all right," said Uriah, and after telling me how to wrap up the pots and plunge the frozen plants into cold water, and partially save them, he left me with a laugh, that sounded down the path like the gurgle of a jug.

While I sit writing I hear the girls talking in the kitchen. How can I write with two such cheery voices filling all the space about me? And this is what they are saying:

"How do you feel, Dido, when you are abroad, and people are careless about introducing you to their families and friends?"

"Oh, it is a miserable feeling! I don't know very well how to approach any one under such circumstances. If I talk to them, I'm afraid they'll think I'm bold or ill-bred."

"Now, that time we were at Mr. Osgood's, you remember Fanny didn't introduce us to any one, not even her mother or those girls from the city; and I did so wish to talk to that lady from Newark, who sketched so prettily; but I felt as if I had no right to. Just because a girl lives away off in the country, it is no reason she shouldn't be polite, and try to cultivate habits that will stamp her as well-bred."

"How nice it was for Susie Harbison to introduce us to all her family when we were there—her father and mother, and the old-fashioned grandpa, and all the children shook hands in a way that made us feel as though they were real glad to see us. All those chubby boys stepped up and extended their fat, little palms in such a cordial way, you remember."

"Oh, Susie's a darling!"

"Many a girl would have kept her imbecile sister out of sight, tucked away in some lonely room or garret, but Susie marshalled her in, and said: 'Ida, this is my poor sister, Sarah; poor thing sees none of the joy in life that we do; shake hands, Sarah,' and the dull blue eyes gleamed out a faint flash from the clouded mind as she extended her hand. That just made me love Susie."

"Yes, and when her uncle came in at night from his work on the railroad, all grimy and black, in his old, rough, patched, clothes, and Judge S— was there, on his way to Washington, Susie introduced Uncle Jack as kindly as though he had been a peer, and the tall judge shook hands so cordially with Uncle Jacky."

"Well, Susie has a way of putting people on a level about her. Now, many a girl would have winked, and blinked, and had her roughly-clad, toil-stained uncle sneak in at the back-door, and then stay in the kitchen, and feel as though he wasn't a man among men, but a something to be kept out of sight, for fear of disgrace. How he enjoyed the judge's conversation; and when he was reading from Shakspeare, it seemed to me that Uncle Jack's face became glorified. It was a treat to him, and will do him good as long as he lives. I'm like Susie, one person is just as good as another, only one may have lacked opportunity for development, that's all."

I was pleased with this conversation, and was glad that the girls saw so clearly. Just then the fire was low, and I ran over to the wood-house for an armful of wood. Just outside of the house stood father, the deacon, tugging away at a big lump of ice in the swill-barrel.

"Bad business, that," said I, resting my hands on my sides.

"Not half so bad as it might 'a' been," was the reply, as he lifted the cake of ice out by a stout stick that had frozen up in the swill. "Many an' many a bar'l has busted for me that wouldn't if this knowledge had only come to me sooner," said he. "You see, when this cold snap came on suddenly, I thought of the swill-bar'l away in the night, and I said, 'Well, it can't be helped now.' It happened, however, that the stick-I stir with was left poked down in the swill, and that was all that saved it. A bar'l, or a tub, or a pail, may freeze up solid, and if a stick has been put down in the water, the vessel can't bust. But it took me a good while to find it out—never knew it till last winter; lived seventy years before I knew it," and his eyes twinkled knowingly.

"Why, that's on the same plan," said I, "of putting a spoon in a glass jar when you are canning fruit; if you do that the jar won't break."

"Same philosophy, exactly," said he, as he gave the ball of ice a kick, and sent it rolling off down the hill.

The professor came up and stayed until bedtime last night. Ida was busy making my new scrap-book; Lily was getting her lessons and making selections for Ida; the deacon was reading the Baptist Banner; granny was knitting, and I had just ripped my old last winter's calash apart, preparatory to turning and making it over.

There is no need of me getting a new calash every winter—it is useless. I always make them over two or three times, then dye them a good, serviceable black, and put them in the missionary-box. Some poor preacher's wife or mother-in-law may be glad to get them.

I never forget my duty to the poor, especially those of the household of faith.

When the professor came, I laid my work aside, it required too much of close calculating for me to work and visit at the same time.

I brought out the basket of darnings. Among other things in it was a pair of new socks, badly eaten by moths—the poor student who owned them had never seen a moth, and wasn't to blame. The socks were brand new, and I could not think of throwing them in the fire. I had often darned moth-eaten garments before, and though it did seem quite impossible, I went about the job in my own way. Woolen yarn, no matter how fine and even, is too rough to mend this kind of a hole, because it will draw the work. I stretched the socks to their right size, by slipping my Baptist hymn-book under the holes, and then carefully darned, back and forth, up and down the leg, with a small needle and coarse silk thread. By this means my work was not disarranged, as it would have been by a darning needle and woollen yarn. In half an hour I had made the socks quite as good as new. One place in the leg was past mending, and I laid a fine piece of new flannel on the inside and darned over it.

Sometimes merchants almost give away shawls, and rubias, and hose that are damaged by moths. I wouldn't want to put any woman up to mischief—I would only say if any of you ever have such chances, don't mind a few moth holes.

Get some silk as near the color of the article as you can, and with a little ingenuity you can make the damaged things quite as good as new. If it is a rubia, catch it together tightly with the silk thread; if a shawl, darn it, dampen the place, press it with a warm iron and then raise the nap on it with a clothes brush. Handle carefully and as little as possible until after it is mended.

Somehow I like to make possibilities and realities out of improbabilities.

I found such a good pair of men's hose in an old wayside log cabin, one pretty day last October, when Ida and I were out in the woods after moss.

We had wandered, lured on and on by the beautiful trees, and brooks, and dells; and autumn leaves, and glorious views of perfect scenery, until the sun began to cast long slanting rays, and, still fresh with rapture, we found ourselves at least four miles from home.

Did we find moss? Why, bless your bright eyes, we almost waded in mosses of all kinds! We snuck to our catches in the plush that to me was finer than the royalist silk-velvet plush.

I knelt on it, and reclined on it, and laid my warm face among its cool pillows, fragrant with the most delicious woody odor. I washed it with the palms of my hands, reverently, lovingly, prayerfully, enthusiastically, gratefully. And, in pity for the pale, stiff faces in stifed city homes—faces that would give over such magnificence lying in wasteful splendour in the still, wild woods of Ohio—with a thought of those warming my heart, I touched it sorrowfully.

Oh, all the summers and winters does that bank of thick moss lie there greenly! how it would feast such yearning eyes!

That broken gash in the wildwood, the tinkling brook, the little cabin, the cave in the hillside covered by vines, the rich garden spot, the spring in the mossy bank, the pines, the winding road, the dimpling waters of the creek, and the curving sweep of the railroad, make a finished picture that is before me every time I look up and see my fresh green moss-landscape.

What pretty tales it tells me, this bleak February day, of the budding and the blossoming that the summers bring to the delectable spot from whence I bore this pretty bit of good-cheer.

I never did like the winters with their palls of cruel white snow, hiding away all the beauty that makes me so glad, but I have learned how to pluck out the sharpest stings by bringing a bit of the beauty of summer indoors. It is my amulet.

Our travelling basket, big enough for a John-Rogers-family, we filled with sheets of rare mosses, pressed down in as a woman would store away newly-made puffy comforts, filled a big kitchen apron as full as it would hold, two large newspapers, and then I tied up a few choice things in my bandanna.

We went into the deserted cabin to look for strings to tie our bundles, and during the search I found the aforesaid hose and called Ida in. I said: "Sissy, look at those socks; brand-new, never been washed more than once; but 'he' put them right on and never took 'em off until they were worn out." See how he thrust his uncouth ill-mannered toes right through 'em.

"A careful wife would have made this pair and another to have lasted him all winter.

"She has just been 'lasy' and 'trifling,' I'll warrant, though her bustle and her beloved pannier were just right—faultless—and she would as soon have thought of being out of breadstuffs as 'whitenin' for her face."

We had a great deal of fun going home, laden with our big bundles of moss. We had to sit down often and rest, and it was late bed-time when we arrived at home. We smuggled our things into the cellar from the outside door, for fear the deacon would scold us. He didn't know where we were, for we had told Lily not to tell. Supper had been waiting an hour, or more, and the deacon had said he wouldn't eat a morsel of supper until we came, if it was midnight.

When he asked where we had been, I laughed and said: "Oh, you might know where—everybody is out electioneering now-a-days."

Lily was a little vexed, she said: "Samuel Weller liked widders, but Deacon Ports liked the wimmins."

That is a weakness in the men of our family, they'd rather stick around where we are, than to be with anybody else. They like our talk and stories better than men's talk.

I like to go to bed at nine o'clock, but often have to hint and hint, and then at eleven or twelve o'clock my hints grow more decisive, and I say: "Gentleman, you can be relieved," or, "Well, I bid you good-night," or, "You are well enough acquainted, sirs, that we do not need to light you to bed." This last hint will unbutton a vest, or loosen a cravat, but often I have to say to Bub! "Young man! will you—go—to—bed?"

Oh, mothers and wives and sisters, this influence over "the boys" is no trifling thing! If the son or the brother with such loving confidence leans upon and clings to you, and listens to your lightest words, and loves your society, do you see how sacred is your influence? How watchful you need to be of every word you say, and every deed you do, how conscientious and how scrupulously honest.

Bub always watched me with lynx eyes. He has kept me in a straight jacket ever since he was two years' old. A guardian angel couldn't stick any closer. He was so practical, too, I didn't know that ever a slip of the spirit of poetry would find spiritual soil enough in the mind of the boy that it could take root and grow. But it did in these later and riper years of his.

The summer that he was three years old I was curious to know what he would think of thunder; I wanted to know what he would say of it.

When the first thunder-storm came in the month of May we went away up into the third story of the house. I opened a window; drew my chair up beside it, and took him on my lap. When a sharp peal came his blue eyes grew very big and earnest as he said: "What's that made of?"

"It is called thunder; it is 'way—' way—up in the sky."

"What make a fhunder?"

"God."

"Oh-h-h-h! wish He'd do it more."

"I like to hear thunder; it is so grand," said I, "poets call it the voice of God," and I said it reverently, hoping to strike the mind of the child with awe.

He leaned his white head against my bosom while his chubby hands, like two little pads of dough, lay in mine. He sighed often, and his long lashes fell as though he were buried in deep thought.

As the storm abated he stood beside the window in his chair and leaned out, listening. He would turn his head and listen to catch the distant reverberations. At last, when he could only hear the faintest sounds, he turned round, caught his breath in a restful way, and with a cunning little tinkle of a laugh that showed his pearly teeth, said: "A voice of God—No! He's gettin' pretty well thoked out, I tell ye!"

Let every woman who reads this, who is the praying wife of an unconverted husband, look well to her daily walk and see if she adorns her profession—see if she lives religion in her daily intercourse with her husband—see if her life is like an excellent sermon, before him every day. If you, poor wife, have been recalcitrant to your duty, and you read this with a saddened heart, or through a mist of tears, remorseful, is it not too late to setrace your erring steps.

Go with your tear-wet face to your bed-room and ask God to forgive you and strengthen you in your new resolves, then go to your husband and tell him you have sinned, you have failed in your duty and that the sin of sensuality that the world accords to him, lies at your own door, from the fact that you have not set the example before him that you should have done.

Wives have much to answer for. For instance—and the occurrence transpires in every neighborhood, a girl who is a member of a church marries a moral man who is not a professor of religion.

We interested ones watch to see which is the positive and which the negative character, which is the stronger. Our regret is bitter when we see her neglect her known duty, and go a-visiting on the Sabbath day, or turn that day into one of revelry, or jolly re-union for all his folks. Oh, we're so sorry, when instead of dressing up neatly and going to church regularly with her young husband beside her, in a sweet, positive, earnest way, just as if she never dreamed of any other way, we see visitors drive up to the new home "bright an' airy" on a church day morning. We are sorry to hear the "quawk-quawk" of the fat Shanghais as they are borne to the guillotine—to see the glittering carriage whirl up to the gate—the baby-wagon standing out under the lilacs, the rocking-chair wheeled to the veranda, and to see the young girl-wife with flushed face, eager to please her new relatives, and afraid of "hurting their feelings," turn this quiet day of rest into one of visiting and recreation.

The moment a young wife ignores her duty to God and brings reproach upon her profession by thus weakly and sinfully yielding her principles, that moment she must lose the tenderest reverence of her husband.

Her influence is weakened henceforth.

A woman who only wears her religion on the outside, like an easy garment that can be laid off at a moment's notice, can never hope to have much power or influence over her husband. We know of cases where the wife is always asking the prayers of the church publicly, for her husband while he sits under the sound of her voice and gawks about and looks at the wall paper and turns up the side of his boot to see if the heel is wearing off evenly. Of course there are exceptions, but frequently we fear the spirit of the religion exhibited in the wife's daily life is not such that the husband would desire its possession. But if it is that kind that makes the wife patient and forbearing and forgiving and charitable, ready to confess a fault meekly and beg pardon for the weakness of her poor human nature, ready to submit to the dealings of God's providence cheerfully, whether provocation or sorrow or affliction, then will he have faith in her and set her apart, shined in his heart—a true woman—a priestess—a Christian.

The Widow Willson has five boys—she is a poor woman, and I have often wondered how it came that her boys were always comfortably and warmly dressed, and I made bold to ask her the other day how she managed to do it. I can't remember all she told me, and I was afraid to write it down for she wouldn't have talked had she known there was a possibility of her getting into the papers. She makes their caps out of any odd bits of cloth—sometimes the top part will be cut in five or six pieces, with points to meet in the middle, and then she sets on a large button covered with velvet or cloth like the cap. The band that goes around is of leather or pasteboard covered with cloth—it should be an inch or so in width. Sometimes she varies the style and has the top piece gathered into fulness at the sides, on one of which she puts a tassel, and on the other a button. She takes visors off from old caps, or covers one with cloth, or gets a bit of varnished leather at the shoe dealers. There are a great many ways of making boys' caps, and they are all pretty and cost but a trifle. All that is required in the making of one, is a little ingenuity. They can be made just as pretty as a dear child can stand, and made of the remnants of men's fine clothes; cloth that could be used for nothing else but rugs.

Let me see—what else did she tell me; oh, her boys' drawers! She takes the pockets out of their last summer's half-worn pantaloons; sews up the pocket-places, takes off all the unnecessary buttons, cuts off the wide hem, rips the inside seam up a few inches from the bottom, takes out a gored piece and makes the leg to button and fit about the ankles, and—the drawers are made. This is a good plan, too, for poor laboring men who cannot afford to buy knit drawers.

Their vests? Well, she makes them out of old coat skirts, turned wrong side out; their mittens out of the back part of the legs of worn pantaloons. She lines them with flannel or cotton flannel.

Mittens made of cloth do not fit well about the wrists, they will "give" when drawn on or off, but she remedies that by knitting little ribbed wristlets that fit warmly and snugly over the bare red space between the end of the sleeve and the mitten. So many mothers quite forget that exposed part when their little boys go out to mess the cows, or throw out the ice-cold fodder, covered with the frosty siftings of snow.

I was at Lu's one day last week.

Pipsy Ellen had the quinsy and I went over to doctor her. I put on the deacon's camel cloth cloak, and drew a pair of his socks on over my shoes, and put my little shawl all up over my calash and I was as snug as a baby in its crib.

Just as I was going to cross the bridge, who should I meet but Deacon Skiles and that old man-trap, Sticks. That was the first time I had seen him face to face since—since he didn't marry me instead of his.

I felt like fainting, but I rallied and drew father's camel cloth cloak closer about my trembling form, and drew my head back bravely, and illuminated my face with the sweetest smile I could manufacture on such short notice. I didn't mean to stop, but he drew vigorously on the lines, and leaned away back in the buggy, and pulled until his beasts slackened. I could see by the bundles and packs and things stowed about them, that they had been over at old man Bowlace's—her father's.

The deacon was bound to speak:

"Miss Skiles, this is Sister—Pott-t-t-t," said he, and just then one forewheel of the buggy went down into a shock-hole at the lower end of the bridge, and threw them both forward with a jerk that made her shriek: "My gracious alive, Simon Skiles, what ye beout!" And she made a grab at a crock of apple-butter that stood down between their feet, but not until the paper cover had burst and spilt the thick, black contents all over her shoes.

Such a look as she did give him! It was enough to annihilate all the deacons that belonged to the Pottsville Association! I turned away, pretending I had to cough.

When I looked again she had drawn her feet back and rested them on the toes—while she was not holding them up from the bottom of the buggy. She did look miserable enough to satisfy her worst enemy.

They both tried to pretend that that was nothing, but I could see that they were far from being cool and collected.

I smiled on, my very sweetest, and tried to look just as attractive as possible. I let a little slip of hair hang down over my forehead, and I caught the cloak together on my bosom with the hand on which glowed and sparkled a ring that Jonathan had bought in the cars along with a paper of cream candy.

It was a little embarrassing, I confess. There, with her feet in a crock of apple-butter, sat the woman who had forestalled me;—there, the man, beside whom I might have walked the rest of the way through life, providence permitting; and there I stood, a poor, lonely old stub, with nobody to care whether I lived or died.

Still, I smiled gee-lorionally.

"Whoa, there! you Jack!" said the deacon, in a shrill key, sawing the bits in the horses' mouths.

Poor things, they looked as though they were trying to sleep.

"Do your critters have the epizootic?" said she, wheezing dismally, and arching her thin eyebrows.

"Not badly," I replied, in my very silkkest tone, bowing graciously.

"Wull—the 'zootie's rather fatal," said the old, blue deacon; "anyways, it is up in our neighborhood," and his nose sympathized with his weak, watery eyes.

"What's the state o' religion now in Pottsville?" said she.

"Pretty fair, thank you," said I, bowing again.

"Old Mrs. Hanks joined meeting a couple of weeks ago—there's a very good feeling now, especially since the death of Cooly Henderson, on the railroad."

"Whoa, there! you Jack! you old sinner, you need a basting!" piped the deacon, as he chattered with the cold. "It behooves us all, Sister Potts, to heed every call of—you Jack!—of the grim monster, Death. We ort to have our lamps burning; for, as the poet says, we know not the day nor the hour when—whoa, there, Jack!"

"Haden't you better drive on, my love?" said Rhoda, as she tried to compress herself into the smallest possible compass to get out the apple-butter.

"Well, I s'pect we had better. You must remember me to Deacon Potts, sister, and tell him we expect to eat a good hot Baptist dinner at old Brother Hammond's to-day, on our way home, or we would have called to see him."

The good-byes were spoken, the lines jerked, and they started. I looked over my shoulder as they drove up the hill, and saw, with twinkling eyes, a little squirt of apple-butter come over the side of the buggy at every jolt it made. I laughed heartily, drew the shawl closer about my ears, and trudged on.

What cured Pipey Ellen's quinsy, I have not time to tell now. My sleeves are rolled up, and the work in the kitchen awaits my tired hands.

THE REASON WHY.

BY BERTHA DRAKE.

"MATTIE," said Mr. Graham to his wife, as the door closed upon their visitor, "I do wish you would be more cheerful. You hardly spoke while Cousin Frank was here, and looked for all the world as though some dreadful calamity was about to befall you. If you have any regard for my feelings, do try to be more like folks."

Mrs. Graham's head bent lower over the little half-finished dress upon which she was working; but she made no reply. She was evidently accustomed to such remarks. Presently, bursting into tears, she rose and left the room.

"Pshaw!" said her husband, as with a contemptuous smile he looked after her; "that's always the way. You must speak to a woman just so, or she'll begin to snivel. I say, Kate," addressing his sister, a bright-eyed, wide-awake-looking woman of some thirty years, "I used to think that women were almost angels; but I've come to the conclusion that they are about as full of faults as we poor devils are."

An amused expression on Mrs. Lyman's face was her only answer.

Mr. Graham sat for some minutes in moody silence, and then said, reaching for his hat as he spoke: "Come, sis, let's go over to Uncle John's. We'll be sure to find smiling faces there, and can manage, perhaps, to pass an evening very pleasantly. It's a pity a fellow can't take some comfort at home."

It was after considerable hesitation that Mrs. Lyman replied.

"Well, Charley, just wait until Bertie's jacket is done, for he is very anxious to wear it to school to-morrow; and then, if Nellie is asleep"—glancing at the cradle where lay the six-months-old baby—"I'll go with you."

As the clock struck seven the little garment was pronounced finished, and was placed by the kind aunt where Bertie could not fail to see it when he first awoke in the morning. Baby was now soundly sleeping, and Mrs. Lyman, after putting on her hat and shawl, stepped to the door of her sister's room, and said, "Mattie, we are going to Uncle John's. We shall not be absent long; but do not sit up for us unless you choose to."

"Very well," was the reply, but the tone in which the words were uttered, told plainly that the speaker took but little interest in what was going on about her.

"Now, Charley," said Mrs. Lyman, as soon as they were fairly in the street, "I shouldn't have consented to come with you to-night, were it not that I wanted, as Aunt Hannah used to say, to give you a 'good big piece of my mind.'"

"Why, what for Kate? What great crime am I guilty of?"

"The crime of destroying your own happiness, and the happiness of those dearest to you."

"What do you mean? What can you mean?"

"I think, Charley, you spoke very harshly to poor Mattie to-night. I could almost have cried with her."

"Perhaps I was rather cross; but, Kate, that woman tries my patience dreadfully. She goes moping around, looking as forlorn and disconsolate as though she had not a friend in the world."

"There must be a cause for it."

"Yes, I suppose; but I think it would puzzle a lawyer to find out the cause."

"Don't you remember when she was otherwise?"

"Don't I remember? I think I do. There wasn't as pretty a girl for miles around as Mattie Standish was. I was proud of her in my courting-days."

"Yes; I well remember what a devoted lover you were. Our garden was robbed of its choicest flowers to be made into bouquets for Mattie. If fruit or confectionery was sent from the city, the very nicest was selected for that same Mattie. The latest magazines and papers were found on her table, placed there by my brother Charley. In short, nothing was too good for her."

"That's so, Kate; and those were jolly times. I wonder if Mattie has forgotten them?"

Without heeding his last remark, Mrs. Lyman continued: "I had a beautiful rose-tree at home, Charley, that was given me by a dear friend. As long as I watered it and tended it carefully it repaid me with many fragrant, beautiful blossoms; but after it had been in my possession a few months, I am sorry to say, I shamefully neglected it. Sometimes, for days together, I did not go near it. It faded and drooped. I renewed my care of it—but it was too late. My rose-tree died, and I learned a lesson."

Take care, Charley, that your Mattie does not share the fate of my rose. She has a peculiarly sensitive nature, and will not bear neglect any more than a tender plant will."

"But, Kate, Mattie knows that I love her as well as I ever did."

"What reason has she to think so? I was reading, not long since, of a gentleman who had visited in a great many families; and, among them all, he had found but very few really happy ones. The cause of the unhappiness, he said, was not so much the want of love as the want of care to manifest it. 'That is just where the trouble lies. If a man should tell you that you did not love your wife and children, you would be tempted to knock him down—you would, at least, call him a liar. But, Charley, what is love worth that is never expressed in words or actions. Play the lover again, my dear brother, and, take my word for it, you will have no cause to complain of Mattie.'"

By this time the door of Uncle John's house was reached, and there was no time for further conversation. They were met, as had been predicted, by smiling faces; and the evening might, indeed, have passed very pleasantly, if Mr. Graham had been in a mood to enjoy it. His sister's words had made a deep impression on his mind; and, though vexed at her plain talk, he could but acknowledge that she was right.

At an early hour they were on the way home, but more than half the distance was passed over before a word was spoken by either. Mrs. Lyman was beginning to fear that she had seriously offended her brother, when he said: "Kate, I was almost angry with you, but I've come to the conclusion that you are more than half right. I've acted like a fool—blaming Mattie for what I alone was to blame for. Let's turn over a new leaf, and see if I can win the roses back to Mattie's cheeks."

"Spoken like yourself, my dear brother. Only live your courting-days over again, and you will again have reason to be proud of Mattie. Now, Charley," continued his sister, "just stop at Warner's, on the way home, and buy a basket of those nice oranges; then call at Osgood's, and get the latest magazine. Take them as a present to Mattie, and see how she will receive them."

Mrs. Lyman went directly home, and finding Mrs. Graham still busily sewing, gave her a good-night kiss, and went immediately to her room. Mr. Graham came in soon afterward, and placing the oranges, with the book, in his wife's lap, said, "Here, Mattie, is a present I got on purpose for you—lay aside your sewing, and enjoy these good things."

Mr. Graham gave her husband one quick, surreptitious look, and, as she had done once before that day, burst into tears.

"Why, Mattie," said Mr. Graham, "have I been so successful of you, that a little act of kindness like this affects you thus?"

"Oh, Charley!" said she, as soon as she could command her voice sufficiently to reply, "I thought you had ceased to love me, and was just grieving myself to death over it."

"No, Mattie, I had grown careless of my vow 'to love, honor and cherish,' but God helping me, I promise anew to love and cherish you tenderly 'till death do us part.'"

It was all that was needed to make Mattie the cheerful, loving Mattie of old.

Mrs. Lyman was awakened the next morning by Charley's clear, ringing voice, as he sang the words of that most beautiful of Scotch songs—

"Her voice is low and sweet,
She's all the world to me—
And for bonnie Annie Laurie,
I'd lay me down and dee."

"Ah!" said she, with a smile, "it didn't take a lawyer to find the reason why Mattie went moping about the house."

"Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them."

TO A FUGITIVE WIND.

BY CLARA STANLEY.

SWEET Wind that blows across the world,
Be merrily you go;
I fain would guess your happy thought,
Would know the thing you know!

Wide as you sweep, your open path
Is a mysterious way;
I feel your cool breath in the night,
Your tender touch by day;

Yet know not where your dwelling is,
Nor how you learn His will—
I only know one sovereign Voice
Can bid your wings be still.

Oh, bright wind, light wind, let me go
Abroad with you to-night;
Perchance the gates of Paradise
We'll reach by morning light!

Perchance some starry garden waits
For your sweet, coming breath—
Some lowly garden just this side
The golden gate of Death.

There—when your gentle whispers cease,
And your bright wings are still,
Perchance I may, with eager feet,
Climb Zion's sacred hill!

Oh, bright wind, light wind, haste away,
And show to me the way,
Where through the portals of the sky,
Breaks forth th' eternal Day!

When a man thinks that nobody cares for him, and that he is alone in a cold and selfish world, he would do well to ask himself what he has done to make anybody care for and love him, and to warm the world with faith and generosity. Generally, those who complain the most have done the least.

CHARLES DICKENS.—FIRST TIME AND LAST.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

IT was to be the first time with me, although it was, I believe, the last reading Charles Dickens ever gave in Boston.

What a furor there had been over him all winter in the staid old city that sits wrapped in her sea-fogs, with her face turned to the Mayflower and her treasured two centuries and a half of historic traditions!

Boston is quite too high-bred for any melodramatic demonstrations, and, it is presumed, would maintain her lofty serenity though the heavens should fall; but the advent of Charles Dickens shook her out of her sublime composure that winter. In fact, he took her heart by storm—the strong old heart of the city that struck its roots so long ago by the sea, and whose foster-mother was the cold northeasters of the Atlantic.

It took her fierce Januaries as well as her delicious Junes, to nourish the old colonial hamlet into what she is to-day.

But the Story-Teller came—"the greatest since Scott, one of the most famous since Shakespeare"—and Boston surrendered at once. She took the Magician, deep in his fifties, with his graying hair and beard, to her heart, as she had taken the slender, handsome, buoyant-souled young Englishman, the author of the Pickwick Papers, a quarter of a century before.

The very air seemed charged with his personality that winter. Mysterious and tantalizing rumors floated through the atmosphere. Everybody was on the qui vive for him. It was believed that he was liable to turn up at the most unexpected times and places; that he was taking our measure when we least suspected it, and getting his own squints and glimpses at our home life and ways. Like Hamlet's father's ghost, men cried of the great author, "'Tis here! 'Tis here!" and he was everywhere and nowhere.

Tempting little bits of news did leak out about him, and the public nibbled at them as though they were precious manna.

It came to be understood that there was a quiet house on Charles Street which was in reality the home of Dickens, whatever hotel lodgings he might ostensibly occupy; and that, sheltered under that happy roof, he was holding wonderful tilts of wit and humor with his author-friend, and a circle of choice spirits gathered about them.

But the world that was shut out had still the Readings, and they made the most of them. What a rush, and scramble there was those first nights for tickets! What risks were run—what hours of cold and fatigue borne bravely as soldiers on picket, in order to secure the coveted prizes! A few were induced to part with them at enormous premiums, and Midas and his family had the first chances, and people of shallower purges—and amongst them must always be counted those of the author's own guild—had to bide their time.

Dickens was to read on that last night, "Dr. Mari-gold's Prescription," with that inimitable trial of "Randell against Rickwick."

The brilliantly-lighted hall was just filling as I entered it with my friend, who, having heard the great author several times, had "found her appetite grow by what it fed on."

How well I remember the first impression, the lovely toilets, the soft hum and rustle and flutter, as the audience took their seats—an audience that comprised whatever was finest in the intellect and culture of Boston!

It was a pleasure to be there simply, and to sit and wait with the others in quiet, pleased expectancy for the moment when the great necromancer should appear.

There were faces in that audience, too, whom people all over the civilized world would go far to see. There was Emerson, with his thin, scholarly, thoughtful face, that looked as if he had suddenly lifted it from the old book-cases among which he has browsed all his life, and, seeing him sitting there in quiet waiting among the others, some of his wonderful sentences would leap and throb across one's thoughts, clear and pure as rays from diamonds. There was Longfellow, with some gracious dignity which seemed the fitting atmosphere of his own perfect poems—the fine massive head, the rippling, glittering silver of the beard, the face so remarkable in its strength, and calm, and goodness. There, too, was Fields, the publisher of Dickens, the friend also in that deep, tender sense which we all know now we have read his book; and the beautiful woman by his side, of whose face it seems a kind of sacrilege to write, because another Chaucer or Shakespeare could alone do it worthily, was the wife of the publisher.

I was thinking of all this, when a stir in the audience drew my eyes suddenly to the platform, which a man was crossing in a rapid, rather business-like way.

Dickens, his first appearance, his whole manner, and the character of his readings, were so thoroughly "written up," when he was amongst us, that I shall only touch lightly here.

The first impression was so calm and business-like, that it might have been slightly disenchanting to those who had greatly idealized him.

Hero-worship is always a dangerous indulgence, but any slight chill of disappointment soon vanished under the spell of his reading. For, despite its simplicity, it was a spell. The dear old Christmas story could never afterward be the same to those who heard the author read it that night.

By some subtle trick of voice and expression, he individualized every character in the story. There was Dr. Marigold, the itinerant auctioneer, with his white hat and a shawl worn loosely round his shoulders, telling his story of the Suffolk young woman whom he had courted from the foot-board of his cart. There was Mrs. Marigold with her frightful temper, and there, shining between the quaint, tender father, and the mother, so fierce and cruel in her outbreaks of passion, was the face of that dear, little, seraphic Sophy. The spell of that voice passing so easily from the "descriptive to the dramatic," striking out every character clear as a chisel, with its changing keys, entranced the whole audience. You might have heard the ticking of a clock, so still was it. Now it was the humor, now it was the tenderness, now the deep pathos of the story which lifted everybody into a common sympathy. Dickens was such a master of his art, too. There was nothing sensational or extravagant in the whole reading. He lifted one to his own height and fired the imagination and possessed the heart apparently without effort, as the soft winds blow, and birds warble, or, better than either, as the numbers sing their divine sweetness through some delicious poem.

Then came that great trial of "Burdell against Pickwick," which threw everybody into agonies of laughter. That great reader himself, carried away with the power and fun of his own creation, actually shook his sides with laughter, the sight of which added hugely to the general mirth.

In the midst of it all, I turned and looked over to the place where the Poet and the Philosopher were sitting with their friends.

I shall never forget that sight. It was worth going to see, even if Dickens had not been the magician which invoked the whole. Emerson was bending over, and almost writhing with laughter, and what laughter it was! Such perfect, delectable, boyish abandon! He was so hugely tickled! You felt that he laughed all through him, and with all his might at the magnificent fun of that scene between Sam Weller and the pompous, irate, old judge. It seemed that he had just reached the culminating point of choking and gasping. "I almost expected to see him throw himself down on the floor and have it out there in great boyish screams and howls of mirth.

It gave me a new idea of the fresh, simple, child-heart behind the soul and brain of America's great philosopher.

I have seen Emerson a good many times since among groups of friends, or moving with his quiet, thoughtful eyes along the streets, standing before vast audiences which hung upon his words, as though a god had come down once more to talk with men; but, for me, I shall always see him as I did that night, his head bent forward, his figure half-doubled up, and shaking with huge merriment over that magnificent fun. It was a new revelation of the man. I had heard him called cold and serene as some lofty hermit, that comes sailing down in sunny June out of Arctic solitudes, but the fresh, warm, throbbing heart at the centre came to the surface that night. I shall always be so glad I was there to see it.

I turned from the great Philosopher to the great Poet. It was a rich delight to mark the enjoyment of this last, though there was not the boyish abandon of Emerson about Longfellow.

The latter sat quite erect, his fine face fairly illuminated with his deep sympathy with the rich humor of the scene. He was laughing with a pure heartiness over the whole spirit and movement of the thing. I did not half suspect, as I had in Emerson's case, that the Poet would drop off his seat in a kind of apoplexy of mirth; something of the calm and gracious atmosphere of his own poems still seemed to surround him, but his full, vital, unrestrained enjoyment was a pleasant thing to see and to be remembered always.

And the beautiful woman, friend and hostess and guest by turns of Dickens, with something that was like the splendor of sunrise in her face, clapped her hands, and that, too, was worth going far to see.

But when I turned and looked again at the reader, another scene came up before me, so simple and homelike that it hardly seems fitting to set it here, although it came up to me and shut out, for a few moments, the great audience, and the brilliant lights, and all the splendor and fascination of the whole scene, and blurred the figure on the platform and muffled his voice until it seemed to be speaking in a dream.

It was only a little home vision that leaned out of the distant years. The soft lamp-light shone into the darkness of the winter evening, and gave the quiet, old room a quaint, pleasant air, which the garish daylight might have missed.

The mother, a gentle-voiced, pale-faced woman, sat there with her children, "three of them, all girls."

One of them, just in the blossoming of girlhood, sits at the table where the light falls clearest and reads. Oh, fair young reader, oh, wonderful book, for it is "David Copperfield." No matter if the clouds settle darkly and the winds croon weirdly outside. They who sit in the quaint, old-fashioned room, heed neither clouds nor winds. They are following the fortunes of David all along the thoroughfares of those wonderful chapters. How each scene lives and throbs before them. They quiver and glow with the varied passions of that marvellous drama. How real all the actors are!

That quaint, crusty Aunt Betsey Trotwood, with her life-long feud against boys and donkeys, and her warm, honest heart under all; the pretty, silly, little mother, and that monster of a Murdstone, with his hard, metallic sister, and that pleasant lunatic, Mr. Dick, and that delightful Micawber, with his domestic perplexities and his grandiloquent epistles, and faithful old Feggoty, and that dear, little, silly "wax doll" of a Dora, and that "lone, lorn critter," Mrs. Gummidge by the hearthstone, and Uriah Heap, smiling one's flesh crawl, as he crawls with his base, slimy soul along the story, and Twaddles with his misery and his merriment, and that awkward, homely, heroic Flanz, and that handsome, accomplished villain Stanforth, and "poor little Emily," and Agnes, who is such an angel without wings that I can never quite forgive Curtis for that delicious bit of satire. Agnes is very noble and lovely and all that, but somehow she always does seem to me quite like David's aunt!"

Across all the years I saw the little homely scene, across them, too, I heard for a moment the soft voice of the young reader, and saw in the lamplight the glossy head and the fair face; alas! that all its fresh bloom could not persuade Death into a little longer waiting. I almost heard the indrawn breaths, and felt the hushes of suspense in some crisis of the story; the rapt interest, the delight, the exultation, the shrieks of laughter over some scene rich with Falstaffian humor, and over all the mother's pale face beaming with pleased attention.

It was a little homely scene that rose up a moment and shone and shut itself down. It seemed almost as much out of place at that time as Cinderella would in her dingy gown and bare feet at the Prince's feast but it had its own message to me, and when it had passed and I saw once more the quiet man, the world's great Story Teller standing there on the platform, I did not love and honor him less, for that winter evening, lying in the far-distant years which owned to him its grace and charm.

He stood there on the platform, the severe influenza which had seized him on entering our climate and which held him until he left it. Breaking out occasionally in swift, half-suppressed coughs, his whole face beaming with feeling, his eyes shining with a real tenderness upon his audience, and then he turned and walked away, and Charles Dickens had spoken to his "native Boston," as he happily called it, for the last time.

His last visit to our country, the honest delight with which the whole nation received the great Englishman, to whom it owed so much, must have touched and gladdened a nature so sensitive as his to the love and praise of his fellow men. Yet it was not all fame and flattery, cake and wine to the great master of the chords of human hearts, when he came among us that winter.

Fame has her own prices, and she exacts them rigidly. Dickens had his share of misapprehension of scandal, of that prying curiosity which always seeks to unearth the secrets, no matter how sacred or how painful, of a great man's life. And it is to be said to his credit, that he bore all bravely, for the most part, silently.

Yet not less must the stings have wounded and festered; the painful fact always being that there is usually no redress for hurts of this kind. A part of a truth is always the worst kind of a lie, and explanation may often include so much that is private and painful, and so involve the interests and happiness of others—that misapprehension and scandal seem infinitely preferable to this merciless tearing up of the roots and fibres of one's life.

I have hesitated a little about relating an instance which illustrates what I have said, and which occurred during Dickens's last visit among us, proving that some wormwood dashed the cup of warm, spiced wine, which we offered to our great guest.

In this case the facts did seem at first to fairly make against him and the public to be less amenable to the censure of rash conclusions than it usually is when sitting in judgment on the private lives of great men.

Dickens is in his grave, and no living person, so far as I know, can be harmed by relating this incident of his visit:

I remember the surprise with which I first learned the story—repeated, too, amongst a company of intelligent men and women, that the widow of Charles Dickens's brother and his two children were living in Chicago in obscurity and poverty. The story represented the widow as an amiable and interesting woman, with two little daughters, bearing her ill-fortunes, so far as possible, with uncomplaining courage.

There was everything in the story, as related to me, to touch one's sympathies. The sources of my information placed the matter beyond doubts. It was received from the neighbors and friends of the lady herself. I am very slow to give any credence to the gossip which always aims its arrows at a shining mark; but I must admit that my faith in Charles Dickens staggered for a moment.

Here he was in our midst, drinking the incense of a nation's love and praise, reaping golden harvests from the audiences who hung every night breathless upon his words. All the time perfectly aware that a little way off the wife and children of his dead brother were enduring privations, if not positive suffering, from which he could so easily have delivered them.

Could the author of "Nell" and "Little Dorrit" be capable of the hardness, or parsimony, or craven spirit, whichever it might be, that was attributed to him? The talk and the indignation waxed warm; one of the ladies just returned from Chicago, related a plan which had been concocted by some of the people of the great western city.

Dickens had, of course, been invited to read there. When he came, a proposition should be made to him to give the widow and orphans a benefit night. If he refused,—well, there were people in Chicago who would take their own way and time of making the great author feel their indignation. So the talk went, painful and perplexing enough to those who knew and honored the man who had dedicated his splendid gifts to the poor and misused and forgotten of humanity.

Time went on, and Dickens did not go to Chicago. The influenza, which seized him on his arrival, forced him to return home, at the conclusion of his first season amongst us. He made, so far as I know, no explanation of his relations with the family of his dead brother, but he must have been aware of the position in which he was placed before the public, and, with his temperament, some of the barbed arrows of that time must have struck home.

Dickens, like other great men, did not find it all as summer holiday's yachting when he trimmed his sails to golden gales of fame and prosperity.

Time, however, always works for the truth. After awhile the facts came out. The widow of Augustus Dickens died suddenly in Chicago. A painful mystery hung over her last hours. It was thought that her immediate death was occasioned by the use of some powerful narcotic. She had been ill for several days, and it was suggested that in some moment of acute pain she had inadvertently swallowed the draught which produced her death. There were suspicious circumstances, however, connected with her decease, which at least gave some plausibility to rumors of suicide on the part of the unhappy woman.

Whether the facts were ever cleared up, I do not know, for I am writing from memory, as I read the story in the newspapers. But I learned then, in connection with it, that the brother of Charles Dickens had left a widow residing in England, a blind and helpless invalid, who was entirely dependent for her support on her brother-in-law, and was generously maintained by him.

So in one moment Dickens's conduct was cleared from reproach; nay, it was shown to have been most delicate and magnanimous from the first.

What could the man do? He might have spoken and cleared himself in a moment; but, to do this, he must drag up from the grave the dead brother's sorrow or shame, and hold it palpitating before the world. He might have to stigmatise the woman who in Chicago bore that dead brother's name, and was the mother of his children, and—for I know nothing of the circumstances beyond the bold facts—may have been led to consider herself his lawful wife. At all events, she was a woman, and he who was so pitiful to the frail and fallen of her sex would be sure to spare one whose circumstances must have appealed so strongly to his sympathies.

Then there were those "two little girls." "Nell" and "Little Dorrit" again. Could the author of these have drawn down one shadow of reproach on these young, innocent heads?

However his heart might have warmed toward them, there was the memory of the poor blind English wife to come between; and a meeting, under the circumstances, could only have been most painful to all concerned. So there was nothing for Charles Dickens to do but precisely what he did—bear the misapprehension and scandal, from honest and kindly hearts, too, silently and bravely.

The old gods grind slowly. I am not certain whether Dickens was in his grave or not before the spirit which justified him to the world came to the light. It makes little difference now. What a very little difference everything will make to all of us in a little while.

Yet what a terrible shock it was when the belt, suspending down into the golden June days, filled with blossoms and the singing of birds, and over all the land they were saying: "The world's great story—Tell us dead!"

After the first great shock was over, I think it was a comfort to us all to learn that he went "through the golden gate into the skies" suddenly; that there was no long, wearing illness, no midnight watches, no slow breaking of the great golden cord, no agonized watching of the wasting of mind and body, until all that eager, vital, magnetic life, those untiring energies, those splendid spirits, that radiant, throbbing humor, that keen, darting, smiting sense of fun which immortalized whatever it touched, that generous, tender heart were all a wreck.

Dickens went, as his great brothers in the guild had gone a little while before—Allton and Prescott, Irving and Hawthorne, Macaulay and Thackeray. Probably each, had it been left to his own will, would have chosen the swift messenger to the slow-footed.

But "the world is full of their voices." Who can think of him as dead who made mankind so much better and happier for his living?

Can "David Copperfield" die to this generation or those who follow? The very air is filled with the people of his fancies. They come to us in lonely hours of the night, in watchings by sick beds, in all manner of loneliness and heartaches, and lift these bleak, toilsome days into new atmospheres of warmth and light, and the hours touched by the enchanter's wand glow out into a new beauty and grace.

It is the great glory of Charles Dickens that he was pre-eminently the author of the poor. Somehow, poverty, rage, wretchedness have seemed to gain a new significance and pathos since his genius touched them. Behind hard, sad faces and bent forms of men and women, under the tatters and dirt which we meet every day wandering on the streets and hugging the curbstones, we recognize a common humanity, and feel the instinct of kindred, which we did not until Dickens came, though before him Shakespeare had written and Scott had sung. His quick sympathy for the suffering, his reverence and pity for the meanest and lowest of his kind, his midnight wanderings among the lowest haunts of poverty and vice, as he found them in London, his untiring interest in all practical charities, as, for instance, the cheap lodgings of the London poor, seem always to me the rarest glory of the great man passed away. I think he would not have had it otherwise.

In the year's sunniest month, they laid him "whose presence was perpetual sunshine" to his solemn rest at Westminster Abbey. He had fairly earned his place there among the world's great men; but I believe he would have cared far less for that than for the knowledge that he had helped to lift the burdens, and make smooth the toilsome ways of humanity.

Dying in the summer that he loved, he will still make "summer in a thousand thousand lives."

There are some lines from "Bret Harte" which reflect with that marvellous touch of his, the whole scene like a clear mountain lake. You may have read them before, but they will never grow old. All through the rise and fall of the numbers it has seemed to me I can hear the winds blow, and see the black waving of the pines; and, therefore, I close this brief sketch with them:

"Above the pines the moon was slowly drifting,
The river sang below;
The dim Sierras far beyond uplifting
Their minarets of snow.

"The roaring camp-fire with rude humor painted,
The ruddy tints of health
On haggard face and form that drooped and fainted
In the fierce race for wealth.

"Till one arose and from his pack's scant treasure
A hoarded volume drew.
And cards were dropped from hands of listless leisure
To hear the tale anew.

"And then, while round them shadows gathered faster,
And as the firelight fell,
He read aloud the book wherein the master
Had writ of 'little Nell.'

"Perhaps 'twas boyish fancy, for the reader
Was youngest of them all;

But, as he read, from clustering pine and cedar
A silence seemed to fall.

"The fir-trees, gathering closer in the shadows,
Listened in every spray,
While the whole camp with Nell on English meadows,
Wandered and lost their way.

"And so, in mountain solitudes p'ertaken,
As by some spell divine,
Their cares dropped from them like the needles shaken
From out the gusty pine.

"Lost is that camp and wasted all its fire,
And he who wrought that spell;
Ah, towering pine and stately Kentish spire,
Ye have one tale to tell!

"Lost is that camp, but let its fragrant story
Blend with the breath that thrills
With hop-vines incense all the pensive glory
That fills the Kentish hills!

"And on that grave where English oak and holly
And laurel wreaths entwine;
Dream it not all a too presumptuous folly—
This spray of Western Pine."

OUR CLUB.

III.

HOW JEANNETTE AND THE PROFESSOR DISCUSSED THE TRUTH.

THERE was the faintest flicker of scorn about Jean Marriott's expressive mouth as she laid down the ultra progressive journal from which she had been reading an article on social and moral reform to a select audience, consisting of Professor Engel and the anonymous personage who has the honor of reporting the proceedings of the "Templeton Ethical Club," the members thereof, on this occasion, being represented by parties aforesaid.

"I do not notice that glow of enthusiasm in your face, Jean, which I marked the other night when you burst forth in an ardor of devotion and sacrifice—'It is truth that we want though we speak it from the ruins of all that we once held dear.' Here are the 'ruins' in perspective. Do you see Truth rising, spirit-like, from these desolated shrines, purified from all dross and corruption, and waiting to give herself afresh to us in the substance and forms of the new dispensation?"

And the professor looked with smiling curiosity at the earnest-faced woman opposite him, whose usually straightforward and unshrinking eyes were averted and downcast.

"I do not want to speak, Professor Engel, until I have had time to digest this thing, and to decide in my own mind whether it is good or bad," she said. "You know my proneness to hasty and impulsive judgments."

"Because it is your nature to give such, perhaps they are your truest," returned the professor. "First impressions are reckoned best. The soul's intuitions before thought and reason may be your safest guide."

"If I might distinguish between intuition and inherited prejudice," Jeannette said. "But I am so much the creature of an influence that has had me always at a disadvantage, being exerted before I had power to resist—before I was born, even—how am I to know whether the impulse that moves me is of truth or of tradition?—the monition of the Spirit or the spur of superstition? Besides, you, with your strong prepossessions, would not trust nor respect my intuitions if they declared in favor of this matter. You would begin at once to reason with me on the fallacy of my impressions, eager to convince me that they were not to be relied upon. Do you mind how you checked me the other evening when you thought I was speaking too freely and too warmly?"

"Because I feared you had not measured your ground and might overstate yourself. Because you were so wrought up by the evils of one extreme you were in danger of precipitating yourself into the errors of the other. And because there were those present who would be certain to misconstrue you, and falsify your position in their after attempts to define it."

"Should that have any weight with me?" questioned Jean, with simplicity. "I am not cautious by nature. If I have a conviction I am constrained to utter it regardless of consequences."

"It is not only that you will suffer from misjudgment," said the professor, "but you imperil the truth which you fling unguarded into an atmosphere where it may be darkened, perverted and divorced from the good that is the life and soul of it."

"Could I so?" demurred Jeannette. "Does not God protect his truths?"

"So carefully that He only commits them to us in metaphors and symbols, in the deep secrets of nature and the unfathomed mysteries of spirit. Even the Christ spoke in parables to the multitude, only when alone with His chosen revealing the hidden significance of His wonderful figures and mystical types."

"Do you know," Jeannette complained, "this seems to me the most inscrutable and mournful thing in the Providence of God, that there should be so much uncertainty and mystery regarding the truth—that it should be such a vexing Proteus in its shifting shapes, a chameleon in its changing hues,—that in our mad pursuit of it, we as often clutch the shadow as the substance,—that in our attempts to reason it out, we are quite as likely as otherwise to arrive at its opposite—that the thing which my brother regards as most certain and sacred, to me appears simply a snare and a delusion."

"My dear Jeannette," interrupted the professor, "there is nothing strange or inscrutable in all that, unless we choose to make it so. Simple, earnest, direct souls, striving to live open, pure, sincere, and honest lives, may accept without question their own clear impressions of truth, for they are the chosen to whom all mysteries are revealed, and secret meanings interpreted. It is the unstable and double-minded who cannot discriminate between the true and the false, and are led astray by their own evils."

"But, Professor Engel, there are truths which appear so beautiful, pure, translucent, and to which all that is good, and grand, and lovely in our natures responds with deep, solemn thrilling fervor,—and yet they lead us insensibly away from all our old landmarks, and we find ourselves in a trackless wilderness, breathing a wild, intoxicating air, dimly signalling the boundaries between the right and the wrong, and fraternizing with spirits whose bold, free utterances would once have seemed to us blasphemous."

And Jeannette took up again the journal she had cast aside, and ran her finger significantly over the page she had just been reading.

"They were Heavenly truths in the beginning, Jean, shining with the still reflected splendor of divine love; but they have fallen into evil, impure minds, and their light is now the treacherous, phosphorescent gleam that leads us into the marshes and fens of skepticism, and flashes out suddenly, leaving us floundering darkly, and sinking deeply in the mire and clay of sensualism, that sucks us evermore lower and lower until only the inextinguishable divine spark which holds us alive is left smothered in our natures."

"In brief, then," said Jean, pointing at the article under criticism, as at a pet viper in its cage, "you regard this as the wisdom described by the good James as 'earthly, sensual, devilish?'"

The professor nodded. "And yet—and there's the secret danger of it—trace it back to its pure, unadulterated source, before it was darkened, distorted and defiled in this gross, malarious atmosphere of the senses, and it was the wisdom of angelic life; and by virtue of that it holds a mysterious power, and exerts an irresistible influence over an order of minds that could not be deceived by unqualified evil; but, perceiving this grain of truth, grasp it, greedy and indiscriminate, with all the defilements, deformities and delusions it has gathered in its descent. Take, now, for example, this principle of spiritual freedom—of individual liberty in matters of conscience and faith—nothing can be in itself more divinely true and good—nothing should be held more sacred and inviolable. It is not our God-given right alone, it is our most binding duty to follow the dictates of our enlightened reason, to hold ourselves free from the trammels of parties and creeds, respecting our own convictions, and giving reverent heed thereto. But the moment we forget that we are the humble pensioners of a Supreme Power back of us, that our ability to feel, to think, to act, to enjoy, is in and through this infinite inexhaustible Source of Life, upon which we draw unconsciously and thanklessly, as though it were our own; the moment, indeed, that we arrogate the Divine attributes, refusing homage to and recognition of a Higher than ourselves, we cease to rightly apprehend the true principles of human freedom, and it becomes a dangerous element of evil in our hands, a truth profaned and falsified."

"And it is this monstrous thing, you believe, which is so warmly advocated and persuasively urged by our friends, the reformers, as represented in the article just read," Jeannette said, smiling a little doubtfully, in the professor's earnest face.

"My dear friend," he responded, eagerly, "what sort of freedom is that which puts our lower natures in the ascendant, giving our baser instincts and passions slackened rein, and making the gratification of the senses the supreme aim and end of life? Is it not, indeed, the most object slavery that could be imagined or endured?"

"You forget," remarked Jeannette, in a controversial spirit, "that our free-school philosophers do not recognize anything base or low in our natures, but claim for every instinct and faculty an office necessary, honorable, holy and divine."

"I do not forget nor despise that point," returned the professor; "but I maintain that the head should be carried in the upper air, where the Lord placed it; and whosoever attempts to reverse the order of nature, by putting the feet in its stead, simply makes a spectacle of himself for gods and men, and betrays a retrogressive tendency toward his ancient progenitors—the apes."

"You are getting severe. Let me read you a glowing paragraph or two from this journal of free-thought, to soften a little your asperities," smiled Jeannette.

"Don't desecrate and corrupt the phrase, free-thought, by loose associations, Jean. I grant, there is a wonderful flash and roll of eloquence in this rallying-cry of Liberty, which sets the blood bounding wildly along the veins, and stirs the soul to passionate, unutterable yearnings for some vast, indefinable good, that cannot be grasped or measured in the sphere of humble, homely, plodding, everyday duties. But, take your brave philosophy with the crash and thunder of breaking idols standing through its fine, high, heroic swell of words, and put it to the test of life, and you will quick crunch through the fair, tempting rind to the rotten, false heart of it. Carry out its grand schemes for the reformation and regeneration of society, and you establish a rude, lawless, disorderly community, where each, in his mad scramble for his divine personal rights, tramples recklessly on the rights of all others. God knows, there is need enough of reform in our social, moral and religious life as it is, but your crazy iconoclast, when he has broken our unholy idols, has nothing better to give us than the fragments. Your ultra-reformer is only a rabid, raving discontent, who, revolting against one class of evils, rebounds violently to the other extreme, and his last state is worse than his first."

"Let us trust then that he may rebound again, and in his mad oscillations he may somewhere strike the happy, golden mean," said Jean, hopefully.

"As a case in point, look at his position in respect to marriage," went on the professor, acknowledging the lady's remark simply with a bow. "There is no question, of course, that there are evils and abuses connected with the institution of marriage which cry loudly for consideration and reform, but the proposal to abolish it altogether for that reason is as absurd and insane as would be the proposal to banish the sun, because the thick, heavy, impure atmosphere which we exhale obstructs the free passage of the solar rays, and we do not get our coveted share of the orb's light and heat. No clear, rational mind can fail to perceive that it is not in the relation of marriage, but in those who rashly enter it that the trouble lies, and however sincere and well-disposed our reformer may be in his purpose and effort to set the ordinance aside, he cannot escape a recognition of the fact that the majority of those who rush to the support of his standard do not care a straw for the alleged wrongs of the marriage system, but chafing under the restraint which it imposes on their roving desires they hope by their clamor of injured innocence, and blighted powers, and violated rights to create a popular sentiment which will favor their lusts, level the distinctions between virtue and vice, and give to their loose, dissolute lives the seal and sanction of the law—the rank and dignity of honesty and right. And yet, so deeply implanted, so inwrought, indeed, is the conjugal principle in the soul, that not one of these probably would refuse to yield a more or less willing assent to the faith in one true, pure, indissoluble marriage; only declining to believe in the possibility of its realization in this world, and therefore railing at the folly of the attempt. As well give over the effort to live true, orderly lives, because we have temptations to evil and some are overcome. It is useless to hope for any good in the hereafter, that we do not strive reverently to win in the present. I tell you, Jeannette, if there had never been but one perfect marriage since the world began, it would sanctify the ordinance, counterbalance all failures, and justify fresh trials for a million years to come."

And the professor, his fine face all aglow with enthusiasm, looked at his companion as if he were minded then and there to propose a practical illustration of the faith that was in him, for the benefit and encouragement of the timid and unbelieving.

But at the moment when the reporter was inwardly rejoicing with the hope that at last this tedious talk, so patiently recorded, was to have a touch of tender human interest. There was a stir and stamping of entering feet, and a ripple of laughter in the hall, and some of our good people came bustling in from the evening lecture at the college rooms.

"Why, how's this?" cried Dell Falconer, breezily.

"Here's the professor talking marriage, and Jeannette blooming like the rose under his ardent gaze."

"How know you what the professor was talking of, my keen Falconer?" said that gentleman, smiling, with undisturbed serenity.

"Trust a woman's sense to discern when love and marriage are in the air," was the quick retort.

"Her sense of smelling, Dell?" quizzed Jean, with the utmost simplicity.

"What business have you and the professor to be talking love and marriage, Jeannette?" questioned Roy Sherwood, throwing himself languidly into an easy-chair. "It might have been excusable in you at sixteen when hearts are so green and heads so soft that they cannot approach without inevitably running together in what they imagine an indissoluble union, but in your day and generation, you should be too wise to be flickering about that tender nonsense like moths about a treacherous light."

"On the contrary," said Jeannette, "it is just the wisdom of our day and generation that is needed to give worth and dignity to such 'tender nonsense' and exalt it to its proper place in our lives, and it is much more commendable in us to consider the same in the ripeness of judgment and experience; than when our hearts are greener and our heads are softer. However, the merit of the discussion in this case rests with the professor. I have not had opportunity to express my opinion in the matter."

"I was just about to offer you that opportunity when our friends came in," said Professor Engel, gravely. "I do not know why their presence should be regarded as an interruption. Will you marry me, Jeannette?"

The rose bloomed a little brighter in her cheek, the clear, straightforward eyes drooped for an instant; but she knew—this wise, simple Jeannette—that the question had been waiting for her the past six months, and there was no reason why she should meet it now with astonishment and trepidation. So, like a brave, sensible woman as she was, she answered frankly:

"With all my heart," and put her hand cordially in the one extended, to seal the compact.

"To have and to hold, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish,"—recited the professor, with grave tenderness.

"Till death us do part," responded Jeannette, solemnly.

A profound silence succeeded, in which the bold woor reverently pressed to his lips the hand that he held, and bowed his head as though under the invocation of a blessing.

Then Dell, who had been standing before the grate, arrested in the act of drawing off her gloves by this unexpected and altogether surprising scene, suddenly threw up her hands and dropped into a chair with a breathless and horrified exclamation:

"Have you got that down?" she asked of the reporter, jotting away unnoticed in her quiet corner.

Jeannette and the professor looked around with a little start.

"Oh, yes, your folly is on record," said Roy Sherwood, with the air of an exasperated guardian rebuking two wayward, foolish and disobedient children. "Can there be anything more heartrending than this?" he added, turning to the reporter with a tragically-appalling look.

That unsocial individual shuffled her notes significantly.

"Read them," said Professor Engel, briefly.

"Read them!" reiterated Jeannette, in answer to an inquiring glance.

"Well, I must say, Jeannette, you seem to have taken a very tame, inactive part in this discussion," commented Dell, severely, at the close of the reading. "The professor has matters all his own way."

"It is always such a good way, you know," returned Jean, contentedly.

"The fact is, you oughtn't to have attempted the consideration of such grave, important subjects in the absence of your humble servant," said Roy, in an injured tone. "There was a chance for a grand, masterly argument, but you have made a weak, slipshod, one-sided, imperfect, inconsequent thing of it. And, oh!" he added, with a theatrical gesture of hopeless sorrow and regret, "had I but been here, I might have averted this final catastrophe!"

"If you please, good people," spoke up the scribe, who had come to the end of her paper, "what is to be the heading of this Club report?"

"Why, 'How Jeannette and the professor discussed the truth,'" said Dell, drolly.

"And thereby came to grief," subjoined Roy, with a dædal look at the happy faces opposite.

GIVING ADVICE.—We must use the gentlest manners and softest tones of address; our advice must not fall like a violent storm, bearing down and making those to droop whom it is meant to cherish and refresh. It must descend as the dew upon the tender herb, or like melting flakes of snow; the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon and the deeper it sinks into the mind. If there are few who have the humility to receive advice as they ought, it is often because there are few who have the discretion to convey it in a proper manner.

A GREAT mind is formed by a few great ideas, not by an infinity of loose details.

UNSATISFIED.

BY H. N. ROCKWELL.

JUST what it is to me, if I could tell,
This strong and sweet and bitter cup of life,
To him whom I have loved and honored well
In all my darkest hours and saddest strife;
It would be rest to lay before his feet,
If but for once, the heavy cross I bear,
And read in his dear eyes a pity sweet
And royal as his soul is great and rare.
Why is the life I did not ask so sad?
And why so sweet, when all its joy must fade?
In this lone, starlit dusk, I would be glad
If I could reach beyond the chilling shade,
And touch his vesture as he walks serene
On heights my tearful eyes have dimly seen!

This I know surely, if I now must choose,
I would not blot from life its hours of pain,
If all its past I too must yield and lose,
Though the slow days were often dark and vain.
If I have read him truly—strong of mind,
Lofty of soul, and innocent of heart,
From mine, found worthy once so close to bind,
He cannot to a narrower spirit part.
Then let me rise to nobler aims and thought,
Rich by my losses, gladder for my tears,
And weave the tangled threads the past has brought,
To robes of beauty for the coming years;
Till in my life's pure shining all may see
'Tis happiness to love him worthily.

WHEN SUMMER COMES.

BY CATHERINE KINGSTON FILER.

WHEN comes the golden, golden Summer,
And daisies blow, and daisies blow,
When all the woods are verdure-clad,
And warblers sing with trillings glad,
And by the brooks the blossoms grow.
Oh! we will roam the live-long day
O'er hills and meadow-lands away—
From dawn of day, till day is done,
Will sing till song shall reach the sun!

We'll pluck the berries, ripe and red,
That gleam among their dewy leaves;
We'll taste the plum of purple hue;
We'll roam the fields of barley through,
And nestle 'neath the shining sheaves,
See swaths of golden fall about,
And list the merry reapers shout—
And as the gleaming sickles swing,
A song of Summer years we'll sing!

Oh, meadows, waiting for our feet!
Oh, flowers, that blossom for our sight!
Oh, glossy-cheeked fruits, that glow
Through foliage where the saphyrs blow!
Oh, morn, of most refulgent light!
Time's coming, coming, coming,
When 'mong all beauties gladly roaming,
We'll rest 'neath forests' shadowing leaves,
Or listless lie among the sheaves!

WORKING AND RESTING.

BY SARAH HART.

"JOHN, I wish you would call at Mrs. Flinn's on your way to town and ask her to come next week and help me clean house. It's getting pretty late, and I don't like to put it off so long."

The man took a step or two forward, then turned toward the tall, spare, hollow-eyed woman, who was his wife, and answered: "Is it really necessary, Susan?"

A glance around the room was her answer.

"Let it go this fall," said the man. "I'm sure it don't look very bad."

"Oh, John! The house is dreadful dirty. Look at the walls and windows."

"Pooh! I see dirtier ones every day." Then, as if another thought had struck him, he said: "Couldn't you do a part this week and a part next?"

"I don't know. Perhaps so."

The answer came in discouraged tones, and the churning was continued in nervous, spasmodic jerks.

The man saw her discouraged look, and said, as he went out: "Well, if you must, I reckon I can let her know."

"I don't see how it is," said he, soliloquizing, as he trotted his horse at a slow rate along the winding prairie road. "I can't see how it is that Susan thinks she must hire so much done. Looks like she ought to be able to do all she has to do. Now in harvest time it comes a little hard for her. I hire three or four men then, that makes more cooking, but then I've heard wimmen say they'd as soon cook for six as two. Now, there's my mother; she used to cook for eight or ten men in harvest time and had seven children to do for. We've only four youngsters and don't milk half as many cows as father used to. But I reckon the wimmen them days were made of better stuff than now-a-days. Git up, Dobbin. I've hired a heap o' work done fur Susan this year. She had help when we killed, and then she was sick and 'Nerv Gilman come and stayed two weeks, and I had to give her five dollars and her board. I couldn't very well afford it, either, for my mowing-machine must be paid for this fall and I want to buy some more stock, too, this fall, and I must have a corn-planter next spring. But here, if I haven't passed Mrs. Flinn's and didn't stop. Git up, Dobbin."

What was the hollow-eyed, tired-looking woman thinking of all this time? Thinking of! She had no time to think of anything but work. The churning was not done, the breakfast dishes were unwashed, the milk was not skimmed, the week's ironing stared her in the face and last, but not least, was the little one tugging at her skirts, begging for nourishment. But it does not cry, so she keeps on at the churning until the little one's patience is exhausted and its screams are heard above the splash, dash, splash of the churn. The mother can no longer resist—baby must be cared for though all else go untouched.

She was naturally a tidy woman, and as she looked around upon the untidy house she grew nervous almost to despair and the tears fell fast upon the baby face at her breast.

Oh, how welcome are these silent visitors when the heart is overburdened with either grief or trial! They seem to be the rivers that wash our hearts from selfishness.

Mrs. Wilton wept long and bitterly; but when the tears were wiped away so also was her burden of toil and care, and tenderly kissing her sleeping babe she laid him in his crib and went about her work cheerfully, if not contented. She possessed a cheerful disposition naturally, but she was not a stranger to those hopes and aspirations that come to most of us to cheer our discontent. She loved beautiful things. She loved nature, and longed for a stroll over the prairie that lay broad and bright around her. But she found very little encouragement for luxuries, even the luxury of a ramble out of doors.

Her husband was a sordid, money-loving, money-getting man, who saw no use for anything that there was no money in. He knew all the ways and means of money getting and money keeping. He had taken his wife from a loving home in an Eastern State and made for himself a home on the prairies of the West. He was deemed a very shrewd man by the neighbors around. He knew when to buy stock and when to sell. He knew when a piece of land was worth buying or selling and was always getting some "good chance." His wife had long ago found out that money was his idol, and everything must be sacrificed to it—even herself she sometimes thought, when, with aching head and tired feet, she had sought her pillow. Thus the years had gone by until few would recognize in the hollow-eyed, sunken-cheeked, prematurely-old woman, the fresh, rosy girl John Wilton had brought there eight years before.

Mrs. Wilton did not ask her husband if he had stopped at Mrs. Flinn's; she supposed of course that he had; and the following week she watched every day for her expected help. Watched but not waited, but as the hours went by she began the task and kept at it until all was done.

Mr. Wilton pretended not to see all this. He kept aloof as much as possible so as to avoid any explanation he might be called upon to make; but when alone by himself, he said: "Well, Susan is getting along nicely, after all. She'll have the house shipin' agin Saturday night, and then I'll just give her the money I'd had to pay Mrs. Flinn. It'll go toward buyin' the winter things for the family," and he gave the well-filled pocketbook a loving squeeze.

Saturday night found the house all shining, as Mr. Wilton had prophesied, but Mrs. Wilton looked more tired and worn than ever. It had been a hard week for her, and even the clean house was hardly a recompense. But Mr. Wilton felt satisfied. Strange that he could not perceive the odor of the essence of life in the shining windows and whitened walls; but he only said, as he glanced about him:

"The house-cleaning is over, eh? Well, here's five dollars to pay your woman with," and he chuckled to himself, for he well knew some of it would come back to him in the shape of socks and under-shirts.

"I wouldn't, for four times that much, feel so worn out as I do to-night," sighed Mrs. Wilton to herself, as she thanked him, and stowed the pittance away for future use.

The weeks wore on toward winter, and Mrs. Wilton sighed heavily as she thought of the garments, large and small, to be bought and made. First, John must be fitted up; then the four little ones, and lastly, herself. Her own share would be slim, she thought, but then she had not much out-door work to do, and she could get along with less. But, oh! she did long so much for a new merino dress, with bright, warm tints, or a pair of gloves, or a collar and a bit of ribbon for her neck. But these were not to be thought of. Nothing but bare necessities could be hers, for John had been buying stock, and had paid for his mowing-machine, and met a note or two, and he felt "quite poor," he said.

Poor woman! She had not had a nice dress since her marriage. Then she had a good supply—but things will wear out, and most of these were now doing duty as childrens' clothes or skirts for herself, and her best dress now was a cheap delaine. She sighed just a little, half-mothered sigh, as she thought of all this on the day she went to lay out her money. It did not take her long to dispose of the small amount, for she had laid awake nights, pondering how to make one dollar do the duty of two, and the problem was worked out with the utmost precision.

Now that the goods were purchased, the next trouble was how to get them made soon enough. She had been obliged to put off purchasing for want of means, and now she could not tell which was most needed.

"If I only could get some one to help me for a week, I could soon see my way clear," said Mrs. Wilton to her husband one evening, as she sat stitching on the little garments; "or better still, had I a sewing-machine," she ventured to say.

Mr. Wilton knocked the ashes off his cigar, and said: "I don't see how it is, Susan, that you're always complaining of having so much to do, and wanting help all the time. Why, there's mother, she never used to think of hiring any work done. She used to make everything for eight of us, and weave all the cloth besides."

Mrs. Wilton did not answer, her heart was too full.

"Now-a-days, the wimmen want so much help to get rid of work," continued Mr. Wilton. "I'd like to get a sewin'-machine, but it's out of the question now, there's so much to be got."

Mrs. Wilton thought of the mower and the corn-planter, but she said nothing; she felt a little pang shoot through her heart, then it sank back again as a heavy load. She did not go to bed that night until long after her husband was sleeping soundly. She had worked hard all day, and sleep would be a welcome guest, but the little garment was much needed, and she must sit up and make it. Oh, how her tired eyes ached, but not worse than the poor, hungry heart ached for sympathy and comfort. She thought of her money-loving husband, and wished he might become more thoughtful of her comfort. "If it were not for my children," she cried to herself, "I could see very little to live for." Then the thought of her little ones, motherless, sent the fresh tears to her eyes, but gave a sudden impulse to her tired fingers, and she stitched away for another hour and saw the garment completed, and neatly folding it away, she sought her much-needed rest.

Sabbath morning Mr. Wilton put on a warm, new undershirt, and saw his little ones looking fresh and sweet in their new garments; but he saw not that the fingers which had so patiently wrought out these changes were that morning scarcely strong enough to fasten the garments of the little ones about their chubby little forms.

Spring came, bright and joyous as ever, dotting the prairies with flowers and filling upland and valley with floods of melody. Mrs. Wilton had been growing thinner and paler all winter, and was now scarcely able to be about the house. The doctor had recommended rest—but how could she rest with so much lying undone about her?

"If I could only go away for awhile," she said, one morning, when she was feeling weaker than usual. "If I could only go home to mother for a visit, I know she could nurse me up all right again," and the pale lips quivered visibly.

"I wish you could, I'm sure," replied her husband. "But, Susan, I don't see how I can afford it. I might sell some of my stock, but prices are so low now, it wouldn't pay at all. I couldn't get much more for them calves than I give for 'em last fall, after keeping 'em all winter. And buying my corn-planter, about took all my cash."

Mrs. Wilton did not reply. Indeed, I doubt very much if she heard his remarks at all, for she was dreaming of the old homestead, with its wide gables and large, comfortable rooms—of the stately maples, that she knew were now putting out their young blossoms from their candelabra-shaped limbs—of the sloping meadow, with its violet-covered hillsides—of the robin's nest in the cherry-tree; and, above all, of the sweet, old face that loomed up through all, and with outstretched arms yearned to embrace her tired birdling in the home-nest.

John Wilton glanced at her as he went out of the door, and mistook the flush of anticipated joy for the bloom of health, and went off saying: "I guess she'll get better as the days get warmer. I will try to hire somebody for her this summer."

"I can do nothing for her," said Dr. Graves, to Mr. Wilton, who had followed him out of Mrs. Wilton's sick-chamber.

"Nothing for her? My God, doctor! You don't mean she is past all help!" and John Wilton's heart seemed to stand still for a moment.

"I did not say she was past help," replied the doctor. "The truth is, Mr. Wilton, your wife is worked down; and unless she has rest and plenty of it, she will die. And, I may as well say, she will never get rest here. She must go away where she will have no care of house or family or she will die. You may find another wife, but your children will never find another mother." So saying, the good doctor drove away.

The door was partly open, and Mrs. Wilton had heard, in her sick chamber, the doctor's words, and her heart gave a great leap; which, undoubtedly, would have created alarm for her had the doctor known it.

Oh, if she could only go home! Home to the old homestead—home to mother and rest, rest, rest. Oh, how long it had seemed since she realized the full meaning of that word. Even while she lay there she seemed to hear her mother's voice, and feel her soft hand caressing her. But the next moment came the realizing sense of the impossibility of such happiness. How could she go with the children, now that she was so weak; and how could she go without them? And how could she be spared to go, and, lastly, how could John afford to let her go? All hope seemed lost when she looked the matter straight in the face, and she turned her white face to the wall and shut her eyes as if to keep back the tears which she felt were coming.

Meantime, John Wilton was thoroughly aroused. He stood for a long time just where the doctor had left him. After a time, he started up as if seized by a new impulse and went into the house, to his wife's sick room. Mrs. Wilton was lying very still, with her face turned from him. He went softly up to her bedside, to see if she was sleeping. A ray of sunlight, coming through the torn window-shade, revealed a tear, trembling beneath the half-closed lids, and John Wilton turned away with a sigh, so deep, that his wife turned feebly on her pillow, and without opening her eyes, asked:

"What is it, John? What is wrong?"

"I am wrong, Susie, dear!"

It had been many a day since Mrs. Wilton had heard him call her Susie, and it was no wonder that she opened her eyes wide in astonishment.

He was at her bedside now, trembling like a convict.

"Do you hate me, Susie?"

"John, what a question! You know better!"

"You are an angel, or you would hate me. Here I have been killing you by inches for years, and never thought, until to-day, that you might be mortal. The doctor has been telling me that—that—"

"I heard it all, John," said Mrs. Wilton, the tears trickling slowly down her wan cheeks.

"Did you? Well, Susie, it shall be as he said. You shall have rest. You shall go home to mother, and stay a year, if need be."

"But how can you spare me, John?"

"How could I spare you forever?" whispered her husband.

"But, John, how can you afford it?"

"Well enough. But we must not talk about it now; you are too weak to be excited about anything. You are to get well as fast as you can, and in two weeks we will all be off to mother's."

Mr. Wilton proved a true prophet, for in two weeks' time Mrs. Wilton was far enough recovered to begin the journey. How far the prospect of that journey went toward making her able to undertake it, we will not say.

Mr. Wilton accompanied his wife. It was too much for her to undertake to go alone with the children, the doctor said, and Mr. Wilton was very obedient, cheerfully acquiescing in every suggestion and even suggesting things for her comfort, that he once would have thought unnecessary expenditure. But Mr. Wilton was not minding the expense now. He had sold his young stock for much less than he paid for them, that his wife might be nursed back to life and health. And he could but rejoice at the sacrifice when he saw her eyes grow bright and her step elastic.

"Stay as long as you please," was his parting message to his wife, as he bade her adieu at the door of the homestead.

Six months Susan Wilton stayed in the home nest. Oh, what a joyous, thorough rest was that! It seemed so good to wander about the old place again, almost as free from care, as in her girlhood days, now gathering the flowers from the hillsides, or bathing her tired feet in the meadow brook, or sitting beneath the shadows of the stately maples, twining their leaves into garlands, hunting hens' nests with the children, and enjoying all their games with a relish she never dreamed she could feel again. And what a joy to sit for hours at the feet of her who first guided her own faltering steps. The poor worn-out woman drank in every moment of joy as though she knew the cup would not always be so full.

But with returning health came a strong desire to return home and to its duties and cares once more. So, one morning in early winter, she left her good-byes among the hills of her old home, and went back to life's every-day duties with a glad and thankful heart. But the old life with its ceaseless round of work and "toil without recompense" was over. There were to be no more yearnings for sympathy, no more words of disapprobation, no more of the "penny wise and pound foolish" economy. Husband and wife share alike in comforts, and the old, hard life was buried.

"It is your everyday experiences which cultivate you,—the little silent workings within and without,—slower, perhaps, than the uprisal of the coral island, but just as sure. It may take years to bring you above the surface; but every shell that you throw off raises you so much higher."

RELIGIOUS READING.

LIGHT IN DARKNESS.

FROM "THE LITTLE SANCTUARY,"

BY ALEXANDER RALEIGH, D.D.

THERE is little need to say, for those who are in practical busy life know full well how many its difficulties are, its complexities, its uncertainties, and how great the darkness is which sometimes gathers over the aspect of affairs. No sphere or department of human life is exempted. In every family of any size difficulties occur, greater or less, in the course of years. In some instances very great difficulties, which give to the heads of the family, as to the most responsible members of it, the deepest solicitude. What to do for the welfare of each, and of all. When to be firm, when to be lenient. How to maintain the Christian family law and order when you have many varieties of disposition, and, necessarily, a good deal of thoughtlessness in the young creatures, and in some even selfishness and obstinacy. How to set each as well out in life as the circumstances permit, injured as little as possible in any respect, freighted as much as possible with precious memories which it will be pleasant for them on days, now distant, to recall. Do you think this whole family discipline and history can be gone through in any worthy manner without coming at times "under the cloud," without passing at times, as it were, "through the sea?" Nor can the darkness be dispelled by any set of rules. No two families are alike; no two sets of circumstances. What may be quite wise to do in one case would be foolish in another. What would in one case be very successful, in another would quite fail. There is a book bearing the title of "A short and easy Method with the Deists." There is no short and easy method with the children, or with the household. There is only the method of constant watchfulness, constant care, constant denial of self, constant endeavor to do all possible good—in one word, the maintenance in everything of the great law of Christian uprightness, administered, of course, in the spirit of the Christian love, in the belief that light, as it is needed, will arise.

And the light does arise. See, the family is reared. One by one they grow up, and pass out and away. And the jar, and the anguish, and the shadow are forgotten things, or leave only legacies of tenderness and wisdom behind. And this is the process through which you and yours are passing. And the whole scene will be over soon, and then you will be sorry if you have to look back and see that you fainted, and in some measure lost your opportunity.

In business, too, the question often is—what to do? To make the movement, or to abstain. To accept or reject that offer. To write by this day's post, or wait until to-morrow. To trust that man, or to keep clear of him. To borrow money and extend for profit, or to be content with less and be more safe. To take a partner, or wait for a son. No end of questions of this kind come up for impetuous settlement. Experience cannot settle them. The advice of others cannot settle them; for, indeed, advisers are sometimes about equally divided in opinion. Acquiescence cannot settle them; and yet these difficulties are settled to Christian men who preserve their uprightness, and go industriously and steadily on their way.

They use their best judgment. They choose what seems the wisest course. "In all their ways they acknowledge Him, and He directs their path."

Nor is it any way different in the highest things of all. Religion in its organized forms in this world, and in its practical operations, is not exempted from the ordinary laws and vicissitudes of human life. Societies and Christian churches have their times of darkness, their trials, their disappointments. They fall upon the best methods they can think of to extend their cause—the very truth of God—among men. And you would think that God is almost bound by the terms of His own covenant to lift an endeavor like that quite above the ordinary plane of things, and into a realm of visible clearness and certainty. But, no. In a sense it is true that "all things happen alike to all." Religious people must not suppose that, because they are banded together in the name of Christ, and because they resolve on doing this or that from love and loyalty to Him, therefore that thing must be furthered, and must, at once, and visibly, succeed. This is true—that all faithful work, in one form or other, will succeed. But in order to the ultimate prosperity, successive disappointments may be necessary, and the ultimate prosperity, when it comes, may assume other forms than those which were anticipated and wrought for. God is in earnest, and never lets His Providence linger. But, also, God has time enough, and He takes it. He takes it, and teaches His people to take it; to take not "their time," which is indolent unfaithfulness, but His time. He educates by trial, by delay, by defeat. Nor should all this introduce the least incertitude unto the purpose or plan or habit of our action. Our duty is left exactly as it was. We must still keep to our design, if it still seems right. We must go along the line that seems the line of duty. It is to us, meantime, what it seems. Does the purpose seem true and noble? Then nobly suffer for it, and patiently wait to see what good thing God will bring out of it, for empty and dark eternally it cannot be. "Light is sown for the righteous," but, like all living seed, it takes a while to spring. The days of sorrow are sometimes chill and dark. The bright harvest days will make amends for all.

From all these illustrations we have the one lesson still arising, that the only thing about which we need be heartily anxious is righteousness—soul-sincerity—a simple and pure honesty of the heart. This is the one thing which Christ died to recover us to, and reproduce in us, which the whole Gospel will help us to attain, which all the laws and revelations of God sanction and defend, and which will, at length, fully satisfy all who "hunger and thirst" after it. Having it, all matters, whether of faith, of experience, or of practice, will go rightly in the main. Darkness will fall now and again, but the light will arise out of it. God, the Director of all onward steps, the Guide of all pilgrim people, will lead us along the path of the just that "shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

RABIA, a devout Arab woman, being asked in her last illness how she endured the extremity of her sufferings, answered, "They who look upon God's face do not feel His hand."

LOSS AND GAIN.

AT the end of the old year and the beginning of the new, business men usually take an account of stock and square their books to see how much they have lost or gained. If their books have been properly kept, they can ascertain their losses or gains to the value of a cent. But the most precious values cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. One man may have gained more that is of real value by losing his money, than another has by making the largest gains. There is an invisible account running through day-book and ledger, parallel with the visible one, which often varies widely from it, and which is of much more importance. The profit or loss of each transaction is estimated by different standards. In some transactions the natural book may show that there was a great gain. But if it was made at the expense of truth, integrity and charity, the inner book will show a great loss in the most precious treasures of life. On the contrary, the ledger may show a loss; but if temptation was resisted, and the principles of charity in business were adhered to, there was a spiritual gain. The man himself grew richer, and his means of happiness were increased. Thus, some may be growing really rich every day, while they seem to be growing poorer; on the other hand, men may add millions to their estate, and be advancing into spiritual bankruptcy, by every dollar they make.—N. J. Messenger.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

PARENTAL DUTY.

FROM "THOUGHTS IN MY GARDEN,"

BY MARY G. WARE.

I HAVE said that parental government should at first be entirely arbitrary. How long it should continue so must depend upon the rapidity with which the mental powers of the child unfold themselves. If you attempt to reason with a child, in order to convince his understanding of the difference between right and wrong, before he is old enough to appreciate what you say, you will confuse and worry him if he is of a mild disposition, and you will confuse and irritate him if he is combative. In neither case have you made obedience easier to him or control easier to yourself. You must judge of the use of your reasoning by the effect it produces, and not be impatient to see your child a man in comprehension, while he is scarcely more than an infant in years. Very early development of conscience or reason in a child is almost always the result of a diseased brain, and should never be sought for nor encouraged. The memoirs of pious little children, so often found in juvenile libraries, would be far more appropriate in the library of the medical student; for they illustrate a peculiar form of disease, and not a healthy growth.

If your child at seven years of age is affectionate and obedient, you should be content with him, though he does not accurately reason about right and wrong. Affection and obedience will go hand in hand with the child, if the power you have exercised over him has been truly parental. If you find him fearful toward you, seeking to avoid you in his pursuits, and silent and constrained in your presence, you have made a mistake somewhere. You have exercised too much power or too little affection, or you have not sympathized enough in his pursuits and pleasures; or perhaps you have laughed at him, which, to a sensitive child, is of all hard things the hardest to bear. You may be content with your child if he is simply obedient, but do not be content with yourself unless he is affectionate also. If he loves you as a companion in his walks, and his talks, and his sports, and yet is obedient to you when you do not indulge him in his wishes, then it is well with the child and with you also.

Different children require very different modes of training. In the vegetable world, not only do different species of plants require different modes of treatment, but even different varieties of the same species. What will be entirely favorable to one kind of apple or pear, will be entirely destructive to another. So with children in the same family; one needs to be encouraged, and another to be restrained; one needs protection, while another is as well or better without it; some are discouraged by opposition, while to others it is exciting; and so on with endless variety. To do justice to a family of children, much thought must be given to their peculiarities. The father and mother must not feel that when they have provided for the material wants of the children, and sent them to school, they have done what is most important. Careful and troubled about the many things that constitute the comfort of life they may have been, but there is one thing absolutely needful; and if they would choose the better part they must not exhaust all their strength and thought in providing for that which belongs only to this world.

Children are not gifts to be held as your personal property, and to do with as you please. You hold them simply in trust from the Lord; and you will have presently to account to Him for the care you have taken of them. He is saying to you in His Holy Word now, just as authoritatively as He said to the disciples when He walked openly in Judea: "Suffer little children to come unto Me." Are you leading them to Him, or are you shutting them out from Him? You are doing one of these things, for no parental influence is negative.

If the father of a family looks upon making money as the paramount duty of his life, and the mother puts keeping the house and clothing the children above all other duties, the lives of both are perpetually forbidding the little children to come near the Lord. Most persons are obliged to spend their days in work for the support and comfort of the body, and industry is one of the greatest virtues; but this does not make it needful that the mind should be absorbed in work to the exclusion of everything else. Such a life is slavery of the basest kind, because self-assumed; and the more wealth that is accumulated by such labor, the more degrading becomes the bondage.

Some of the finest examples of parental education I have ever seen have been among persons who were compelled by poverty to lives of constant labor; and no class of human beings afford examples more numerous or more reprehensible of parental neglect, than those whose wealth places them beyond the necessity of effort.

Perhaps I can best illustrate the ideas I wish to present by examples. There was once a family in the circle of my acquaintance containing many children, the father and mother of whom, beginning in narrow circumstances had arrived at a somewhat advanced age, their children grown up around them, and property enough laid by for an easy independence. Both parents had been indefatigably industrious, the one in his calling, the other in her household; but their industry had limited itself, almost entirely, to life in its relations with this world. The mother had begun life with religious impressions and feelings, but the cares of this world overcame them, and choked them up. The children grew up indifferent to spiritual things, and with passions uncontrolled by principle. I was more than once present in this family when the most painful exhibitions were made of ill-temper and irreverence; but on one such occasion the mother turned to me, with tears in her eyes, and said: "I have lived a life of toil and care for my family, and I felt at the time that I was doing as I ought; but now, in my old age, my children prove to me that I have been unfaithful to my highest duty." What a conviction to carry to one's grave! Never, in the whole course of my life, have I seen physical poverty or suffering that seemed to me so pitiful as the spiritual destitution and grief of that mother.

Another example will ever remain green in my memory, of the mother of a large family of young children, left a widow, and entirely destitute. She was a woman of profound religious principle, and she took up her cross and bore it steadfastly. Her children saw that she governed herself and them from the highest and purest motives, and they followed as she led the way. A life of patient industry still left her time to inculcate wise principles in the hearts of her children, and they remained faithful to them. No black sheep marred the beauty of her fold. She fed the lambs intrusted to her care, remembering that they belonged to the Lord; and the best success has attended them thus far through life.

Such examples are not rare or peculiar. They are types of the two great classes into which humanity is divided. The one sees this world only, and lives only for the favors and rewards that this world can give. The other is ever looking through and beyond the things of this world, and valuing them as leading to something higher, something eternal. I do not mean to say that one class is entirely worldly-minded, and the other entirely heavenly-minded; for absolute perfection or depravity does not belong to this world. What I mean is, that in every human being there is a central and supreme love that dominates over all the other affections, giving them an upward or a downward tendency, according as it aspires to Heaven or clings to this world. In the social relations of life the character of this central love is not usually distinctly shown; but in the freedom of home it appears much more clearly, and it acts upon the impressible minds of children with very great power. Every time a child perceives that its parents do things to please society, or refrain from doing things through fear of society, he takes a lesson from them in worldly servility; and every time he perceives that they do things because they are right, or abstain from doing things because they are wrong, he takes a lesson in Christian freedom.

It is no uncommon thing for a child to be more severely rebuked or punished for offending against manners than against morals. The parent is mortified and angry at the rudeness or awkwardness of a child, but only moderately sorry if he lies. The child soon learns to look upon rudeness as a greater offence than lying, and acts accordingly. In very little children lying is sometimes even laughed at as being very funny, or as showing great brightness. As the child grows older, and becomes confirmed in the habit, the parents begin to wonder at his depravity, and finally set it down as a general rule that all children are liars. Lying is no doubt a fearfully common vice; but so far as my observation has gone, it is much more common with grown people than with children. The difference between the true and the false is one of the earliest distinctions a child can appreciate, and the parent cannot be too careful in teaching him to speak the truth, both by example and precept. If a child finds that his parents are faithful in keeping their promises to him, and that they never deceive him in any way, he will respect the truth in them; and if he sees that falsehood always grieves and troubles them, he will be sure to avoid it. He should be taught that it is a sin against God to tell a lie, and therefore an act to be very sorry for. If parents are angry or violent toward a child, they destroy their moral power over him, and he looks upon what he has done as merely an offence against them. If they are impressed with a true feeling of reverence for God's law, they will not be angry when their child offends against it, but sorry; and their sorrow will awaken a true feeling of penitence in the child, which will make him strive to abstain from a repetition of his offence, with far more earnestness than could have been induced by any degree of anger or severity. Violence in the parent weakens only fear toward the parent, while it is fear of the sin that can alone regenerate the child's heart. Fear toward the parent will lead him to hide his wrong doings; but fear toward sin will lead him to put it away. He cannot be too early taught to feel the nearness of his Heavenly Father, and the impossibility of hiding anything from Him. Parents must, however, beware that their own lives show that they feel all that they teach; for if children find a nicer morality is expected from them than their parents practise in their own persons, they will soon see through and despise the hypocrisy. If you would make your child reverent, and obedient, and truthful, you must make your own life the exemplification of your teachings. You have no right to expect your child to be better than yourself; but if he should be—for a child much oftener rises above his education than sinks below it—you must remember that his respect for you must diminish in proportion as his virtue increases.

THE MISERIES OF SELF-IMPORTANCE.

THERE is no surer way to make ourselves miserable than to think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. It isolates us from all about us. It cuts us off alike from human sympathy and divine assistance. It makes us very Ishmaels, with our hands against every man and every man's hands apparently against us. It gives a jaundiced hue to the behavior of those who, so far from meaning to do evil to us, have our best interests at heart, and love us with self-sacrificing affection. The man who has a wound about him, no matter where it may be, feels it to be always in his way. Let him do what he will, or go where he may, he cannot move himself but he is conscious of its pain. In like manner he who has this feeling of self-importance is continually smarting. Somebody has always been slighting him. He is constantly complaining of having been insulted, and when honor is given to another he feels nothing but that he has been overlooked. Thus he shuts himself out from every festival, and mopes most of all when others are merry. May God deliver us from this idolatry of self, on whose altar all true nobleness and real happiness are completely immolated.

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

THE CAMPANERO OR BELL BIRD.

THIS remarkable and curious bird is found in the primeval forests of Guiana. The attention of the traveller in those regions is quickly attracted to it, as well from the brilliancy of its plumage, as from the wonderful resemblance of its cry or song to the tolling of a bell. It is about the size of our common thrush, or "thrasher." The male bird, whose song it is that has given the species its trivial name, is of a pure snowy white. The female is a very different-looking bird, being of a dull-green above, with a blackish head, and yellowish with green streaks beneath.

From the forehead of the male rises a singular tubular appendage, often furnished with a few small feathers. This, when empty, hangs down, but can be filled with air by an opening from the palate, and then rises erect to the height of nearly three inches. Whilst the bird is uttering its strange cry, this rubber-like horn fills out and stands up very straight and firm; a fact which goes to show that it has something to do with the sound that the Campanero makes. The bird generally takes his place on the top of a lofty tree, and his tolling can be heard to the distance of three miles. It resounds through the forest, not only at morning and evening, but also at mid-day, when the heat of the sun has imposed silence on almost every other creature.

"I was greatly astonished," says a South American traveller, "the first time I heard the Campanero ring his bell. I was in one of the great forests of Guiana. Birds were singing as we journeyed along. The day was hot, and the air heavy with the odor of hundreds of rare and lovely flowers. Toward noon the voices of our feathered friends grew silent, and all seemed strangely still. Suddenly there rang out on the still air the clear, sweet notes of a bell, loud enough to be heard at a league's distance. It was not like a church bell, but finer in tone. We all started and listened in voiceless astonishment. For about a minute all was again still. Birds, insects, every living thing, seemed to listen. Then out rang the clear bell once more—not in one stroke, but many, ringing through the forest its sweet and silvery chimes. A pause of another minute followed, and then the bell rang again. Another pause, this time of nearly ten minutes, when the bell filled the air with its music once more.

"It is the Campanero," said our guide. "See!" and he pointed to a snow-white bird, about the size of a pigeon, high up on the limb of a tree a few hundred yards away from the place where we stood. I could not believe it possible those bell-like sounds were made by this bird; but, even while we looked at him, he rang out his wonderful chimes again, then lifted his wings and flew away."

"The genus Chamorrhyncus, to which this singularly interesting belongs, embraces," says a writer in the Albany Cultivator, "four well-defined species each one inhabiting a distinct region of tropical America, almost to the entire exclusion of the others. The most striking characteristic which distinguishes these Bell Birds is the development, in the adult males, of naked skin and fleshy wattles on various portions of the head and neck. In all the known four species, the adult males are either partly or wholly of a pure snowy whiteness, with more or less of these cutaneous developments; and the females generally of a dull green above and yellowish beneath, without any of the singular excrescences of the head and neck which so strikingly distinguish the male sex."

Describing the Araponga, or naked-throated Bell Bird of Brazil, another species, the same writer says:

"Its music may be heard at all hours of the day, and when it so happens—which is frequently the case—that several of these birds are in the same vicinity, and commence their vocal melody, singing in opposition, or in answering to each other, almost wonderful concert is the result. The notes are loud and clear, and may justly be compared to the sounds proceeding from a clear-ringing bell, and oftentimes to be heard, borne through the stillness of the evening air, for the distance of three or four miles, sometimes repeated at prolonged intervals, and again following each other in quick succession. In the latter case, they are more like the sound produced by the blacksmith, when he strikes a piece of refined steel upon his anvil—whence the bird has received from the Portuguese settlers the significant appellation of Ferrador—the Smith.

"In commencing its song, the first notes uttered are extremely harsh and grating to the ear; these, in a short time, are succeeded by six or eight fine, clear, metallic, ringing notes, with an interval of about a second between each two. The resemblance of these notes to the sound from an anvil is most extraordinary. The clear, metallic ring, repeated at about the same rate that a blacksmith strikes upon the steel, is so perfect, that many persons upon hearing it are unwilling to believe the sound could be produced by the delicate organs forming the vocal apparatus of so small a bird. When in full song, it becomes easily disturbed by any unusual sounds proceeding from the forest beneath, and quickly ceases its melody. The bird makes the most extraordinary gesticulations when producing these sounds. When commencing its song it usually stands in an upright position, with the head thrown directly aloft, and as it proceeds, it gradually sinks it beneath, then violently throwing itself forward and downward seemingly to assist, in this remarkable manner, to pour forth its final notes."

ON GUARD.

"OH, mamma! See that wicked-looking cat on the fence! She'll have one of those dear little rabbits in a minute!" Mattie's sweet face grew pale with fear, and she trembled all over.

"It's only a picture, my dear," said Mattie's mother. "The cat can't get down, and so the rabbits are safe."

"But it looks as if she could—as if she'd jump right upon the dear little things. I wish there was a big dog like Old Lion there. Wouldn't he make her fly?"

"But it's only a picture. If there was a dog there, he couldn't bark nor spring at the cat."

"Why didn't the man who made the picture put in a dog somewhere, so that we could see him and know the rabbits were safe?"

"Maybe he didn't think of it," said Mattie's mother.

"I wish he had."

"Perhaps," said the mother, "he wished to teach us this lesson, that, as there are evil and hurtful things in the world, we should never be so entirely off of our guard as the children playing with the rabbits seem to be. Dear little things! How innocent and happy they are! There

Mattie drew a long sigh, as she stood before her mother, looking soberly into her face.

"I wish there wasn't anything bad in the world," she said. "Nothing that could hurt us."

"Ah, dear child!" answered the mother, her voice echoing Mattie's sigh, "from millions and millions of hearts that wish comes up daily. But we have this to cheer us: if we stand on guard—if we are watchful as well as innocent—we shall rarely get hurt. It is the careless and the thoughtless that harm reaches."

"And so we must always be on guard," said Mattie still looking very sober.

"There is no other way, my child. On guard is the watchword of safety for us all, young and old. But the harm that comes from the outside is of small account compared with the harm that comes from within."

"From within, mother! How can harm come from within? Do you mean bad thoughts and feelings?"

"Yes; and the hurt they do us is deeper and more deadly than any bodily harm, for it is done to the soul. These rabbits are like good and innocent things of the mind, and the cat like evil and cruel things. If you do is not a thought of danger in their minds. And yet, close by them is a great cat, with cruel eyes, ready to spring upon their harmless pets. Yes; I think the artist meant to teach a lesson when he drew this picture."

"What lesson, mother?" asked Mattie. "Oh, I remember," she added, quickly. "You said that it might be to teach us never to be off our guard, because there are evil and hurtful things in the world."

"Yes, and that is a lesson which cannot be learned too early. Baby begins to learn it when he touches the fire and is burnt; when he pulls the cat too hard and she scratches him; when he runs too fast for his little strength, and gets a fall. And children learn it when they venture too near a vicious animal and are kicked or bitten; when they tear their clothes, or get their hands and faces scratched with thorns and briars; when they fall from trees, or into the water, and in many other ways that I need not mention. And men and women learn it very, very often in pains and sorrows too deep for you to comprehend."

not keep watch, in some unguarded moment angry passions will arise and hurt or destroy your good affections; just as this cat, if she were real, would tear or kill the tender rabbits."

"Oh, mother, is it as bad as that?" said Mattie.

"Yes, my dear; just as bad as that. And when any of these good and innocent feelings are destroyed by anger, hatred, jealousy, envy, revenge and the like, then just so much of heavenly good dies in us, and just so far do we come under the power of what is evil and hurtful. Then we turn aside from safe and pleasant ways and walk among briars and thorns. Dear Mattie! consider well the lesson of this picture, and set a watch over your heart daily. But watching is not all. We are told in the Bible to pray as well as watch. All of us, young and old, must do this if we would be in safety; for human will and human effort would all be in vain to overcome evil if divine strength did not flow into them. And unless we desire and pray for this divine strength we cannot receive it."

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

CHRISTMAS IN HEAVEN.

WHAT is she doing in Heaven to-day,
The babe that I buried a year ago?
I laid my beautiful treasure away,
Out of my arms, in December's snow;
The wind from the north blew sharp and cold,
The flakes fell white on the coffin lid—
They said she was wearing a crown of gold—
I thought of the curls in darkness hid.

Out of the mist of that terrible pain,
I watched while they covered my lovely dead;
Stunned and deafened in heart and brain,
How far, far off seemed the words they said
With tender look and with gentle tone
They spoke of the land beyond the sky,
And whispered that God had but claimed His own;
"She was mine, and not His," was my soul's reply.

Dear, patient Saviour, who long ago
Didst bear with Thy servants' unbelief,
Thy love is unchanged to-day, I know—
Forgive the thoughts of that passionate grief!
I feel it was best that Thy hand should lead
My little white lamb to the Heavenly shore;
Oh, blessed Shepherd! Thy flock doth feed
In pastures that bloom forevermore!

And so, on these days of the closing year,
I can think in peace of the child I love;
Perhaps, when the Christmas time draws near,
They keep the feast in the home above;
Perhaps the angel who led the song,
The sweet, new song, which the shepherds heard,
Sings it again to the baby throng,
Repeats the dear story, word for word.

Or perhaps the magi who saw the star,
Tell how it brightened their lonely way;
In mystic beauty it gleamed from afar,
The morning star of the Lord's own day.
And Mary may take up the story then,
And tell how they knelt in the stable-straw,
When the Light of the world and the Hope of men
As a little child in her arms they saw.

Or, better than these, does the Saviour take
The babes to his bosom, and talk to them
Of how He loves them, and how, for their sake,
He came to the manger in Bethlehem?
Perhaps they look up, and their happy eyes
With loving wonder behold the grace,
The light of the infinite sacrifice
Shine down from our Master's most blessed face.

Perhaps—perhaps—but, at least, I am sure
That my child is at home with the Saints in light;
Only the gentle, the good, and the pure
Are talking with her on this Christmas night.
And, so I give thanks, though my eyes are filled
With such tears as my darling will never shed.
I knew it is best as our Father willed;
With Him I can leave her—my precious dead.

UNKNOWN.

BY LILLIE M. BARR.

TWO dear feet that went out and in,
Weary, but willing for Love's sweet sake;
Two strong hands that did gladly win
Broad for the baby's fingers to break,
Two kind eyes that could weep for the grief
For which hands and feet had no relief;
Two open ears for a friend's distress;
Two faithful lips to counsel and bless.
And eyes, and ears, and feet, and hands,
Under a noble soul's commands.

So in our home he lived for years,
And all its chambers were filled with light;
Little we know of cares or fears,
Little of all his struggle and fight.
Never we dreamed that a day could come,
When those dear lips would be cold and dumb;
When those quick feet would have perfect rest,
And tired hands lie on a pulseless breast;
When neither passionate prayers nor tears
Would break the silence of sealed ears.

Lessons hard we have had since then;
But the one most full of sad surprise,
The hardest of all to learn, was when
The dead did open our living eyes,
And we knew our love by its depth of loss;
Our friend, by the weight of our daily cross;
Our guide, by our wandering far astray;
Our strength, when we fainted by the way.

So angels clad in our mortal clay
Bring us full often our daily bread,
And we know them not till they go away,
And the gift is gone and the giver dead.
Gone—but their memory lingereth yet,
Wet with the tears of a vain regret;
While a sad prayer sighs to the other shore,
"Oh, True Heart! would we had loved thee more!
Oh, let our blindness be all forgot!
For here, while thou stayedst, we knew thee not."

JUST A THOUGHT.

IF we never wasted our sunshine,
Or hung it in borrowed shrouds,
We might save enough, 'most any day,
To gild to-morrow's clouds.

And even if rain came pouring,
Now and then, a chilling stream,
If garnered well, we'd have in store
For every drop, a beam.

We know that all our peace
Is bought by strife;
That every haven of rest
Lies o'er a billowy life.

We know that darkest hours
Precede the light;
That anchors, sure and firm,
Are out of sight.

THE BEGGAR AND THE KING.

BY J. D. GOODWIN.

ONE summer afternoon, within his palace,
The king sits nodding on his throne of state;
And, drinking of the same care-freeing chalice,
All round him drowsy courtiers wait.
Without the palace-gate, the sun's rays pouring
Fall down upon his unprotected head,
A beggar lies; whom, spite of his imploring,
The liveried slaves have driven from his shed.
And gentle sleep, with silent, soothing fingers,
Wraps king and beggar in its soft repose,
And as its presence in the palace lingers,
The eyes of courtiers, too, in slumber close.
All slept, and o'er the minds of each came stealing
The dim and airy fabric of a dream;
And all the chambers of the mental feeling,
Straightway with many floating fancies teem.

The king lived o'er again his days of glory;
Once more he heard his subjects' loud acclaim;
Again he trod the field of battle gory,
And purchased, by ten thousand deaths, his name;
He heard again the trumpets' clangor calling;
He heard the shouts of foeman and of friend;
And, louder than the death-groans of the falling,
He heard the war-cries' ringing thunders blend;
He dreamed of plundered towns and pillaged cities,
Of slaughtered innocents, whose blood he'd spilt;
He heard his minstrels sing their fulsome ditties,
In praise of him whose soul was steeped in guilt;
He felt the cares anew which round him hovered
When his high pinnacle of fame was won;
He felt the conscience-pang he oft had smothered
When some most foul and cruel act was done;
He dreamed of plots which 'gainst him were directed
By patriot souls, who sought their land to free;
He gave to death those daring few detected,
The block for prize, and Heaven for liberty;
He saw again his royal offspring falling,
Struck by the vengeance of the mighty hand;
He heard his subjects' bitter whispers, calling
For freedom for their poor, down-trodden land.

But, ah! without the gate, the beggar, sleeping,
Saw visions seldom seen by mortal eye;
For o'er his tired soul came glimpses creeping
Of glories which shall never fade nor die.
He heard the heavenly choirs their anthems raising,
In tuneful cadences, and strains sublime;
He heard the voice of countless millions praising,
Whose song shall echo to the end of time;
Beside the stream of life he walked, surrounded
By angels, in pure robes and crowns of gold;
And all the starry courts the while resounded
With melody from golden harps untold.
Forgotten all his pain, his care, his anguish;
His dreary pilgrimage forgotten now;
No longer did his soul in sorrow languish,
Nor sweat of agony roll down his brow;
He walked no more the earth, with tears and sighing,
But trod the courts above, in light arrayed;
And answered now was all his piteous crying;
He heard the voice of Love,—“Be not afraid!”

So passed the afternoon: the sun descended
Mid golden clouds and purple, hazy smoke,

That with the far-off, faint-lined hills was blended;
And courtiers, beggar and the king awoke.
One woke to toil and care; his dream had taught him
Sleep was no blessing, though it closed his eyes;
The beggar woke; his golden dream had brought him
Blessing and rest,—he woke in Paradise!

BE KIND TO YOUR MOTHER.

BY FRANCIS S. SMITH.

BE kind to your mother! Oh, be not ungrateful
When age dims her eye, or disease racks her frame,
No fault in mankind shows more glaring and hateful,
Than that which would lead us her foibles to blame.
She has borne with our follies in life's early stage,
And should we not, then, bear with her's in her age?

Be kind to your mother! Has she not stood near you
When loathsome disease caused all others to fly?
To comfort, to solace, to nurse and to cheer you,
Yes, even, if called on, to suffer and die?
Then in her decline you should never demur,
If you have to labor and suffer for her.

Be kind to your mother! Be dutious and grateful,
The heart's deepest rev'rence and love are her due.
And if of these natural claims you're neglectful,
Look not for respect from your children to you.
Each unfilial action against you is scored,
And when you grow old you will reap your reward.

Be kind to your mother, for fast she is failing,
And soon she will sink 'neath the sad weight of years,
And all your regrets will then prove unavailing,
Your actions cannot be erased by your tears.
Then guard well your passions—be patient and mild—
'Tis the least that a mother expects from her child.

KEEP A LIGHT IN THE WINDOW.

BY M. A. MAITLAND.

KEEP a light in the window burning,
Faint though its glimmering be,
It may lighten some homeless wanderer,
Tossed upon life's dark sea:
It may whisper thoughts of comfort,
And hope to the sinking heart,
Of the beacon that fadeless gleameth,
When the sunbeams of earth depart.

Keep a light in the window burning,
Brilliantly, for a sign
That upon you the “God of Israel”
Maketh His face to shine:
Hoping that some long-lost brother,
Waylaid in the path of sin,
May desory its welcome glimmer,
And joyfully enter in.

Keep a light in the window burning,
Ye who in the Lord rejoice,
And with hopeful souls are waiting
For the sound of the Bridegroom's voice:
Till the light of His glorious presence
Extinguish the feeble ray;
Like the morning star it shall vanish
In the light of the “perfect day.”

THE HOME CIRCLE.

MORAL SUNSHINE.

JANE O. DE FOREST.

AS animal and vegetable life require the sunlight to perfect their development, so the mind needs a moral sunshine, if it would attain a wholesome growth. Like a pale sickly plant in a darkened cellar, so is the soul of him who shuts out, or fails to seek, this life giving stimulus. Yet how often we meet with such persons, those who though possessing cultivated minds, are so dwarfed and one-sided in their views of life, and often so morose and unfeeling in disposition, as to repel at once, all who are so unfortunate as to make their acquaintance.

With great capabilities for doing good, and daily adding to the happiness of mankind, they go about the world with solemn visages and woe-begone sighs, reflecting upon the sinful ways of this wicked race, and carefully drawing themselves into their shells of self-righteous selfishness. When they meet those who are cheerful and happy, and who try to view even the ills of life with hopeful eyes and courageous hearts, these frowning cynics turn aside and express their disgust at childish folly and nonsensical gayety. It is true, that we soon tire of one who devotes his whole time to perpetrating jokes and simulating a sham cheerfulness, but these icebergs, who freeze every one that ventures in their vicinity, actually do more harm in society than the frivolous jesters. But there is no need of choosing either of these repulsive extremes; and no necessity of either chilling or nauseating those who are about us. Sprightly and cheerful dispositions should be cultivated, which will give us a wholesome influence, endearing our friends, and, if possible, disarming all enemies. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine;" and "a merry heart maketh a cheerful countenance," saith the wise man, and who has not realized its pleasant truth. God bless the sunshiny people, who carry light and warmth into the social atmosphere wherever they go. Their talents may sometimes be few, but their cheery, heartsome faces and enlivening conversation, make them always welcome. Easily gaining the regard of others, their influence may be almost unbounded, and we regret to say that some of these winning, agreeable people, not being actuated by high moral principles, while diffusing their delightful cheerfulness, lead the susceptible astray.

Hence it is as important that moral sunshine enrich noble and pure qualities of the soul, as that the rays of the great central luminary be concentrated upon useful food plants, instead of noisome weeds.

Those possessing fine culture and firm principles, yet who fail to cultivate that kind and cheering spirit, which will draw to them the hearts of our common humanity in love and regard, fail, most signally, in obtaining an influence which might result in unlimited good to others. And let those who are deprived of educational and social privileges remember, that notwithstanding these disadvantages, they may, by force of will and help of Heaven, receive and diffuse a blessed moral sunshine, which will lighten up the dark and waste places of life with exceeding beauty.

What though the path of life often seems rugged and torturing to our weary feet? What though the busy world hurry on, apparently selfish and indifferent, while our hearts are very sorrowful? The Sun of Righteousness sends forth those beams of peace and hope, which will comfort every willing soul. God help us all to receive and cheerfully give such glorious sunshine, as shall lighten many darkened souls and cheer many afflicted hearts: and at the last, grant, that when the eyes grow dim, and can no more behold the light of earth, we may rest our ransomed spirits in the land where "there is no night, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

EARLY JUNES.

FROM "MUSINGS OF A MIDDLE-AGED WOMAN."*

IATE some potatoes at a friend's table early in June, which were so large, and fine, and mealy, that I was surprised to learn they were new potatoes. Upon my wondering that everybody did not grow them in preference to other kinds, was told that they were Early Junes and matured earlier than other varieties, but were never any better than I saw them. "Indeed," continued my host, "you would not like them in October at all. They come to perfection too soon to be good for anything in autumn and winter."

Ah! girls, girls! I wonder how many of you are Early Junes? Judging from the number which pass my window every day, the species must be alarmingly on the increase. You are carefully and finely dressed, and are stylish and graceful, without crudeness or awkward girlish ways; and I scarcely wonder that your mothers are proud of you. I like you myself, but I don't approve of you. What business have you to ripen so soon? To be women at fifteen? To have lovers before you have brains; and to be able to get up an "unscrupulous toilets" before you have either? At least you consider it unexceptionable, but I don't; and neither would you, if you had taken time to develop brains.

No, no; you would have thought twice before you wore a man's hat and boots, put a camel's hump on your back, and walked the streets in the dress of a harlequin.

But you have not any brains, poor child! and, what is worse, never will have, I am afraid. There is as much of you as there will ever be; for you matured so quickly that the intellect was entirely overlooked.

You are lively, and pleasant, and pretty, and stylish, and it does very well while youth lasts; but in October, girls, in autumn and winter? I am afraid we shall not like you any better then than we like the potatoes.

And what will you do with yourselves then? You have never thought of anything but beaux dress; never done anything but dress and flirt; and never had any other mission but to make yourselves pretty by dress. What will you do in autumn—in middle age? Dress? Well, some of you will; some of you do, I know; but you look like old fools; and—excuse me—you are what you look like; and I am not the only person who thinks so.

You had hearts when you started, and that was one reason we liked you so well; but feeding only on self, they are starved out, and either dry up or die a natural death. Even if you get married, you are selfish mothers, selfish wives. You hunger for the old excitement, the old admiration. If you happen to be too pure to be married flirts, you are (not often) too good (be you rich) to endeavor to break your neighbor's heart with envy at you, superior appointments in house, dress, and equipage. If you be poor, how you worry your husband into expenditure beyond his means, that you may rival your richer neighbors and friends.

Oh, little girls! little girls! what will save you from becoming such women as I see all around me? Cannot we keep you little girls till your brains develop, and your hearts grow? I should try—I should. I would make you home, your girlhood, that you would be sorry to “grow up.” I would get you dolls to dress, instead of yourselves, and help you to dress them. Would get you story-books and games; would romp and laugh with you, and make you sew and study with me. Should not scold you if you happened to be caught in dishabille by company, but teach you to be so clean and neat that it would not often happen.

And what nice times we should have when we went out walking together. We should be so occupied with looking at pretty pictures, and statuary, and flowers, and vases, in the shop windows, and talking about them, that we should not think of other people's dress, nor of our own.

And at times I would tell you of some noble women—good women whom I had known; single women, too—who had lived useful, happy lives. I would read to you of others who had lived great lives, and would tell you what they had thought, written, and accomplished; and then you would not care so much to dress for beaux, and marry the first fool or scamp who asked you, because you were afraid of being called “old girls,” for you would know that some of the greatest, best women of every age, in all times, have been “old girls.”

FASHIONABLE LIFE AT WASHINGTON.

LAST winter, in one of her letters from Washington, Mrs. Mary Clemmer Ames made some very sensible remarks on the fashionable follies of that city during the sessions of Congress. They were addressed “To a young girl.” We laid them aside at the time, intending to copy them into the HOME MAGAZINE. As the gay season is again approaching, they will be as appropriate and useful now as a year ago. Mrs. Ames says:

When you read of the gay doings and bright assemblies here, you think it hard sometimes that you must stay away in a quiet place to work and study. You feel almost defrauded because you are shut out from the splendor and mirth and flattery of fashion. You long for the pomp and glory of the world, and sigh that so little of either falls on your life-path. Thus I shall seem cruel to you when I say that I would rather see you shut up for the next five years even in a convent, silently growing toward a noble life in the world afterward, than to see you caught and carried on by its follies now, before you have learned how to live. You should be more beautiful at twenty-five, at thirty, at thirty-five than you are now; not with the budding bloom of first youth; that is as evanescent as it is exquisite. What a pity that it is beauty's only dower to so many American women. They waste it, lose it—then wilt and wither. I want you to feel the sources of life to-day, that you may grow, not fade; that you may bloom at your prime into the perfect flower of womanhood. Terpsichore is a sad sight to me; not because Terpsichore dances—for dancing in itself may be as innocent as a bird's flying; not because she loves beautiful attire—for exquisite dress is a feminine fine art, as meet for a woman as the flower's tint or the bird's plumage. I sigh at the sight of my pretty Terpsichore, because the first bloom of her exquisite youth is being exhaled and lost forever in a feverish, false atmosphere of being. Something of delicate sensibility, something of unconscious innocence—something of freshness of feeling. All purity of soul, is wasted, with the fresh, young bloom of her cheeks, in the midnight revel lengthened into morning; wasted in the heated dance, in the indigestible feast, in the wild, unhealthy excitement through which she whirls night after night. Terpsichore, in her tattered tarlatan dress, creeping to bed in the gray morning; after having danced all night, is a sad sight to see to any one who can see her as she is. Terpsichore's mother would be a sadder sight still if she were not a vexatious one. She brought back from Europe the notion, which so many of our countrywomen think it fine to bring, that “full dress” is necessarily next to no dress. She tells you, in a supreme tone, that admits no denial, that you would not be admitted into the drawing-room of a court in Europe unless in full dress—viz., semi-nakedness. She would be nothing if not European in style. Thus, night after night, this mother of grown-up daughters and sons appears in crowded assemblies in attire that would befit in outline a child of eight years of age.

If we venture to meet her ipse dixit on European style, with the assurance of the Princess Helena Ghika, Dora Distria, one of the beautiful and most learned women of this world, that the conventional society dress of Europe is more immodest than any she saw while travelling over the mountains and valleys of the East, she will tell you that Princess Ghika “is not an authority on dress in Paris”—which is, doubtless, true. Thus, in republican Washington, in glaring drawing-rooms, we are treated to a study of female anatomy which is appalling. Don't jump to the conclusion that I want every lady to go to a party in a stuff dress, drawn up to her ears; nor that I am so prudish as to think no dress can be modestly, as well as immodestly low. No matter how it be cut, the way in which a dress is worn is more impressive than the dress itself. I have seen a young girl's shoulders rise from her muslin frock as unconsciously and as innocently as the lilies in the garden; and I have come upon a wife and mother in a public assembly so dressed for promiscuous gaze that I have involuntarily shut my eyes with shame.

I never saw Lydia Thompson; but, from what I have heard of her, have come to the conclusion that her attire is just as modest as that of many ladies whom I meet at fashionable parties. They cast up their eyes in horror at the name of poor Lydia Thompson. They go to see Lydia Thompson! No, indeed! How could their eyes endure the sight of that dreadful woman? No less they themselves offer gratis to a promiscuous company every evening a sight morally as dreadful. The men who pay their money to Lydia Thompson and her troupe know that their dress and their burlesque, however questionable, make at once their business and their livelihood. They cannot make the same excuse for their wives, their sisters and their sweethearts, if they see them scarcely less modestly attired in some fashionable ball-room. Remember this: if you ever find yourself in such a place, the best men in that room at heart are not delighted with such displays. Being men, they will look at whatever is presented to their gaze; more, many will compliment and flatter the very women whose vanity at heart they pity or despise; but it will always be with the mental reservation, “My wife should never dress like that!”

“I don't want to see my sister dancing round dances for hours in the arms of a man whom even I cannot think of without horror; and if — dances with him again, I'll not go to another German,” said a young man to his mother, this very winter. This is perpetually the fact; and it is the danger and the shame of the round dances. Young girls, guarded from babyhood from all contact with vice, from all knowledge of men as they exist in their own world of clubs and dissipation, suddenly “come out,” to whirl night after night and week after week in the arms of men whose lightest touch is profanation. It would be long before it would dawn upon the girl to dream of the evil in that man's heart; far longer to learn the evil of his life; yet no less to her, innocent and young, in the very association and contact there is unconscious pollution. There is a sacredness in the very thought of the body which God created to be the human home of an immortal soul. Its very beauty should be the seal of its holiness. Everywhere in Scripture its sacredness is recognized and enforced. Therein we are told that our bodies are the temples of God. We are commanded to make them meet temples for the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. Our very dress, in its harmony and purity, should consecrate, not desecrate the beautiful house of the soul.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

HOUSE POISONS.

MANY persons have sickened and died after moving into new houses; others, after sleeping for a few nights, or even a single night in the "spare room" of a friend. A few years ago four children in one family sickened and died, one after another. In 1860, a woman sickened in Boston, manifesting all the symptoms of having been poisoned; she recovered to a certain extent, but never regained her health. In the case of the four children, the paper on the wall was found to contain three grains of arsenic in every square foot; in the case of the woman, a removal of the paper on the wall was followed with improvement in her health.

In all cases of pining sickness, when there is no appreciable reason for it, two things ought to be promptly done—change the room and the water; live all the time in an apartment without paper on the walls, or curtains about the windows, or any green color in the carpets; in addition, use water which is obtained from the roof of the house, and no other; or obtain water which is at least half a mile away, from a spring or well, many feet higher than the usual supplies, because the water may be poisoned by the lead pipes in the house, or more likely, by the drainage of barn-yards, pig-pens, hen-houses, and privies, finding its way into the well or spring, lower down than those which supplies the family. As to curtains, carpets and wall-paper having a green color, it may be regarded as a certainty that the color is produced by the use of arsenic; and the glazing material, or whatever color, is mainly composed of a poisonous preparation of lead.

Precaution should be taken to exclude all green candies, all green toys, all glazed materials, even visiting-cards, for a little child died recently by chewing a visiting-card; it had a sweetish taste, having a glaze made of sugar of lead. In a toy box of water-colors, one block of green paint, weighing forty grains, contained ten grains of arsenic; the green in lamp-shades contains a large amount of arsenic, as do also the green papers which envelop the bon-bons of the confectioner. A tarlatan dress contained eight grains of white arsenic to every square foot of the material. Chemists are of the opinion that the dust of the arsenic is detached from these various objects by the moving air, or by handling, and is thus taken directly into the lungs, thence introduced into the blood. If any material supposed to contain arsenic is put into a small amount of hartshorn, spirits of ammonia, the liquid will have a bluish tint if arsenic is present; if further proof is desired, pour a little of this bluish liquid on crystals of nitrate of silver; if arsenic is present, there will be a yellowish deposit on the crystals.

But these things are not new, only disregarded; for a hundred years ago a law was passed in France forbidding the use of arsenic in making any colors for domestic uses; but its employment was so profitable in coloring many things—vases, artificial flowers, and the like—that the law was gradually more and more disregarded; and when its re-enactment was proposed, the shopkeepers rose in opposition, and declared it would ruin their business. Within a few years in England, a paper-maker declared that he used four thousand pounds of arsenic every week in his workshops for the purpose of coloring and sizing.

A preparation for destroying vermin about houses is made largely of arsenic, called by various names—the most common is "Sheeles Green," being the arsenite of copper, the aceto-arsenite of copper, or "Sheinfust Green," all dangerous to health and life, and should be sedulously excluded from every dwelling-house.—Hall's Journal of Health.

PRECOCIOUS CHILDREN.

EXPERIENCE has demonstrated," says Spurzheim, "that of any number of children of equal intellectual power, those who receive no particular care in childhood, and who do not learn to read and write until the constitution begins to be consolidated, but who enjoy the benefit of a good physical education, very soon surpass in their studies those who commence earlier, and read numerous books when very young. The mind ought never be cultivated at the expense of the body; and physical education ought to precede that of the intellect, and then proceed simultaneously with it, without cultivating one faculty to the neglect of others—for health is the base of instruction, the ornament of education."

A precocious child should not be taught to read before it is eight years old, and greater care should be taken to develop its body than brain. There are thousands of children born with a tendency to excessive development of the nervous system, who, if they could have physical development instead of mental during the years of growth, would make our brightest and best citizens. Stimulate their brains in youth, and they break down and die.

HEAT OF ROOMS.

THE investment of a shilling for a thermometer will make paying returns in health. The great tendency in winter is to keep rooms too warm. The foundation of pneumonia, pleurisy and pulmonary consumption is frequently laid in over-heated, ill-ventilated apartments. The inmates become accustomed to breathing hot, close air; the system is toned down and relaxed, and a slight exposure to cold and wet results in serious illness. "Some years since," says a medical writer, "we called one winter evening on a friend, whom we found in a cosy sitting-room, with a large fire, a low ceiling, and the heat ranging about the eighties. She was suffering from a severe cold, but could give no account of how she took it. A month later she was prostrated with pneumonia, and she and her sister died within a week of each other, and were buried in the same grave. The intelligent use of a thermometer would doubtless have saved both of those valuable lives." The mercury in the tube should never be permitted to stand above seventy. If that temperature is not sufficient to give warmth, it is an indication that the person does not take sufficient exercise, and the cure for it is more miles and more flannel. In the coldest weather, when the ground is like stone under the feet, when there is no drip from the eaves, and when snow lies on the roof, rooms should be ventilated. Pure air should be admitted through open doors and windows, so that the oxygen consumed by flame and by respiration may be replaced, and the effete and poisonous matters thrown off by the body thoroughly driven away. As one of our best writers on household science remarks, ventilation is a question of money. But how much wiser is he who, while willing to pay a large coal bill, yet enjoys fresh air in his winter sitting-room, than he who keeps everything shut up that heat may not be lost, and has a long doctor's bill to settle in the spring, and mayhap a grave to be cut through the frozen turf.

EFFECTS OF THE TEMPER ON HEALTH.

EXCESSIVE labor, says Dr. Hall, exposure to wet and cold, deprivation of sufficient quantities of necessary and wholesome food, habitual bed-lodging, sloth and intemperance, are all deadly enemies to human life; but they are none of them so bad as violent and ungoverned passions. Men and women have survived all these, and at last reached an extreme old age; but it may be safely doubted whether a single instance can be found of a man of violent and irascible temper, habitually subject to storms of ungovernable passion, who has arrived at a very advanced period of life. It is, therefore, a matter of the highest importance to every one desirous of preserving "a sound mind in a sound body," so that the brittle vessel of life may glide down the stream of time smoothly and securely, instead of being continually tossed about amidst rocks and shoals which endanger its existence, to have a special care, amidst all the vicissitudes and trials of life, to maintain a quiet possession of his own spirit.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

HOW TO COOK POTATOES.

IF any one looks over a cook-book he or she will find innumerable methods of cooking potatoes. Now they are boiled as naturel; then they are steamed; again, they are sliced thin and fried. They are mashed, they are baked, they are even made into pies. An Irishman will tell you that he alone knows how to cook a potato, and he proceeds to show you how it should be done "in its jacket." Then some American, bearing in mind the great fireplace in the old-fashioned kitchens, and having a remembrance of the potatoes of his boyhood, to the especial flavor of which a boyish appetite no doubt contributed, will affirm that no potatoes ever were or ever can be so good as those roasted in hot ashes. The professional cook will laugh at both, and proceed to dress her potatoes in half a dozen different ways, any one of which will tempt the eye and please the palate.

Not long since we read directions for cooking potatoes, according to which the water in which the potatoes were cooked was to be boiled down and served with them after adding a little salt and butter. This style may be excellent for those who like it, but for our part, preserve us from potatoes and water, unless it be in the form of soup. We even object to the milk or cream which cooks occasionally add to mashed potatoes. The only moistening ingredient which mashed potatoes will endure without loss of flavor is butter.

Dr. Hall, editor of the Journal of Health, is, it seems, one of those people who have a theory in regard to cooking potatoes. It sounds nicely, and may be excellent; but—if we were to put a pot of potatoes on the stove according to his directions, in ten minutes our nostrils would be greeted with a smell of burning, in spite of all the shaking we could do, and then there would be another pot to scour out. But we will give our readers what Dr. Hall says about the matter, and they can try the experiment for themselves if they like:

"It may be safe to say that not more than one family in fifty knows how to cook a potato so as to make it most luscious and go the farthest.

"There is a very thin outer skin on the potato, thinner than thin letter-paper, thinner than a wafer; it is, perhaps, not thicker than the twentieth part of an inch.

"Immediately under this skin is the best part of the vegetable, the part which makes flesh and gives strength; this part is not more than the tenth of an inch thick; all below that, all the remainder of the potato, is destitute of nourishment; it only warms; it gives no strength, it is more starch. Hence, in peeling a potato, the most valuable part of it is thrown to the hogs or other domestic animals, and the least valuable part is put on the table. The best way to cook a potato is to do so with the peeling on it, and take it off with the finger-nails or with a cloth, after it is cooked; then only the skin is removed, without any portion of the real nutriment adhering to it. It is very wasteful to roast or bake potatoes; they should either be boiled with their skins or 'jackets' on, or should be steamed; in fact, they should never be cooked in any other way; for thus, not only is all the nutriment saved, but it is prepared in the most palatable and digestible manner possible. Wash the potatoes thoroughly and quickly in cold water, put them at once in an iron saucepan with a tight lid, and put it over the fire, as if to boil them, without any water whatever, for they are already wet, and the moisture inside the potatoes amounts to three-fourths of the weight of the whole, thus affording steam enough to cook them, and sooner than boiling water would do it; for that is only two hundred and twelve degrees hot, while steam is three or four hundred and more; this method of cooking makes the potatoes dry, rich and tasteful, without burning, and they come on the table so delightfully mealy and sweet and nutritious, that you will wonder that they should be cooked in any other way, ever more. The vessel containing the potatoes should not be more than two-thirds full, so as to leave room for the steam to do its work. Until you can tell pretty well how long it will take to cook, the lid may be lifted to stick a fork in, and replaced quickly. It is better also to keep the vessel shaken back and forth, to prevent burning. As soon as they are turned out, take off the outer skin, and place them on the table. Or they can be mashed, adding a little milk.

"Another excellent method is to slice the potatoes very thin, taking the outer skin off first; then place them in a saucepan as before, shaking them all the time; in ten minutes they are ready for the table.

"It is pitiful to think on how many tables, year in and year out, potatoes come sodden, hard, and many with all the best part peeled off."

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Garnered Sheaves. The Complete Poetical Works of J. G. Holland, "Timothy Titcomb." New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. This volume contains "Bitter-Sweet," "Kathrina," and other shorter poems, by Dr. Holland, who has acquired a reputation as one of the most finished of American poets. The volume is handsomely printed and bound, and liberally illustrated.

The Sabbaths of our Lord. By the Right Rev. William Bacon Stevens, D. D., LL.D., Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: J. M. Stoddard & Co. Bishop Stevens has written a book which will meet the approval of a wide class of Christians. Basing his arguments upon the teachings and practice of our Saviour, he has attempted to demonstrate the difference between the mere keeping the letter of the law in regard to the Sabbath, and the observance of its spirit. He cites the customs of the Jews, who in the time of Christ were exceedingly strict in their outward observance of the Sabbath, in contrast to the example of Christ Himself, which called from them so much censure, that, in self-defence, He explained that "it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day." He points out the danger, on the other hand, of too great laxity in regard to the fourth commandment, and by a careful analysis of the teaching of the Bible, shows the true meaning of a day of rest, viewed in its relations to religion, to morals and to health.

Miles Standish, the Puritan Captain. By John S. C. Abbott. New York: Dodd & Mead. Second on the list in the series of "American Pioneers and Patriots" comes the name of Captain Miles Standish, who was a passenger on the Mayflower when she brought the Pilgrims to the bleak shore of Massachusetts. This book possesses a historical as well as a biographical interest, as it gives its readers a fair insight into the character of the people who thus came as colonists to the new world, and narrates the events which transpired in that settlement. The volume is an exceedingly interesting one, and can be profitably read by old and young alike.

Barriers Burned Away. By the Rev. Edward P. Roe. New York: Dodd & Mead. A somewhat romantic story, displaying both a sentimental and a religious character, the incidents and interest of which culminate in the never-to-be-forgotten Chicago fire. If the author has only partially succeeded in producing an attractive and artistic novel, it should be remembered in his behalf that he has labored under twofold disadvantages—an avowedly religious novel being proverbially difficult to write; and a novel based on any recent catastrophe or act in history being scarcely less so.

Little Bobtail; or, The Wreck of the Penobscot. By Oliver Optic. Boston: Lee & Shepard.

Winning his Spurs; or, Henry Morton's First Trial. By Elijah Kellogg. Boston: Lee & Shepard. Two interesting and instructive stories for youth. The former is the initial volume of a new series of stories for boys called "The Yacht Club Series." The latter is the fourth volume of "The Whispering Pine Series." Both are for sale in Philadelphia by Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Sally Williams, the Mountain Girl. By Mrs. E. D. Cheney, author of "Patience," etc. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This book illustrates what may be accomplished by a young girl who, in spite of adverse circumstances, exhibits patience and perseverance. The story is well told, and is one which in every respect we can cheerfully recommend to our young readers. For sale in Philadelphia by J. B. Lipincott & Co.

Old Times. By Mrs. Mary Dwinell Chellis, author of "The Temperance Doctor," etc. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House.

The Jewelled Serpent. A Story of To-day. By Mrs. E. J. Richmond, author of "The McAllisters," etc. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House.

The Hole in the Bag, and other Stories. By Mrs. J. P. Ballard (Kruna), author of "The Broken Rock," etc. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. Three books by different authors, are all written with tolerable ability, and all earnestly remonstrating against intemperance and kindred vices. They should have a wide circulation, particularly among the young.

Liquor Laws of the United States. Prohibitory, License, Local Option and Civil Damage Laws. New York: National Temperance Society and Publication House. This will be found a convenient reference book for all interested in the subject of temperance.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

THE WANE OF INTOLERANCE.

EVERY day, in this new age of spiritual enlightenment, the hearts of all Christian people are coming closer together, and the old spirit of intolerance, born from beneath, is rapidly giving way under the tender and sweet influence of Heaven-born charity. Creed and doctrinal differences no longer hold apart and in antagonism those who are in the sincere effort to do the will of God, and to help in the establishment of His kingdom of peace and goodwill upon the earth.

A notable instance of this took place not many months ago in the city of New York, when five or six clergymen of different denominations assisted in the installation of Rev. Mr. Hepworth, as minister of a Congregational church. On the Sunday following Mr. Beecher referred to the event in his pulpit, and we cannot better give our readers an idea of the significance of the event than by quoting a portion of Mr. Beecher's remarks. After speaking of the Council, he said:

"And who was this man they were met to examine? The Rev. George H. Hepworth. Who was he? Born of Unitarian parents, reared in Unitarian theology, for all his earlier years a minister of that denomination, and the late pastor of the Church of the Messiah. Following his sympathies he left that church and form, and embraced that more consonant with the orthodox churches: and his place was made good in the Church of the Messiah by our friend and late neighbor, the Rev. Dr. Powers, who, following his sympathies, went over to Unitarianism; and it was this Mr. Hepworth, so born and so reared and so bred, that came before the council to be examined in this orthodox Brick Church. Now what did they do with him? Did they take him, as thirty years ago they would have done, as a vile rag of heresy, and put him in a tub and scrub him till he was all clean? That is what the council that I went before would have done with him; they would have put him through a regular catechism; but these men that were magisters and masters in theology, when this man came in from the Unitarian side of Christianity, and asked to be installed as pastor in good standing of this church in New York, almost entirely left out technical theology.

"I was not present, but I was told that Mr. Hepworth just made a relation of the steps by which he had changed his view and they accepted him with great joy. I infer from this the creation and growth under divine Providence of the great doctrine of spiritual affinity rather than repulsion. I infer from this that repugnance, which has hitherto been generated by differences of external statements of the truth by external organization, is losing its power and the affinities which spring from like views and desires is increasing. Only so can you account for the existence of this council or its action and result.

"Neither of the men composing this council gave up any of their views, but there was a way by which they could each hold on to his own theology and yet accept this man, whose theology probably differed from any of them. I should consider a council which came together and said that it made no difference what a man believed very mischievous; a man ought to have a creed, but he should hold that a different creed as it appears to others may be right for them, so that a hundred men may get together and each have a different creed, and may be able to say, 'I do my work by my system and you do your work by yours.' There is a spirit of inward piety that rises higher than technical differences of opinion. It is so in common everyday life. Men in business conduct their business according to different methods, and yet they do not quarrel. No two families in this city probably make their bread alike, or make their beds alike, or treat their servants just the same. I have heard two lumbermen argue as to the best ways of cutting timber and getting it to market; each thought he was right, yet they did not quarrel about it.

"And so this council did not say that all sectarianism was to be swept away and all sects become one. No, not at all; not till we have another God. God does not like unity, and works by the law of diversity: God makes men different; makes the different parts of their mind work differently, so that men take the truth differently; so when you say that there ought to be unity I say no. I think very well of elms, but I would not have all the trees converted into elms; I think well of English oak or of the cedar of Lebanon, but I would not have all the trees in the land oaks or elms or cedars, so I glory in Episcopacy, I glory in the Presbyterians, I glory in the Methodists, and I glory in any denomination that I see has power to go out into the world and subject it to Christianity. You would not have all men build their yachts alike. Your yacht is one model, my yacht is another. Of course my yacht is the best. Yet people insist that in theology we should all build exactly alike—as much alike as the Newfoundland fishing vessels are, and be as much in fog, too. All that that council has proved is that there can be a perfect union under the bond of peace.

"It is not, then, to be called a victory of the new over the old. It merely shows that the divine Providence that has always guided the church is now guiding it, and that God is inspiring his church with wisdom to meet the newer exigencies of the work that it is now called to perform. And God is letting down streams of light in every direction, and science is shedding its beams abroad to guide men: and let no man be alarmed at the researches of science; let no man think we shall lose anything we can afford to keep; we may come to find that we don't know as much as we thought we did. So the gold says. The great nugget says, 'I am all gold.' 'I will see what you are,' says the chemist, and it goes into the crucible, and out comes gold and out comes slag, and the gold is not half as big as it was. We are full of knowledge, full of conceit, but the word of God stands sure. We take this dear old book (laying his hand upon the Bible) just as it presents itself to us; it teaches the doctrine of the relations of this life and the other life, God's spirit and man's necessity and need."

So MUCH SAVED.—A book agent, writing from Elizabeth, N. J., to Mr. Charles Heritage of this city, says:

"One of my neighbors, a drinking man for years, borrowed a book or two of me. One of them was the 'Man-Trap.' On going into his house a day or two after, he told me he had read the work. It was true as life. He had an offer to go into the liquor business, but was converted by reading the book. He says the book, or rather the reading of it, prevented his going in the business."

MR. GREELEY'S INNER LIFE.

THE following, which we take from "The Religious Magazine," published in Boston, gives a view of Mr. Greeley's inner life that will surprise some, and interest all:

"Among the affecting incidents connected with the last days of Horace Greeley's life was the following, related by his intimate friend, Isaiah T. Williams, who said of him: 'I never met a man whose nature was more truly religious. He had the utmost faith in God. He often expressed admiration for the writings of Swedenborg, several volumes of which he owned. While at my house, a few weeks before the late election, he became greatly interested in a volume of Sears's, entitled, "The Heart of Christ." He expressed great admiration for it, saying that work contained his sentiments. At every leisure moment his eyes were bent on the book. The next Sunday after the death of his wife, Mr. Greeley went to Chappaqua. On the way up I asked him whether he wanted the book. He replied, "Yes," and added, "I want one peaceful Sunday; I have not had one in many years."'

"What a pathos there is in these last words! At what a sacrifice of ease and domestic comfort, of family enjoyment and religious meditation and repose, do our public men accomplish their work! We cannot believe that is wise or well to make such a sacrifice. Not 'one peaceful Sunday in many years.' We cannot but think that if our ablest men whose powers are tasked so constantly and so heavily, would only make it a matter of conscience to secure for themselves, a 'peaceful Sunday,' it would do much to throw a serenely atmosphere around them, and to save them from the worry, vexation and nervous irritability which makes such inroads upon even the strongest physical organization.

"But this is not the point to which we would here particularly call the attention of our readers. We have been accustomed to think of Mr. Greeley as a philosopher of the utilitarian school—and, therefore, as not entering with any great zeal or relish into the finer and higher sentiments of our nature. But if there is in our language a book which approaches the highest and grandest spiritual truths of our religion by the most delicate processes of spiritual thought and imagination, and which appeals to what is finest and loftiest in our spiritual nature, it is this work of Dr. Sears', which seems to have had so great a charm for Mr. Greeley. This little incident gives us a deeper insight into his character, and places him on a higher plane of thought and life than anything that we have ever heard or known of him before. No one but a man of very quick, tender and delicate moral and religious sensibilities could be thus earnestly drawn toward such a book."

A NEW TREATMENT OF DISEASE.

WE have had very favorable opportunities during the past two years for observing the effects of what is called the "Compound Oxygen Treatment," as dispensed by Dr. G. R. Starkey, No. 1116 Girard Street, of this city, and can speak of it from personal observation as well as from personal experience. The mode of treatment is by simple inhalation. The gas inhaled is "composed of the elements of the atmosphere, with oxygen in excess." The immediate effect produced by inhalation is a slight sense of exhilaration and warmth in the chest, followed in most cases by a new feeling of strength, elasticity and physical comfort.

Especially in pulmonary diseases, and in weak, nervous conditions of the body, has this new treatment been found of great value. A very large number of consumptive patients have been treated in the past two or three years, and with almost unvarying good results. The uniform first effects of inhalation are an increase of appetite, a renewal of flesh and strength, and, as before said, a sense of physical elasticity and comfort. And this seems not to be a temporary state. It is not lost in a few days or weeks, but with most persons becomes permanent. It has been so in our own case.

We advise those who are suffering from chronic diseases of any kind, especially of the chest, to visit Dr. Starkey, or write for his pamphlet descriptive of this new mode of treatment. For persons living at a distance, he has a "home treatment," which any one can use for himself.

DRAMATIZATION OF "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP."

OUR new temperance story, "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP," has been dramatized and brought upon the stage by Mr. Charles H. Morton, stage manager of Wood's Museum in this city, and has drawn crowded audiences, night after night, for many weeks, doing a good work in the cause of temperance.

From "The Temperance Blessing," published in this city by Mr. Charles Heritage, we take the following communication from Hon. Robert M. Foust, Past Most Worthy Patriarch of Sons of Temperance:

"Office P. M. W. Patriarch, S. of Temperance.

"'THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP' is the title of a play now being performed at Colonel Wood's Museum, Ninth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia. We have seen it, and in the hope of inducing others to go to the Museum whenever it is presented, we pen this notice of it. This drama is founded upon Mr. Arthur's thrilling temperance story of the same name, and is put upon the stage in such a manner as to bring out all the strong points belonging to the several characters represented, and exhibits the several phases of the monster vice of the nineteenth century, Intemperance, in a very faithful manner.

"We are happy that we are enabled to state that we are better acquainted with Mr. Mullen the Prison Agent, and Mr. Heritage of the Temperance Blessing, than we are with Tom Lloyd and Hiram Jones, all of whom are in the piece; and would be most happy to have everybody else equally favored, and therefore advise all to go to the Museum and see what a man-trap is, and how to keep out of it. Mr. Arthur did a good thing for humanity when he wrote this story; it is to the cause of temperance what 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' was to the cause of slavery. May its mission be equally successful, and the time speedily come when there will be no more keepers lying in wait to ensnare our kindred and friends. This play, besides its intrinsic merits, is exceedingly well performed; every one is fully up in the spirit as well as letter of the part, which makes the representation of 'Three Years in a Man-Trap' one of the most impressive temperance lectures of the day.

"Colonel Wood deserves the commendation of every friend of humanity for his liberality and public spirit in bringing this great subject before the people, and should continue to have his lecture-room crowded whenever this play is announced. R. M. F."

The commendations of the press on Mr. Morton's effective production of the play have been very hearty. We select a single one, and from the City Item because it includes our own testimonial:

"WOOD'S MUSEUM.—'Three Years in a Man-Trap' enters its third week to-night. It drew large audiences all last week, and is pronounced an exceedingly interesting play by all who have seen it. Even the author of the novel, Mr. T. S. Arthur, approves of the dramatization, as the following will show:

"CHAS. H. MORTON, Esq.—My Dear Sir: I must congratulate you on the effective way you have dramatized and placed on the stage my temperance story of 'Three Years in a Man-Trap.' You have made a thrilling play indeed. The crowded audiences that have so warmly greeted its representation, night after night, attest your success, and show that its vivid exposure of the fearful evils wrought by the liquor traffic have made a deep impression on the public mind. When the stage comes to the help of the people in their efforts to destroy great social wrongs, its power for good is beyond computation. "Very respectfully yours,

"T. S. ARTHUR."

"The scenic effects in 'Three Years in a Man-Trap' are unusually elaborate and novel, especially the mechanical effect of the destruction of the drunkard's home by fire, where Harry Glen's life is saved by his devoted wife.

"The snow storm scene is also impressive and realistic, where Maggie (alias Miss Susan Galton) is dying alone at night before the father's rum shop, with no one to help her. The final transformation tableau, showing the happy home of the reformed drunkard and the wretched fate of the rum-seller, is pronounced by every one unusually beautiful.

"'Three Years in a Man-Trap,' which is the great success of the season, will run every evening until further notice, and will also be given at the Wednesday and Saturday matinees."

As an author, we miss from the play, as a matter of course, many scenes and incidents besides those brought into living action, which made a deep impression on our minds when we wrote them down; but we can well understand how impossible it is to bring upon the stage in a single night even a third part of the action and sentiment of a story covering nearly four hundred pages. Mr. Morton's skill in seizing the strong points, and his management of scenic effects, are worthy of all praise, and we repeat our congratulations at his success.

FACIAL PERCEPTION—A REMARKABLE CASE.

AN interesting account of the possession of a sort of latent or sixth sense, is given by Mr. W. Hanks Levy, F. R. C. S., a blind man, in a work entitled, "Blindness and the Blind," lately published in London. He says:

"Whether within a house or in the open air, whether walking or standing still, I can tell, although quite blind, when I am opposite an object, and can perceive whether it be tall or short, slender or bulky. I can also detect whether it be a solitary object or a continuous fence, whether it be a close fence or composed of open rails, and often whether it be a wooden fence, or brick or stone wall, or a quick-set hedge. I cannot usually perceive objects if much lower than my shoulder, but sometimes very low objects can be detected. This may depend on the nature of the objects, or on some abnormal state of the atmosphere. The currents of air can have nothing to do with this power, as the state of the wind does not directly affect it; the sense of hearing has nothing to do with it, as when snow lies thickly on the ground, objects are more distinct, although the foot-fall cannot be heard. I seem to perceive objects through the skin of my face, and to have the impressions immediately transmitted to the brain. The only part of my body possessing this power is my face; this I have ascertained by suitable experiments. Stopping my ears does not interfere with it, but covering my face with a thick veil destroys it altogether. None of the five senses have anything to do with the existence of this power, and the circumstance above named induce me to call this unrecognized sense by the name of 'Facial Perception.'

"When passing along a street I can distinguish shops from private houses, and even point out the doors and windows, etc., and this whether the doors be shut or open. When a window consists of one entire sheet of glass it is more difficult to discover than one composed of a number of small panes. From this it would appear that glass is a bad conductor of sensation, or at any rate of the sensation especially connected with this sense. When objects below the face are perceived, the sensation seems to come in an oblique line from the object to the upper part of the face. While walking with a friend in Forrest Lane, Stratford, I said, pointing to a fence which separated the road from a field, 'Those rails are not quite as high as my shoulder.' He looked at them and said they were higher. We, however, measured, and found them about three inches lower than my shoulder. At the time of making this observation I was about four feet from the rail."

AGE OF THE WORLD.—Rev. Howard Crosby, Chancellor of the University of the City of New York, in a recent lecture on "The Ancient Oriental Monarchies," fixed the creation of the world as far back as 432,000 years before the deluge.

"NEVER fail," says George McDonald, "to do daily that good which lies next to your hand. Trust God to weave your little thread into the great web, though the pattern shows it not yet. The grand harvest of the ages shall come to its reaping, and the day shall broaden itself to a thousand years, and the thousand years shall show themselves as a perfect and finished day."

RUINS OF BAALBEC.

RELICS OF A TRADITIONARY AGE.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

THOSE who are Bible readers, and Bible readers only, are liable to fall into a natural error. They see the Jews from the Jewish standpoint alone, and come to regard them as a people superior in intelligence and cultivation to the races with which they went to war. They are accustomed to look upon these antagonistic races, whom they believe God specially appointed the Jews to destroy, as but little more than barbarians, either living nomadic lives, or else dwelling in rude huts, their cities but a collection of those huts, and their kings petty chieftains of insignificant tribes. That which we call history tells us little of these people—of the Philistines, the Canaanites, the Moabites, the Midianites, and the other nations with which the Jews were constantly at war, conquering and being conquered.

But there is a record, a record more reliable than printed words, which tells a different story. This record is everywhere to be seen in Syria. It tells us that as the northern barbarians poured down upon civilized Rome many centuries afterward, first destroying and then assimilating with the people, so the Jews came up, a barbarous, ignorant horde, fresh from the slavery of Egypt; but armed with a stubborn purpose, and an invincible will like that which keeps them intact as a race even to this day; commanded by a man who, among all the heroes and leaders of all ages, stands out unique in power, wisdom and governing ability; and guided, as they believed, by the divine hand. They found nations far advanced in arts and sciences, who had built magnificent cities, and whose civilization was antedated only by that of Egypt. But the destiny of these nations had been fulfilled. They had arisen, reached maturity and now were ready for decadence, their perishing civilization ready to foster the growth of nations just springing into life. So they fell before the vigorous blows of this younger nation, who had been taught endurance and strength of purpose in the brick-yards of Egypt, and who were inspired by such leaders as Moses and Joshua. But the struggle was a long one, and the land which they came up out of Egypt to possess, the sons of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob never quite possessed, until they finally affiliated with their enemies, intermarried with them and were "lost."

The early inhabitants of Syria have left traces of themselves scattered all over that country, most wonderful to behold, some of them promising to endure as long as the world itself. They were heathen, and in one sense idolaters, inasmuch as they set up images in their temples. But their religion was in reality sun-worship. Their deities were Baal and Astarte or Ashtaroth. Baal represented the sun, Astarte the earth or nature. There is a certain poetry in this religion which no doubt made itself felt in unsophisticated natures. The sun is the giver of light and life, the earth the receiver of light and the producer of life, and by the union of the two all visible things are created.

In all the ancient cities of Syria are found ruins of temples dedicated to Baal or the sun. At Baalbec (probably identical with the Baal Gad of the Bible, as both mean literally the City of the Sun), are some of the most wonderful and imposing architectural remains to be found in the world, among the most prominent of which are those of sun temples.

The founders of Baalbec are unknown. They were probably dead and forgotten when Solomon laid the foundation of his temple. The ruins of the city show that the architecture belongs to various periods.

"Three eras speak thy ruined piles,
The first in doubt concealed;
The second, when amid thy files,
The Roman clarion pealed;
The third when Saracenic powers
Raised high the Caliph's massy towers.

"But, ah! thy walls, thy giant walls,
Who laid them in the sand?
Belief turns pale, and fancy falls
Before a work so grand;
And well might heathen seers declare
That fallen angels labored there.

"No, not in Egypt's ruined land,
Nor mid the Grecian isles,
Tower monuments so vast, so grand,
As Baalbec's early piles;

Baalbec, thou City of the Sun,
Why art thou silent, mighty one?

"The traveller roams amid thy rocks,
And searches after light;
So searched the Romans and the Turks,
But all was hid in night;
Phœnicians reared thy pillars tall,
But did the genii build thy wall?"

Mr. Prime says: "If all the ruins of ancient Rome that are in and around the modern city were gathered together in one group, they would not equal in extent the ruins of Baalbec." Nevertheless, the space covered by these ruins is only nine hundred feet long by five hundred feet wide. The magnificence and magnitude of the columns, and the Cyclopean masonry, has for centuries been the wonder of the world, and no description I can possibly give will approach the reality.

A traveller thus describes these ruins: "The temples of Baalbec stood upon an artificial platform, raised above the plain thirty feet, having immense vaults underneath. The style of this foundation is very similar to that of the foundation of Solomon's temple at Jerusalem, the stones being beveled, but of a much larger size. Three of the stones in this foundation wall are each sixty-three feet long by fifteen wide and thirteen deep, raised to a height of twenty feet. Outside of this platform, on the southwest corner, there is a wall where many of the stones measure thirty feet long by fifteen wide and thirteen deep. On the platform stood three temples—the Temple of the Sun, the Temple of Jupiter and the Circular Temple. The Temple of the Sun, or great temple, was two hundred and ninety feet long by one hundred and sixty broad, surrounded by fifty-four Corinthian columns seventy-five feet high and seven feet three inches in diameter at the base. The stones of the entablature, which reached from column to column, were fifteen feet high by fifteen long, making the total height to the top of the entablature ninety feet. The stones forming the entablature were fastened together by wrought-iron clamps, inserted in the ends, one foot thick. Six only of these immense columns now remain standing."

RUINS OF BAALBEC.

The Temple of Jupiter stands on a platform of its own, and is the most perfect ruin in Syria. "Even with arch destroyed," writes one who has seen the ruins, "column overthrown, pilaster broken, and capital defaced, so vast at once and so exquisitely beautiful in design and sculpture are the ruins which here surround the traveller, that we scarcely wonder at the fond superstition which leads the natives to aver, and stoutly to maintain, that masses so mighty were never transported and upreared by human hands, but that the once magnificent, but now ruined Baalbec, was built by the genii, reluctantly but irresistibly coerced to their Titanic labors by the mighty power of the seal of the wise son of David." A stone still larger than those in the walls—being fourteen feet high by seventeen wide, and sixty-nine feet long—lies in a quarry nearly a mile distant, having never been transported into Baalbec. The surfaces of the stones in the foundation wall are squared so truly,

The city is situated on an oasis in the Desert of Syria, and it was, in the days of the Roman empire, a kind of commercial post between that country and India.

Ancient Palmyra, or Tadmor, having at one period suffered decadence as a colony of Rome, was rebuilt by the Emperor Hadrian, who changed its name to Hadrianopolis. The Palmyrenes joined Alexander Severus in his expedition against the Persians. During the reign of Gallienus the Roman Senate advanced Odenatus, a private citizen of Palmyra, to the throne. After his death, his widow, Zenobia, attempted to include all Syria, Asia and Egypt in her dominions as "Queen of the East." But she met with defeat under Aurelian, whom she ultimately accompanied to Rome.

PALMYRA.

and fit each other so exactly, even at this remote period that it is difficult to find the place where they are joined together without searching for it.

Around Baalbec, in adjacent towns about the headwaters of the Jordan, are numerous ruins of a similar character, showing structures of great size and architectural beauty.

Palmyra, another ancient city of Syria, almost due east of Baalbec, is now also a mass of wonderful ruins. Palmyra, "the place of palm trees," is supposed to be the "Tadmor of the wilderness" which Solomon built. Here, among other remains, are those of a magnificent sun temple; though none of them will compare in grandeur, beauty and exquisite workmanship, nor probably in antiquity with those of Baalbec.

After an existence of several centuries, during which it was held in turns by the Romans and the Saracens, it was besieged, sacked, its inhabitants massacred, and its very existence forgotten; until, in 1691, a party of English merchants, crossing the desert, discovered the ruined and deserted city.

Its ruins are of the Corinthian order of architecture, with the exception of the columns of the Temple of the Sun, which are fluted, with brazen Ionic capitals. These ruins are all more insignificant, and of a later date than those of Baalbec.

At Athlert, a city unmentioned in either sacred or profane history, there are extensive ruins, which are a historic and an architectural puzzle. They are pure Phœnician in character, and probably date beyond the oldest Greek or Roman structures in Syria.

There is a wall here, large sections of which remain entire. Just within this wall stands a portion of a gigantic building.

Rev. Mr. Thompson, for many years a missionary in the Holy Land, thus describes this building: "It was erected on vaults of very great strength, and the fragment of the east wall towers up at least eighty feet high. There it stands in its loneliness, unbroken by a hundred earthquakes, the first object that strikes the eye of the traveller, either up or down the coast. Near the top, on the interior, so high that it strains the neck to look at them, are the flying buttresses (finished off below with the heads of men and beasts), from which spring the arches of the great dome. It must have been superb—sublime. Now, who erected this magnificent temple, and when? The only history we have of Athlert begins with the Crusaders, who call it Castellum Perigrinorum Pilgrims' Cas-

"Their number," says the Rev. Mr. Thompson, "is surprising, since for ages the inhabitants have been breaking them up for building-stone, and burning them into lime, and still there are hundreds of them lying about on the face of the hill. They are of all sizes, some eight feet long, and in fair proportion, the resting-place of giants; others were made for small children. Many are hewn in the live rock; others are single coffins, cut out of separate blocks. All had heavy lids, of various shapes, approaching to that of an American coffin, but with the corners raised. They are, no doubt, very ancient. Lift the lid, and the dust within differs not from the surrounding soil, from which grows the corn of the current year. And so it was twenty centuries ago, I suppose. They are without inscriptions, and have nothing about them to determine their age or origin."

A sarcophagus was recently discovered at Sidon, tle), because they used to land there when Acre was in the hands of the Saracens. But they built none of these edifices."

Near Bussa, a little town lying near the coast between Acre and Tyre, there is a singular pillar, which dates its origin back for thousands of years. The shaft is composed of ten pieces, each three feet thick. It stands upon a base ten feet high and nine feet square, making it forty feet in height. If a statue ever crowned the pillar, it is there no longer. This column is called Humsin, and also Minawat, from the collection of ruins near it. At Ammariyeh much of the stone used in building Bussa is quarried, from ruins which have become buried so deeply in the earth that an olive tree many hundreds of years old has had time to grow in the soil above them.

Not far from Beirut, on the south to Jerusalem, at Khuldeh, is a mountain-side covered with sarcophagi.

which had upon its lid a long inscription in the Phœnician character. The upper end of the sarcophagus was wrought with superior skill into the form of a human face. The head and drapery were similar to those sometimes found on Egyptian mummy cases. The inscription, which was deciphered by Prof. Deitrich, speaks of the person within the sarcophagus as Ashmunazer, King of the Sidonians, son of Tabnith, King of the Sidonians, and of Immiastoreth, priestess of Astarte; grandson of Ashmunazer, King of the Sidonians, etc. It details the wonderful works he has accomplished during his life, and multiplies maledictions against any one who shall disturb his sepulchre when dead. The date of this sarcophagus is carried back to an early period of the Jewish possession of Judea.

Assyrian civilization was contemporaneous with Egyptian civilization, and exerted a far greater influence than the latter upon the Greeks and Etruscans. The decorations of King Solomon's temple—lions, bulls and winged cherubim—were the production of Phœnician sculptors and copies of symbolic Assyrian figures. The investigation of the ruins of ancient Nineveh are bringing to light many things about the Assyrian nation. In the village of Khorsabad near Nineveh an entire palace, with walls, rooms and decorations perfect, has been dug out from the depths of the earth and laid bare. From inscriptions found in this palace it is made evident that it was built about seven hundred years before Christ. Many curious figures of animals were found in this palace, but a detailed description of them is impossible here. There have been found vases of peculiar beauty of form and workmanship, statues and bas reliefs, all showing that art had reached a high position at that remote period.

Judea is not the only portion of country which can claim an early settlement by a civilized and cultivated people. While Greece was yet a land of barbarians, Asia Minor was filled with towns and cities. Homer has sung the downfall of Troy, which was one of the many.

On the shores of the Mediterranean about eighty miles from the mouth of the Meander, is the site of the ancient city of Miletus. In the days of its pomp and power it had four harbors capable of containing a large fleet, and consequently possessed great maritime strength. It carried on an active commerce with the Euxine and with the distant shores of Spain. It was not only a naval and a commercial town, but from its surplus population it sent out numerous colonies. Pliny sets down these colonies as eighty in number.

Miletus was a powerful city when the Lydian

LAODICEA, ASIA MINOR.

It is impossible in the limits of a single article to give an account of more than a small fraction of the ruins which, belonging to a prehistoric age, bestrew this interesting country—ruins which go to show that the Canaanites and Philistines of the Bible were a highly civilized people at a period contemporaneous with Jewish history.

Damascus is considered the oldest city in the world, tradition telling us that it was founded by Uz, the grandson of Noah. It is a most beautiful city. It is told of Mahomet that coming to a hill overlooking Damascus, he refused to enter it, saying: "A man can have but one Paradise, and mine is above." Although so venerable, Damascus bears less evidence of its age than many cities of more modern construction. With one or two exceptions, there are no evidences of ruins whatever, modern structures replacing ancient ones.

monarchy rose into consequence. The kings of Lydia took offense at the independence and importance of their Ionian neighbor and made war against it for many years with, however, but little effect. In the reign of Darius, Miletus was besieged by land and by sea, and finally taken by storm. The surviving inhabitants were carried to Susa and settled by order of Darius near the mouth of the Tigris. The town itself was given up by the Persian commander to the Carians. The Athenians are said to have been so much affected by this event that when Phrynichus, the tragic writer, introduced on the stage his play of the "Captive of Miletus," the whole house burst into tears, the people fined the poet one thousand drachmas and forbade the performance in the future. The Milesians suffered also under Alexander.

St. Paul sojourned at Miletus a few days on his return from Macedonia. The Milesian church took a high place in rank among the churches in Asia.

During the decline of the Byzantine empire the town had nearly fallen into ruins from the ravages of the Turks and other barbarians, and the alluvial deposits of the Meander had already begun to obstruct the harbors. These harbors are at the present day almost totally destroyed.

Miletus is the birthplace of Thales the mathematician and philosopher; also of Cadmus and Hecataeus, two of the earliest historians of Greece.

Miletus is now a very unhealthy place. Its few inhabitants live in huts made of the debris of the once magnificent city. Two or three windmills are built upon the ruins, one of them near what must have been a temple, by some assigned to Diana, by others to Apollo. Two columns of the Ionic order supporting a fragment of frieze, and a third isolated column remain as grandly solitary relics of the structure to which they once belonged. The ruins of a chapel are pointed out to the traveller as that in which St. John preached, but the story is somewhat apocryphal, as the order of architecture to which the chapel belongs dates some hundreds of years later than St. John's time.

Ephesus, also in Asia Minor, and in some respects the rival of Miletus, was formerly a city of note, and contains many interesting ruins, dating back to the Roman period. A treasure has recently come to light here which has surprised and delighted archaeologists. It is no less than a part of one of the columns of the great temple of Diana, the wonder of the heathen world. This fragment is of white marble, six feet in length and eighteen feet in circumference. What remains undefaced by time shows it to be one of the "embroidered pillars," of which Pliny speaks, saying there were one hundred and twenty-seven in all, each sixty feet high, and each the gift of a king. The uninjured portion shows three life-size figures of beautiful workmanship.

Laodicea was a city in the south-eastern portion of Phrygia. Its position corresponds with that of the city of Cydrara, mentioned by Herodotus, though Pliny calls its early name Diospolis, afterward changed to Rhoas. Its name of Laodicea was given it by Antiochus Theos, in honor of his wife, Laodice. This monarch, in the height of his prosperity and ambition, made war upon the all-powerful Ptolemy, king of Egypt. This war he was only enabled to withdraw from by marrying Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy. His wife Laodice never forgave him for this insult to her, and historians generally agree that the murder of Antiochus and Berenice which followed was instigated by her.

During the Roman republic and the subsequent empire, Laodicea became exceedingly prosperous, and we find it called in ancient inscriptions "the most splendid city of Asia." It was laid in ruins by an earthquake during the reign of Tiberius, but the inhabitants were enabled to rebuild it without appealing to the imperial treasury for help. Situated on the highway between the east and the west Laodicea became a town of great commercial importance. The general appearance and extent of the ruins will discover the magnificent scale upon which the city was built in the days of its glory. There were a gymnasium, several theatres, an aqueduct, temples and a stadium or race-course, the columns, capitals and broken walls of which strew the plain with their fragments. At Laodicea was established one of the seven churches of Asia. The city was finally destroyed early in the fifteenth century, and the little hamlet built upon its ruins is called by the Turks Eski Hissar.

A DAY DREAM.

BY DARD BEST.

FROM yonder hill I sat and watched the sun,
And saw its beams glance through the misty morn,
And kiss the roof beneath which I was born;
It gleamed awhile, and childhood's days were done

It danced a shadow dance in light and shade,
Then crossed the well-worn threshold of the school,
And glimmered up and down the dunce's stool;
Then left the yard in shadow where I played.

And next it wandered up the village street,
Gilding the old town-bell with burnished gold.
It paused within a garden, quaint and old,
'Neath arbor vines it found a rustic seat.

And long it lingered there; for it seemed loath
To leave that seat neglected and alone,
Where all about the falling leaves were blown,
The place where oft of yore it kissed us both.

The morning clouds rolled back and perfect noon
Settled o'er all the landscape; on the spire
The golden cross shone forth, a flame of fire,
As on our wedding day that far-off June.

Far spreads the sunshine over all the land,
Showing our broadening field of laboring life.
Working in God's sweet sunshine—husband, wife,
Toiling, happy-hearted, hand in hand.

The afternoon was long and sweet and blest,
But twilight called my darlings one by one;
And now I stand and watch the dying sun
Grow fainter in the ever-deepening west.

And down through darkening clouds the last, faint spark
Of sunlight gleams, and rests upon a stone
In that still graveyard. Now I walk alone
Down through the shadowy valley, deep and dark.

TIME wears slippers of list, and his tread is noiseless. The days come softly dawning, one after another; they creep in at the window; their fresh morning air is grateful to the lips that part to it; their music is sweet to the ears that listen to it; until, before we know it, a whole life of days has possession of the citadel, and time has taken us for its own.

OF PROVERBS AND ADAGES.

BY LOUISE V. BOYD.

"WITH a little hoard of maxims preaching down his daughter's heart," sings Tennyson, and with the magic of that pen-stroke we have before us a complete portrait, a worldly-minded, money-loving man. We know his character so thoroughly that we could name over the list of proverbs to which he was partial; we even see the cold glance of his eye, and note the sordid lines about his mouth, revealing the petty page of his past life, and spreading before us, too, the blank, scant pages, primly ruled, wherein he designs to have written the future of his family—but the pages, mark you, are gilt-edged.

Reader, dear, dost thou love to dwell upon the maxims of our fathers, and hast thou of pet proverbs a mighty store? If so, thou art to be pitied, not envied; or, that is my mood to-day—what I shall think about it to-morrow, I know not. "The wind bloweth where it listeth"—is not this a Scripture saying to my purpose?

Why should I take kindly to proverbs when my earliest recollection of one was when sobbing out some childish sorrow upon my mother's indulgent bosom, and thinking what a good place it was to cry, our visitor, the minister, who had "just enough of learning to misquote," muttered, "Spare the rod and spoil the child." This remark drove out of me a meek and contrite spirit, and I became possessed of—well—I went out from my mother's and that minister's presence a little howling demon, and per consequence, hated him and his voluntary saw forever after. I recollect still his text of the following Sunday, it was, "Remember Lot's wife." Ah, surely, I will remember the poor thing; also, the seemingly wicked, or, at least, cruel exultation with which he dwelt on her punishment—nor did he fail in this connection to add "the wages of sin is death," which, with his terrible emphasis, greatly frightened me. You may be sure he did not finish the sentence with its Heaven-reaching promise.

When, wild with delight, I saw a swallow glancing through the sunny spring-time air, I ran to tell my father; can I forget how he, too, who had been a "snapper-up of unconsidered trifles," seeming not to share in my gladness, looked up and said, warningly, "One swallow does not make a summer."

And are not the many pleasant recollections of my schooldays, overshadowed and made mournful by the tormenting proverbs I was doomed to encounter. My teacher was a maiden lady of stately mien, grave manners and vast acquirements. In her everyday language she had no use for any point save a period, therefore, she was just the person for proverbs, very short ones.

Oh, that teacher! how she looms up in the far-off, sunny land of my childhood, like the great mournful-visaged, impenetrable sphynx of the desert; and as it gazes toward the pyramids, so did she look on the world about her—to her it was the mighty tomb of a dead glory. Now I think of her with sadness; yet, can I scarcely forgive her for throwing that unnecessary damper over me when I exhibited to her the gold ring that had been sent me in a letter from a loving grandfather, hundreds of miles away. "All is not gold that glitters," was the explosion from her thin lips; so my pleasure was wofully diluted; I looked with suspicion on the dear little circlet, and was not sorry when my finger outgrew it.

Afterward did I put upon my chubby hands a pair of mitts—these my grandmother had made; she had been to the city, and had procured this neatly-fitting mitt-pattern from the wife of the foreman of a glove factory. She had measured my hand lengthwise and widthwise with the greatest precision; she had cut the queer-shaped pieces out of scraps of nankeen, she had overseamed them wonderfully, and had ornamented them with green worsted, in what she called beggar-stitch.

I made my debut in the school-room next morning, presenting, in my own estimation, not only a tidy, but a most stylish appearance. How was "the rag taken off the bush" of my vanity, when, at the writing-hour, that teacher, seeing those wonderful mitts for which half my schoolmates were dying of envy, said playfully, as she placed the open copy-book before me, "A cat in gloves will catch no mice." In deep humiliation I removed my now disgraced mitts from my hands to my pocket, took up the neatly-mended quill-pen and began to write. I read the copy through tears; I despise it to this very hour. I beg good St. Paul's pardon, it was "Evil communications corrupt good manners." Could not the many good things Paul said of himself, the many glorious things he said by inspiration, have satisfied himself without his resorting to the writings of old Menander for this? But I am told that it is still quite fashionable among teachers and the getters-up of copy-books, when they reach the letter c, to give this old stager.

Out of school, during the long summer holidays, I was often reminded that "Fields look green at a distance," and that "Every white will have its black, and every sweet its sour," which I could, in time, have found out for myself. Oh, the great Lord John Russel would, I know, make me his best boy, could he revisit this dull earth and read my improvement on his definition of a proverb. "A proverb is the wisdom of many men and the wit of one," said he; it is one man's croaking of all men's disappointments, say I—for you will observe that cheery and hopeful adages are such a ridiculous minority, that we can but exclaim, "The weakest goes to the wall."

When my young brother started out into the great world to try his fortunes, instead of a kindly "God speed," he only heard, "A rolling stone gathers no moss." And when my bankrupt uncle thought to take his stalwart sons and rosy daughters and in the far West begin life anew, his neighbors gravely shook their heads, remarking, "A drowning man catches at a straw;" or they reminded him by way of discouragement that "Three removes are as bad as a fire."

When the impertinent thorns of a young rose-bush caught and tore my dress sleeve, need I say some one was near to say, "A stitch in time saves nine;" and was not the pious John Wesley's memory kept green in our home by that watchword of housekeepers of which he was the originator, "Cleanliness is next to godliness."

One of the most popular and by all odds the most mature-sounding and euphonious of maxims with which my youthful mind became familiar, was, "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, and wealthy, and wise." But it don't. Indeed, I know this proverb to be a most miserable failure, for my sister's husband's cousin's wife's first husband tried it, and he was known to be almost a simpleton, never was healthy to speak of, and died poor. I congratulate myself now that I was never deluded into trying this experiment, never sacrificed the pleasure of being up when amusement offered, never dispensed with the luxury of a comfortable morning's nap till compelled by dire necessity, and think if I had done so I might now be constrained to confess that "I had paid too dear for my whistle," and when one comes to that pass one might as well confess their "cake to be dough."

When at last I had captivated my first beau, and when that beau went into the next school district to teach—"and thereby hangs a tale"—while I deemed him as "ever faithful as old dog Tray," whose fidelity you will remember has passed into a proverb, there were not wanting friends who, by way of toning down my self-complacency, whispered something of "Out of sight out of mind," or softly murmured, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." Said beau was so innocently absurd as to marry a girl named Mehitable Fell before spring. Friends then tried to urge me to a giddy height of ambition by declaring that "There are as good fish in the sea as ever were caught."

Mehitable Fell! While I muse upon her as she was my once lover's "bright particular star," I feel certain she was descended from that historic individual of whom it was sung long ago by one Tom Brown—not at Oxford:

"I do not like you, Dr. Fell,
The reason why I cannot tell;
But this one thing I know full well,
I do not like you, Dr. Fell."

I loved not Mehitable; but as her husband proved to be one of those who did not "Take care of the pence that the pounds might take care of themselves," I concluded, as doubtless she did before me, that she "had brought her pigs to a poor market;" so I pitied her, and "pity is akin to love."

Lingering along the Maiden Lane of girlhood till the afternoon shadows began to lengthen, waiting for something to "turn up," ten persons warned me that "delays were dangerous," where one encouraged me by the blithe hope that there was "luck in leisure."

But "it is a long lane that has no turning," and finding a "Barkis willin'," I was no more "In maiden meditation fancy free," but became a wife. I do not grieve, but smile when I remember that the congratulations of my bridal day had either in good round English, or in an undertone, the burden of the adage, "Better late than never." Who cares?

Shall I tell how? Yes, I will tell, for "honesty is the best policy." With the crowing of my first baby came the reminders, "Every goose thinks its own young ones swans," or "Every crow thinks its own young ones white," which I endured heroically, remembering that "While in Rome we must do as the Romans do."

Reader, patient and dear, thou hast perhaps garnered many of these sage sayings of old time into thy life pages, and perchance I am "bringing coals to New Castle," or, as said the ancient Jew, "carrying oil to the City of Olives." Let me, fearing this, be ruled by the rich conceit embodied in "Speech is silver, silence is gold."

IN EARLY DAYS.

BY JOSEPHINE POLLARD.

IN early days, when fancy held
My heart in bondage strong and sweet,
And youthful aspirations swelled
To glad fruition 'neath my feet,
No dream of fame allured my soul,
Beguiling it to heights above;
A sweeter influence had control,
And all my dreams were dreams of love.

The skies above were always bright;
The earth around me ever fair;
For hearts whose love is infinite
Can make an Eden anywhere.
I thought the future held for me
The calmest joys, the gentlest fate,
And planned that household gods should be
The precious things of my estate.

How strange is all on which I gaze!
The past—how far away it seems!
Ah me, but those were foolish days!
Ah me, but those were foolish dreams!
The loves that came to other men,
Around my doorway never grew;
I waited years and years—and then?
Why then I planned my life anew!

SUN-DIALS mark only the bright hours. Would it not be well if more people could imitate them? They would be surprised to find how many there are of these, and how much brightness there is in hours they are accustomed to think dark.

HEAVEN itself can afford no real delight to one who feels the service of God on earth to be irksome. He has no heart for Heaven, no taste for Heaven, no capacity for the enjoyment of Heaven.

A YEAR AGO.

BY E. B. D.

A YEAR ago, but one short year ago,
 I stood alone, as I stand here to-night;
 The sun toward the hills had sunken low,
 And flooded all the west with yellow light.

There is the sun as golden and as bright;
 The same soft rustle of the leaves I hear;
 It might be that the flowers that meet my sight
 Were the same ones that then my eyes did cheer.

A note of merry laughter comes from far;
 I hear of distant herds the tinkle low;
 Down in the vale where cool the shadows are
 The brook goes by with constant murmuring flow;
 The same bird sings that did one year ago;
 I hear the hum of insect life again;
 All things seem bright and beautiful; but, oh!
 'Tis not the same bright world that it was then!

Yes, all is changed, though outwardly the same;
 The bird no longer sings to listening ear;
 Though all the west with crimson is aflame,
 The day seems like November, gray and drear.
 When I would see, there comes a blinding tear,
 Through which I only see a golden past;
 There comes a memory—when I would hear—
 Of hopes which were too beautiful to last.

A year ago, but one short year ago,
 I stood and waited in this self-same spot;
 Then was my life with beauty all aglow!
 I trusted love, for then love failed me not!
 I watched his coming ere he had forgot
 The well-worn path that led him to my side.
 Then came he always; now he cometh not;
 But in his absence only hope hath died.

Love dies not thus! Though in that parting hour
 Were spoken bitter words, if love be true
 They are forgotten ere at morn the flower
 From off her silken petals rolls the dew.
 Love dies not quickly. Ah, he never knew
 As deep a love as that I felt for him!
 Alas! I fear me, men who love are few!
 Why sigh in vain! why should my sight grow dim!

Night after night I've stood and waited here,
 And watched for him e'en as I waited then—
 Waited in trembling hope, and then in fear;
 Then in despair! He comes no more again!
 I've put the rose upon my breast in vain,
 In vain bound braids and jewels in my hair,
 That—though my heart ached with a numbing pain—
 When he should come he'd find me not less fair.

Come back to me, dear love! come back to me!
 My heart calls with a yearning, passionate cry
 My life is desolate for want of thee;
 My soul is grieved because thou art not nigh.
 My love waits only for a word to fly
 And nestle close to thy warm heart, my own!
 The night is coming on, the shadows die
 In deeper shades—and still I am alone!

EVER NEAR.

BY GEORGE R. GRAHAM.

ABOVE the surging of the sea,
 I hear a sweet voice say to me,
 Be calm, my love, nor fear!
 The saddest hours move on apace,
 I soon shall see you face to face,
 And be forever near."

The darkest night must meet the day,
 So Doubt shall turn to Trust away,
 In God's good land above;
 The eternal years that He controls
 Shall wrap in peace all fearful souls;
 Immortal shall be Love!

THE COMMON FROG (RANA TEMPORARIA).

THIS well-known animal belongs to the highest class of Reptilia, or reptiles—cold-blooded vertebrated animals, whose temperature depends on that of the medium in which they live, and which consequently become torpid and inactive in winter. Their respiration is aerial and incomplete, their blood being only partially oxygenated, for the venous blood is returned to the heart, which has two auricles and only one ventricle, where it is mixed with the arterial blood, and is, therefore, only partially aerated in the lungs. There is hardly a cattle-pond or a stream on the margin of which the frog may not be found, or in the waters of which it may not be seen swimming.

Naturalists have carefully traced the development of the frog from the egg to the adult state, and the history of these changes, all of which are easily verified, is exceedingly interesting and instructive. The eggs of the frog are usually deposited—toward the end of the month of March—in clusters, each of which consists of long strings of transparent, jelly-like matter, having interspersed throughout small, round, black dots, each being the central portion of a separate individual egg. This frog-spawn at first sinks to the bottom of the pond or stream where it is deposited; but the gelatinous covering of the eggs absorbs water, and each cluster therefore swells, and ultimately, becoming specifically lighter than the water, rises to the service.

If in this stage some of the spawn is transferred from the water to a basin or a glass vessel, the changes from the egg to the tadpole and from the tadpole to the adult frog may be easily watched. The development of the tadpole commences in the little black globes, or centres. At first the head becomes prominent; a flattened tail is produced; and also branchial tufts, two on either side of the head, which imbibe oxygen from the water, like the gills of a fish. The little animal now begins to be sensible of the inconvenience of the curved position in which it is confined by the envelopes which surround it, and therefore struggles until it finally frees itself from them. On issuing from the egg it immediately eats its way through the remainder of its gelatinous surroundings, and commences active life as a tadpole in the water, feeding ravenously on the duckmeat (Lemna), which floats on its surface. The tufts on either side of the head soon diminish, and ultimately disappear, whilst the body and tail perceptibly increase, the latter becoming a powerful organ for locomotion. Both the tufted gills and the transparent membrane on either side of the tail are beautiful objects for the microscope, showing the circulation of the blood as it rolls through the arteries and their ramifications. Children especially are invariably delighted with the spectacle, and ever afterward become much interested in the previously-despised tadpoles.

In a few weeks the hind legs make their appearance, and soon after the fore legs; the tail gradually becomes less, and at last wholly disappears, and the metamorphosis of the tadpole into the frog is completed. And now instead of an aquatic animal, breathing by gills and feeding on vegetables, we have a terrestrial animal, breathing by lungs, and altogether carnivorous.

The frog, or mature animal, has a broad, short, depressed body without a tail. The posterior legs are much larger and more muscular than the anterior pair, the five toes of both pairs being webbed. Thus organized, the frog is well adapted for life either in the water or on the land, the length and great muscularity of its hind legs aiding it alike in swimming through the water and in leaping on the land.

The manner in which frogs and toads feed is well deserving of notice. In both animals the tongue is doubled back upon itself, and is covered at its extremity with a viscid glutinous secretion. This tongue is suddenly shot forth, so as to touch the prey, and the latter, adhering firmly to it, is immediately captured and carried back with the tongue into the mouth. The motion of throwing out the tongue upon the insect, and then withdrawing it within the mouth, takes place with lightning-like rapidity, so that the eye can scarcely follow it without the most careful watching.

THE COMMON FROG.

Its food now consists of insects and various kinds of slugs, of which it destroys incredible numbers; it is, therefore, very usefully employed on the grounds of the farmer, as it is aiding in the preservation of his crops by destroying those enemies which attack them. Frogs, for this reason, whenever met with, should not be molested. And the same observations apply to that much maligned and despised animal, the common toad (Bufo vulgaris), which is not poisonous, but, on the contrary, is as harmless and useful as the frog, and equally entitled to our kindly consideration.

There is also a peculiarity in the respiration of the frog which we must not omit to mention. The frog breathes by the skin as well as the lungs, which is, therefore, always kept moist, for this purpose, by means of constant supplies from an internal reservoir of pure water within the animal. So also, as the frog is without ribs, its breathing by the lungs is not carried on by the alternate expansion of the chest; and, therefore, if the animal be closely watched, no movement of the body indicative of respiration can be perceived. The fact is the air is taken into the mouth through the nostrils, the mouth being shut for that purpose; the nostrils and throat are then closed, and the air is forced or swallowed down into the lungs. As this movement can only be made when the mouth is shut, it follows that when a frog is gagged, with its mouth open, respiration becomes impossible, and the animal dies of suffocation.

The sudden appearance of frogs after violent rains in places where they were previously unknown, in the greatest numbers, is not at all an uncommon occurrence, and formerly it was believed that they had fallen from the clouds with the rain. Naturalists now entertain a more reasonable view of these appearances, which may be given in substance as follows: Undoubtedly these frogs had undergone their final metamorphosis, and had left the water, where they had been developed as tadpoles for the land. There they lay, exhausted by the drought, motionless under stones and clods, and in the clinks of the earth, until, revived by the welcome rain, all suddenly become reanimated, thus forcing themselves on public attention by their countless numbers.

It appears from the following account of a frog, given by Mr. Bell, on the authority of Dr. W. Roots, of Kingston, that these animals are quite capable of being thoroughly domesticated, if they are only well fed and kindly treated:

"The lower offices"—of the house belonging to Dr. Roots—"were what is commonly called underground, on the banks of the Thames. This little reptile occasionally issued from a hole in the skirting of the kitchen, and was noticed by the servants; but, during the first year of his sojourn, he constantly withdrew upon their approach." However, "on their showing him kindness, and offering him such food as they thought he could partake of, he gradually acquired habits of familiarity and friendship, and, during the following three years, he came out regularly every day, at the hour of meal time, and partook of the food which the servants gave him. But one of the most remarkable features in this artificial state of existence was his strong partiality for warmth; as, during the winter seasons, he regularly—and contrary to the cold-blooded tendency of his nature—came out of his hole in the evening, and made for the hearth in front of a good kitchen fire, where he would continue to bask and enjoy himself until the family retired to rest. There happened to be at the same time a favorite old domestic cat, and a sort of intimacy and attachment existed between these incongruous inmates—the frog frequently nestling under the warm fur of the cat, while the cat appeared extremely jealous of interrupting the comfort and convenience of the frog.

Our engraving represents the edible, or green frog (Rana esculenta), which, although rare in England, is exceedingly common on the continent and in this country, and is in high request for its flesh, the hind quarters only being used. Generally, it is of a beautiful green, irregularly marked with black or dark-brown spots, and ornamented on the back with three stripes of a rich golden-yellow.

THE NEW.

BY CATHERINE KINGSTON FILER.

OH, circling seasons, come and pass!
Bear in decades and bear them out,
Let change link all the years about—
New friends, new hopes new happiness,
New songs, new voices, making sweet
Our lives, till hearts with wilder beat
Forget the old delights and joys
In deeper, grander ecstasies.

New friends!—how grow the old friends cold;
How change the lights within their eyes,
The laughter in their low replies,
That thrilled our pulse in days of gold.
They change—bring in the new, the dear,
Their kindly words, their smiles of cheer,
To be with us while Summer glows
And pass when come the Winter snows.

New hopes!—how fair the old, how deep,
How lighted like a tropic ocean,
Where, mingled in a sweet commotion,
The sunbeams with the ripples sweep.
They drooped, they passed, they paled as mist;
They died, cold as the dead we've kist
In agony! Oh, calm-eyed hours,
Let new hopes bloom like passion flowers!

New songs!—the olden songs were sweet,
With love's deep ecstasy were glad,
With love's delicious pains were sad,
And metred to our hearts' wild beat
What time our hearts were wild with blisses.
New songs of deeper happinesses!
Take out the pain so anguish-sweet,
To laughter mete the cadenced beat.

New loves!—the old love wanes apace;
The blush nor in our heart doth waken—
No more the burning pulse is shaken
As flame by smiles on some fair face;
The touch of hands thrills not as old,
The sky has lost its rose and gold—
Again one lies in visioned dreams—
Whence comes her prince to wake the streams?

Whence comes her prince, with regal mien,
With kisses ripening on his mouth,
And all the passion of the South
In those dark eyes that seek his queen?
Lo! through her dreams the fateful light
Of love dawns quivering to her sight;
Warm thrills her lips with waking sighs,
Her soul is tranced in rhapsodies!

Sweep on, ye long and lingering years,
Ye cycling seasons dim and cold!
Let Summer tint the skies with gold
Of clouds that hold no rainy tears;
But, pierced by the empyreal beams,
Float in the heaven like tranquil dreams
Within the aerial poet's mind,
Where lute-voiced Poesie lies reclined.

SACRIFICIAL WORSHIP.

BY E. R. KEYES.

THE earliest historical allusions to sacrificial worship give us no information concerning its origin. They refer to it as a custom already established, but are silent as to the date of its institution and the authority on which it rests. We learn from the Sacred Scriptures that "Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof, and that the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering." We are also told that Noah, on leaving the ark, "builded an altar unto the Lord, and took of every clean beast and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar." But these brief and isolated references to this subject, were we permitted to understand them as ordinary historical statements, would throw no light on the origin of animal sacrifices. They would simply show that at a very early period this form of worship was understood and practised. But the obvious symbolical character of the first eleven chapters of Genesis, renders these statements valueless as evidence of the exact date of any historical fact, or of the origin of any religious custom.

A divine origin has, however, been claimed for sacrificial worship. It has been held that immediately subsequent to the fall, our first parents were instructed of God to approach Him through bloody sacrifices, and to look through them to the one great effectual sacrifice of Christ. But if this be true; the proof of the fact is wanting; and in the absence of any divine decree authorizing this custom, we may well doubt its divine origin. Certainly we may reasonably require those who make God the author of this form of worship to produce the divine warrant on which it rests, or show conclusively that such a warrant was once issued. In like manner it ought to be required of those who ascribe to it a human origin, that they shall explain the manner and grounds of its institution.

In the present state of human intelligence concerning the character of God, it is difficult to conceive that He could have been the author of this system of animal sacrifices. The altar stained with blood and laden with the flesh of animals newly slain, the dying wail of bleeding bird and beast, the smoke and offensive odor of the burning sacrifice, the priests reeking with blood and grasping the deadly knife, the multitude of slaughtered victims, and the confused sound of lowing herds and bleating flocks driven to the feast of death, all form a spectacle at which we stand aghast, and which we cannot believe to be pleasing in the sight of God. The whole scene is incongruous with His character. It befits only a malign and sensual deity. "God is a Spirit; and they that worship Him, must worship in spirit and in truth." "God is Love," and can find no satisfaction in the flowing blood and dying struggles of His creatures. Besides, He expressly says in Jeremiah viii., 22, "I spake not unto your fathers nor commanded them, in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices; but this thing commanded I them, saying, Obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people; and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well with you." The language of David (Psalm li., 16, 17,) is equally explicit: "Thou desirest not sacrifice, else would I give it; thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, oh, God, thou wilt not despise." And throughout the Scriptures, both of the Old and New Testament, stress is nowhere laid upon a strict observance of the rites of sacrifice, but it is everywhere laid upon obedience to the moral law as the only means of securing the divine favor. He reproves frequently and with awful severity the sins of adultery, theft, lying, deceit, oppression and fraud; but for the neglect of sacrifices and burnt offerings, He declares explicitly, (Psalm l., 8), "I will not reprove thee." Micah admirably sets forth the uniform purport of inspired utterance on this subject when he says, (vi., 8), "He hath showed thee, oh, man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God." Anciently as well as now, therefore, the religious and moral virtues, or supreme love to God and genuine charity toward man, constituted the sum and substance of saving religion. All else was but the shadow.

But the fact remains that the Jewish sacrificial system in its revised and perfected form, was promulgated by Moses, acting as the minister of Jehovah. It is necessary, therefore, to reconcile this fact with the views already presented. The principles on which this reconciliation is effected will appear as we unfold the origin and nature of sacrificial worship.

We have spoken of love as the essence of all true religion, since it is love that unites man to man, and man to God. But love is unselfish and generous. Its only delight is to give freely of its riches to others. This is the eternal law of its operation. The divine love is ever in the effort to communicate to men the good which their state requires; and the effort takes effect in proportion to their desire and endeavor to appropriate the proffered good. So also human love seeks to evidence its reality and strength by suitable expressions. We desire to reciprocate God's goodness. But we are unable to offer Him, in return for His favors, anything which we ourselves have created. All our good desires, holy affections and right thoughts, as well as all our earthly riches, are from Him alone; and no offering that we can make as an expression of our love to Him, can add to His eternal self-sufficiency, or make Him our debtor. We can only render back to Him His own gifts, imprinted with the evidences of our gratitude and the seal of our personal appropriation and endorsement. We can only show what we would do for Him were He in need of our assistance, and we able to relieve His wants.

In the Adamic age of the race this principle of love found expression in methods suited to its divine nature. Loving God supremely and having a clear and intimate consciousness of His presence, men worshipped Him "in spirit and in truth." They paid Him the silent, grateful homage of the heart. They offered Him internal worship from pure and loving affections. His law was their delight. They entered cordially into His beneficent designs, and sought to manifest their love to Him by serving those whom He desired to bless. Their religion had no ritual, save the deeds of a good life; for it needed no other. Their worship required no temple save that of the purified mind. They needed no priests nor religious teachers, for to all were given immediate revelations from Heaven, and clear perception from the Lord Himself for the verification of every truth revealed. They lived on earth the life of angels.

In virtue of their open communication with the spiritual world, they were acquainted with the relations subsisting between it and the realm of nature. They recognized the latter as the vesture of the former. The natural world was the effect of which the spiritual world was the cause. From material objects, therefore, their thoughts passed at once to the spiritual objects corresponding to them; and from natural phenomena to the higher but imminent world of spiritual and substantial realities. Everything in nature was discovered to be the ultimate and fit correspondent of something in the mental world, or world of divine ideas and causes. Man was the finite image and likeness of God, and every visible object wore an intensely human aspect, revealing some distinctive human quality. The sun, moon and stars represented the sun, moon and stars of the spiritual world, or the spiritual principles of love, faith and intelligence. Mountains symbolized strong and enduring affections in the will; gold, the good of celestial love, or supreme love to the Lord; silver, spiritual truth; stones, truth in its lowest natural expression, or the lowest forms of the understanding; trees in general, the affections and perceptions of the mind; while particular trees, such as the olive, the vine and the fig-tree, signified certain specific qualities or states of affection and thought.

In like manner every bird and every beast was viewed as the symbol of something existing in man, or as the proper natural form of some particular human affection or principle. The eagle mounting toward the sun with undazzled eye, fitly represented the rational faculty in its search for truth; the pigeon, states of innocence; the dove, the tender principles of love and faith in the early stages of regeneration. The lamb, kid and calf, and also the full-grown of these species, signified the three general classes of human affections: the lamb, the affections of the most interior degree of the mind, where innocence and love to the Lord reign supreme; the kid, the affections of the next lower degree, where conscience, formed and enlightened by divine truth, governs; and the calf, the affections of the natural degree, in which the external or moral virtues have their seat.

To men enjoying such intimate communion with God and with Heaven, and such insight into the symbolism of nature, any ritual created by human art would have been poor and unimpressive. It would have seemed but childish folly. The whole system of nature was a splendid ceremonial, fashioned by divine wisdom. Every day, every season, every year, every landscape furnished ever-varying forms appropriate to the ritual of a pure and rational religion. Every natural object and phenomenon led the thoughts of the beholder to the higher verities of the spiritual world, and up to the Lord Himself as the archetype and cause of all things beautiful and good on earth and in the heavens. To minds in this state of spiritual discernment, sacrificial worship was impossible. It would have been inexpressibly revolting, a horrible mockery of God. The only sacrifices which befitted their state were the offerings of heart-felt gratitude and loving obedience.

But the Adamic church began at length to decline from this celestial state. The consciousness of God grew indistinct. Perception of the good and the true became dim. Vision of the spiritual world was sealed up. Pure internal worship ceased. Men became more and more external in their character and life. A new Dispensation was therefore established, called the Noetic or Silver Age. In this age men still retained a knowledge of the symbolism of nature, but it was mere intellectual knowledge. They had no clear discernment of the spiritual verities which natural objects symbolized. They knew that the sun of this world represented the spiritual sun; but the latter was no longer visible to them. They knew the spiritual significance of the various kinds of animals, but had no vision of the corresponding spiritual realities. They still offered sincere worship to Jehovah, but availed themselves of the liturgy of nature to aid the spirit of devotion. Knowing that mountains signified the highest affections of the will, or love to the Lord, and thence the Lord Himself, and that groves were the natural correspondence of the perceptive powers of the mind exercised in approaching the Lord, they worshipped Him in groves situated upon the highest convenient hills or mountains. But their worship, though external and representative, was not without a genuine internal principle of devotion. It was spiritual, but clothed in simple and appropriate natural forms.

Animal sacrifices, however, did not properly belong to the Silver Age, nor were they practised until near the close of that period, when the race had fallen into gross and natural conceptions of God. The people or church called Heber was probably the first, according to the Sacred Scriptures, to institute sacrificial worship. This church retained the word Jehovah as the true name of God, and worshipped Him by sacrificial rites, while the surrounding nations lost the knowledge of this name, and fell into idolatry. (Exodus iii., 18; v., 2, 3; viii., 26). Not content with the simple but expressive forms of the preceding ages, the Hebrews added to the hill and the grove, the altar and the offering of sacrifices. The altar was the Lord's table (Mal. i., 7); the animals offered were His meat and bread; the odor of the sacrifice was for a "sweet smelling savor" to Him; the animal was slain simply that it might be offered and burned upon the altar; the burning signified the Lord's acceptance and consumption of the offering. The worshipper laid his hands on the head of the victim ready to be slain, not to signify the transfer of his sins to it—this would have rendered the animal unclean, like the scape-goat, and unfit to be offered to the Lord—but to signify the transfer to it, and the expression thereby to the Lord, of the good affections which the worshipper cherished and which the animal fitly represented. The sacrificial act further signified his sense of indebtedness to God, his love for Him and his desire to please Him. "It testified his humble acknowledgment and his reverent surrender to God; but that was all." (Life and Light of Men 242). Confession of sin, though implied, doubtless, as a subjective process preliminary to all true worship, was not symbolized by sacrifice. Not sin, but holiness; not evil, but good, was thus representatively offered to the Lord, with the acknowledgment that all that is good in man, is of and from Him alone. The only instance in the whole system of ceremonial worship instituted by Moses, where confession and transfer of sin was made and symbolized, was when the hands were laid on the head of the scape-goat, which was never offered to God, but sent away into the wilderness as a thing accursed.

Thus regarded, sacrificial worship is free from many of the objections which lie against the perversions into which it has fallen. But in its best form, it indicates a lamentable decline from the spiritual worship which preceded it. It presents the divine character under a degraded and sensual aspect, revealing, however, the change that has been going on in the spiritual condition of the race and in its conceptions of God, rather than any infirmity in the essential attributes and perfections of divinity. It is precisely such a system as might have originated with men in their gradual alienation from God, and is entirely congruous with the corrupt state into which they are known to have fallen at a very early period. It is an eclipse of God, throwing its shadow across the field of human history for thousands of years—an eclipse caused by and adapted to man's diseased and obscure mental vision. It is repugnant to all just conceptions of the divine character, and cannot be regarded as an expression of God's will.

This style of worship once instituted, it is easy to see that it could not long retain the comparatively harmless form it first assumed. It was at best a burdensome and needless invention, or, if necessary at all, only rendered so by the very evils and perversions in men by which they had separated themselves from God, and become averse to genuine spiritual worship as well as incapacitated for it. Hence, sacrificial worship soon degenerated into idolatry. The causes which led to its institution continued operative, and were stimulated to fuller developments. Images of animals were fashioned and set up in the temples of religion, and instead of being regarded as the symbolical forms of certain divine attributes, came at last to be revered as veritable deities, or at least as their visible shrines. Jehovah was grossly misconceived and blasphemed. He was divided against Himself, and made to conform to the sensual, dark and malign character which human nature had assumed. Hence animals and even human victims were slaughtered at the altars of religion to appease the wrath of Heaven and expiate the guilt of men.

Even the Hebrew race, of whom was Abraham, fell into this current of evil and perverse practices, and followed after false gods. The original principles of sacrificial worship became obscured and perverted among them. Abram himself needed to be taught that human sacrifices were neither required by Jehovah nor acceptable to Him. There was imminent danger that all worship of the true God, external as well as internal, would perish from the earth, and that the most shocking and bloody idolatrous rites would usurp its place. To avert this result, a particular family of the Hebrew nation, viz.: the seed of Abraham, was set apart to be instructed in the principles of true religion. In accommodation to their degraded and evil states, Jehovah permitted them to retain sacrificial worship, from which it was impossible to detach them at once without utterly destroying them; but commissioned Moses so to regulate it as to rescue it from the flagrant perversions into which it had been carried, and cause it to express, under representative rites, the principles of genuine internal worship. By this means communication was maintained between Heaven and earth, the Jewish people were kept in some degree of external morality and sanctity, and the race was prepared for the introduction of the Christian dispensation.

Animal sacrifices, therefore, were not first instituted in the time of Moses. He found them already in general use when he entered upon his work, and under divine direction he simply regulated what could not be at once abolished. Only the form, and not the substance of sacrificial worship, was made the subject of divine legislation. This view enables us to reconcile some scriptural statements which would otherwise stand in conflict with each other, and shows how it can be true, that animal sacrifices were not of divine origin, nor in themselves agreeable to the divine will, and yet that Moses was instructed by Jehovah to prepare an elaborate ritual for sacrificial worship.

The offering of animals, however, was at best but an expensive and elaborate ritual of religion, and not genuine religion itself. Its importance as compared with a life of obedience to the moral law, was as the value of the Sunday worship or liturgical services in which men now engage, is to that of the daily habits and uses of a life of charity. It was a mere external form, having no worth save that which might be imparted to it from principles of goodness and truth, already wrought into the character and conduct of the worshipper. Its whole effect, too, was manward. It operated no change in God. It purchased no favors at His hands. It served, however, as a standing remainder to the Jewish people and to their idolatrous neighbors, of their indebtedness to God as the source of all life and blessing. It signified also the supreme and sole lordship of Jehovah, in that some of the very animals which were regarded as objects of worship among the heathen, and whose images were set up in their temples, were required to be offered daily at His altar.

But the question still remains, What relation did the Jewish sacrifices sustain to the person and work, sufferings and death of the Lord Jesus Christ?

If the bloody rites of sacrificial worship, and the sensual states of the people, which rendered them possible, were obnoxious to Jehovah, it will scarcely be claimed that these very rites were the divinely-appointed antetype of the sacrifice of Christ viewed as a substitute provided by God to expiate the sins of men. If they were designed to prefigure the vicarious character of Christ's sufferings and death, the inspired writers could not so often have spoken disparagingly of them, or declared obedience to be better than sacrifice. If, too, the Jewish people had hope of salvation only on the ground that their sacrifices were typical of the promised and sole efficacious sacrifice of Christ, then they needed to cherish the profoundest reverence for them, observe them most strictly, and exalt them in importance far above the moral law. Instead of this, as we have seen, chief stress is laid by the prophets on the elements of spiritual goodness and the practical duties of a virtuous life. "Wash you; make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil; learn to do well," (Isaiah i., 18,) is the burden of their admonitions. If, moreover, the sacrifice of animals was a divine institution, intended as a perpetual representation and prophecy of the sacrifice of Christ as our substitute, then it has failed of its purpose; for none of the prescribed forms of sacrifice was observed at the death of Christ. Or, if we allow that his death was the proper fulfilment of the representative rites of sacrifice, then the murderers of our Lord become for the time being Jehovah's sacred priests; and the ignominious cross His holy altar. But, if every mind revolts, as it surely must, from such a conception; and if, "by wicked hands" our Lord "was crucified and slain," then we are forced to the conclusion that the crucifixion of Christ, and the sacrifice of animals in worship, were both alike indicative of man's deep degradation and sinfulness, and hence offensive in the sight of God. Not that we regard the two things as equally criminal, for they were not; but they were both the fruit of the same evil and darkened state of the human mind, and not the work of a merciful and righteous God. And, conversely, if the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus Christ, instead of being a divinely-appointed sacrificial act, expiatory of human guilt, was the very concentration of all wickedness, an act of high treason against Jehovah, and hence in the last degree abhorrent to Him, with what consistency can we suppose that He instituted the Jewish sacrifices, and constituted them the sacred and impressive types of the most glaring crime that His creatures could commit against Him?

If, therefore, the sacrificial system was representative of the work of Christ, as it doubtless was, it must have been so in some other sense than that here considered. What its true representative force was in reference to Christ, will readily appear, from what has already been said concerning the origin and primary significance of sacrificial rites. We have seen that these rites were intended as a liturgical expression of the religious feelings. They represented the consecration of the worshipper, the hallowing of his affections and thoughts, the surrender of the natural to the influx and control of the spiritual mind, the exercise of love and gratitude toward God. The animals brought to the altar were such as corresponded to sentiments of sincere worship, though the offering of them did not necessarily imply that the act proceeded from proper motives. The Jewish sacrifices therefore symbolized those spiritual sacrifices which are required of all men, and which are alone of value in the sight of God. And they represented the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus Christ in precisely the same sense and way that they typified the sacrifice which every one of us is required to make of himself to God. As we are commanded to "present our bodies"—(i. e. our whole being)—"a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is our reasonable"—(i. e. rational or spiritual, as opposed to a mere ceremonial and carnal)—"service;" so Christ yielded himself unto God as "a lamb without blemish and without spot." He subjected his finite human nature absolutely to His divine essence, thus glorifying it and making it divine. He sacrificed all mere natural affections, and put off all mere human and finite states of life. In Him, therefore, divinity became human, and humanity became divine. He who was divine in first principles became divine also in the last or lowest—and Jehovah is henceforth present among His creatures as a Divine Natural Man.

But Christ's sacrifice, though analogous in form to that required of men, is not to be measured as to the value and efficacy by any finite standard. In His Divine Humanity He has become, in a measure, infinitely greater than any mere creature ever can, the living medium of divine influences for the regeneration of men.

This view of the relation of the Jewish sacrifices to the sacrifice of Christ, and of their proper representative meaning, harmonizes the teachings of revelation with the conclusions of reason, and the requirements of divine justice with the instincts of a purified and loving heart. While it is impossible to conceive of God as instituting or approving this ritual of blood, as it is impossible to imagine Him delighting in the deeds of those who nailed His Son to the cross, we can yet see how He could consistently avail Himself of existing forms of worship from which men could not be at once divorced, to construct a system of religious symbols, which should truly represent the principles of spiritual worship, and typify the sacrificial work of Christ as well as the service required of every individual man. He therefore seizes upon the very signs of man's apostasy, and forges them into instruments by which the race shall be subdued unto Himself. He tolerates sacrifices only because He can make them the means of their own overthrow—the channel of ideas and influences that shall educate men to reject them as unnecessary and absurd. That this end was reached in the latter stages of the Mosaic dispensation, history attests. Tradition also declares that after the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple of God by the Romans, an eminent Jewish Rabbi assembled his surviving brethren amid the ruins, on the site where the solemnities of sacrifice had been so long performed, and, with the consent of all, proclaimed that thenceforth the offering of sacrifices was not obligatory, and that works of charity should be considered their equivalent and substitute.

A NOBLE ART.

BY ALGER FORESTIER.

ONCE I remembered among my friends a lady who had known many afflictions, cares and heart-griefs, and yet, whose brightness of demeanor and cheerfulness were unflagging, whose very presence was a sunbeam. This lady talked often of her art. When praised for any striking course of action, she would reply, with touching simplicity: "Yes, I learned that from my art."

As a child, I often wondered what this art could be; growing older, I set myself to work to find out. It was not the art of music, passionately fond as she was of that divine art, and on as lofty a pedestal as she placed it; for, being somewhat at home within its magic realms myself, I knew that she was not sufficiently skilled therein to designate it as her own; nor was it the art of painting, nor yet of sculpture.

"Miss Margaret," I inquired one day, "what is your art?"

A sweet smile flitted across her face, as she touchingly asked for reply, "And have I so poorly exemplified it all these years, that you need ask?"

"I am sure, now," cried I, "that it is, after all, what has often suggested itself to my mind, 'The art of making the most of life.'"

"You are right," she answered, well pleased; "and this I consider the greatest of arts—all others are sent to earth to aid us in perfecting it."

This made a deep impression upon me, one that I have never forgotten. Since then I have become an observer in life, and have frequently had occasion to marvel how few comprehend or endeavor to live by this art. Many fields of science and art are open to those whose talents guide them into such directions; but this one field is open to all, and they who best make use of their own individual talents are best fitted to enter nobly upon it. To make the most of life, we must court the sunshine. There is sorrow enough given into every human life without our needing to cling to each separate grief, and gloat over its memory. By holding fast to the sunbeams that stray across our paths, we can accomplish marvels in the way of lighting up the dark places of life. There is much to enjoy, much to make one happy in this beautiful world, despite its cares and bitternesses, and our highest duty to ourselves, as well as to those who surround us, is to make the most and the best of life, and to be as happy as we can.

The next stage of existence lies stretched before us as an unknown sea, that it will be fuller, grander, more complete than this every instinct of our nature teaches us to believe—otherwise we know nothing of its requirements. The present, however, is ours; we know its duties and needs; we know that the more we struggle to fulfil these the stronger we grow, the more good we can accomplish. We know, too, that the good God never gave us intellect without purposing that we should use it and make the best of it, as of all else with which He has endowed us. Undoubtedly, therefore, they who best grasp "The art of making the most of Life," will be best fitted for the requirements of another state of being when called to enter upon it.

SOMETIME.

BY MRS. HATTIE F. BELL.

SOME time we may look back upon these days,
And think them brighter than we deem them now;
Some time, when youth has flitted from our gaze,
And care has ploughed deep on our brow.
We may recall this self-same hour again,
And thro' the roseate veil of vanished years
See many a blessing which we now call pain,
And much of sunshine where we now have tears.

The days are gliding by on noiseless wing—
Some go in gladness, and some go in grief;
Could we but realize the good they bring,
And that, at best, the longest life is brief.
Might we not live and love, and satisfied,
Win calm contentment for our daily guest,
Which, like a sweet song-bird at eventide,
Shall sit and carol in the old home-nest.

Oh! let us, as we journey on our way,
Along the crooked paths of busy life,
Remember always this, to "watch and pray,"
For this alone will help us thro' the strife.
And then, some time, in after years to come,
When we in memory shall retrace the past,
We'll find the nearer that we get toward Home,
Each year has still been better than the last.

By two wings a man is lifted up from things earthly; namely, by simplicity and purity. Simplicity doth tend toward God; purity doth apprehend and (as it were) taste Him.—THOMAS A' KEMPIS.

MY THORN.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

HE, Weston, was poor; I knew it when I married him; but he told me we three could all live together so nicely—he and I and his sister Joanna.

I had never met Joanna but once, and then I had so little time—just while the cars stopped at noon—that we had no opportunity of becoming acquainted. She was tall and straight, her voice low and musical, and her step as soft as a cat's. Surely I'd like sister Joanna.

But before we had lived in the same house a fortnight, I found her to be my antipode. I liked to listen to the soothing patter of the rain on the roof; it made her lonesome. I liked to have that loose limb of the great overgrown lilac bush against the window, and make its leafy shadow creep across the carpet; she tied it back fast to the main body, because it made her think there was a man sneaking about the window. I liked to see the tall spikes of flowering hollyhocks stand close up to the white walls of our house; she hacked them off with the butcher knife because they were common, and not suggestive of thrift. I liked to see the branches of the weeping willow trail across the path, and sweep their plummy lengths on the grass; but Joanna couldn't see people pass along the road, and recognize them "for sure," until the lower and larger branches of the willow were cut away; and, though it made me most sensitively shrink away from the task, they were cut away at my suggestion.

I shuddered when I thought that perhaps all the years of my wedded life, were they many or few, would be spent under the same roof with my husband's sister, Joanna. Oh, I thought I'd really rather live out in the woods in a hollow tree in the winter, and beside a mossy log in the summer, than to endeavor to stand this! I was too honorable to complain. I thought I would lay my hand over my mouth, and my face in the dust, before I would ever let my mother or my husband know of this. It would trouble them, and would do me no good. I comforted myself this way.

I patched up a theory, and with it covered my propensity to growl, and fret, and worry; and this was it—that we all have a one trouble; there was no life-path so sunny that a shadow did not fall across it, and my trouble was—his sister, Joanna.

I looked around among my friends to compare loads with them, and—would you believe it?—I was not willing to exchange burdens with any of them. Mrs. A. had a jealous, snarling husband; mine was a jewel of a boy. Mrs. B.'s husband was illiterate and lazy, and cared so little for her comfort that he was as a dead body, repulsive, yet not to be shaken off; mine was alive to my comfort and welfare. Mrs. C.'s husband married her to spite another girl, not for love; mine would have lived and died a discon-solate bachelor had he not won me, the woman of his choice, the girl of his heart. Mrs. D.'s husband was so niggardly that he'd hardly allow her enough rich soil in which to grow a geranium, and she had to give an account of every dime she spent; me and mine were mutual partners in the contents of the family wallet; I was trusted without blame or stint. Mrs. E. had to care for a bed-ridden mother-in-law, and all her bloom and freshness was wasting away under the thankless work. Mrs. F.'s husband was so homely that every little whiff of a dog would run out and bark and snip at his heels as he passed along the streets; mine was kingly in his beauty and his grace. And so I went on all through my circle of acquaintances, and finally brought up the list with myself, Chatty Reynolds, blessed among women and wives.

Yes, I could bear the whims and ways of his sister Joanna; my shadow was not near as large as a man's hand, and comforting myself thus I seemed to look out upon a life-landscape picture, serene and sunny. I determined not to fret because all was not purple and gold, and wine and honey; be sure, his sister Joanna was my bug-bear, but I'd show myself, Chatty Reynolds, that this could be borne bravely. So, braced and nerved, and serenely smiling, I went on my way, how evenly you shall see.

One day I was making curtains for the dining-room windows; I was measuring them off to hang so they would almost touch the floor, when she hailed me with, "Char-ity Runnels! what do you mean? Nonsense! Curtains of that length in a dining-room! Let me make 'em to suit myself—a sensible set o' curtains."

I did so dislike to yield, but my better self prevailed, and I said: "Well, make them just as you like; I'll be satisfied."

She made them as her mother had made curtains in her girlhood—to hang up, probably, over oiled-paper windows. They just reached to the sills of the windows, and looked like little girls' aprons. I never did like to see window-curtains starched at all—just allowed to hang soft and gracefully—but these were as stiff as paper. I always felt annoyed every time I looked at the little bristling frills in our dining-room, but I persuaded myself that this was a trifling thing not worth the minding, and so that matter was considered settled.

Onions! the smell of them always gave me the headache; but Joanna said she "loved onions," and she often ate them twice a day; sometimes she would crunch a raw one, and she ate it as though the juice was reliable.

I never could bear saur kraut about the house, but Joanna would have a barrel full made every fall. I had always been accustomed to wearing jewelry, but her pointed denunciation against it in the female prayer-meeting induced me to lay mine aside in a forbearing way, now that I was a married woman, and should not, perhaps, care for the things that pleased me in my girlhood.

I took pride in trying to have a good garden. Joanna took walks in my garden daily, and she never forbore to report that the lettuce never would make its way up through that hard crust; that the potato bugs had come on "forty thousand strong," and commenced depredations; that the cut-worms had e'en about finished the last row of marrowfat, and would soon begin on the Tom Thumbs; that she was sure we wouldn't have an early radish, and that it did beat all natur' how the weeds had got a start of the flowers, for even the Johnny-jump-ups were smothering in a mat of knot-grass.

I never heard a favorable report from the garden once in my life, though we always had the earliest and freshest and crispest vegetables in the neighborhood.

If I made a rhubarb-pie it was sure to be a "leetle stringy, Char-rity," a currant-pie was "kind o' puckery;" the strawberries and cream were sandy and "gritted between the teeth like all-possessed;" the Early York made into delicious slaw was tasty but "mightn't an angle-worm a' got into it somehow, unbeknown," and the bare suspicion made her nose turn up, and the corners of her mouth draw down in a scared way.

She always barred the doors at night and placed a table against the kitchen-door, and put nails in the windows, and fastened the blinds, and stuck a stick in the key-hole "for fear some man would come pokin' round."

Honestly, I did wish some old widower would come pokin' round and offer his warmed-over affections to my husband's sister Joanna.

Though a daily mail brought us news in plenty, she never read anything unless it was what she called "a good murder," that meant a bloody, cruel, heartless murder, the more fiendish it was, the better she liked it.

I've seen her sit like a gourmand and gloat over an account of a man cutting his wife's tongue out, and her ears off, and then killing her deliberately and slowly with torture the most heart-rending.

She was fond of visiting, and very fond of attending wakes and funerals. She went far and near to funerals, her heart was kind and full of sympathy. She always wore black on such occasions and consoled the bereft ones by such phrases as "in the midst of life we are in death;" "he's better off 'n any of us;" "well, we must all die, some time;" "we know not the day nor the hour when our time'll come;" and "the Marster'll take us all in his own good way."

She rather enjoyed such seasons of "refreshment." In her absence I always kept the tea-kettle a-near the stove, boiling, so I could make her cup of hot tea as soon as she came home. She always regaled me with such terse sentences as "he did look very nat'ral;" or, "it was the noblest looking corpse I ever saw;"

or, "she seemed just as if she was sleeping sweetly—the smile on her face was so beautiful."

Poor Joanna! she was his sister, so I always put on a show of interest and would ejaculate, "la!" "well—well!" "poor soul!" "ah, me!" or something congenial to her state of mind. It cost me nothing, and helped to make us friends.

When my little Tot was born I was bound on one thing, and that was the first time my will was ever set up against hers. I would not have that precious baby named for her, neither should it be called Dorcas, or Lydia, or Lois, or Abigail, or Zeruiah, or any of those old, Bible names for which Joanna had such a love. Tot was mine to the very ends of her little pink fingers and toes, and I meant that no old iron-bedstead of a name should cramp her, my baby.

She lay like a rose-leaf on her aunt's spacious lap, while the well-meaning old veiny hands, like claws, felt of her from tip to tip, to see if they couldn't detect a faulty place, or a deformity, or a lack in the glorious little bit of perfect pink and white mechanism, finer than a miniature watch, the most glorious of all nature's most beautiful handiwork.

"What will we call her, Char-rity? You don't want her named for yourself, sure—that's ill luck," said she.

Oh, I just shut my teeth for fear she'd say, "s'posin' we call it Joanna!"

"Oh, I'll name my baby, myself, when I think of something as pretty as can be," said I, spreading a veil over my face and pretending to try and sleep.

Well, the end came; I waited four years for it, hopeful and patient. I write this with a jubilant laugh.

A man did come "pokin' round," and he was after my husband's sister, Joanna.

He was an undertaker, owned the finest hearse anywhere about within twenty-five miles; he had met Joanna at several funerals, she always nodded to him when it was time to screw on coffin-lids—that was the way they became acquainted.

It's a family matter, and I don't want to talk about her, but their courtship was so funny. He couldn't converse two minutes until one would know what his trade was. How often I have heard him use the phrase, "I am allus merry only at a funeral!" One could imagine, however, from his occupation and her predilection that there would be congeniality between them.

They were married in a quiet way at the parsonage in the village.

He proposed a bridal trip out to the city of Cleveland, to see a body, which, when exhumed, after sixteen years, was found to be solid stone. A few hours before the time of starting on the anticipated tour a little child died of malignant scarlet fever, then two others, within four days, and the undertaker called upon was the happy husband of sister Joanna.

She rode beside him on the hearse—she sat like a queen; Cleopatra in her beautiful barge felt no prouder or happier.

On their way home from the last funeral they came to our house and stayed all night, and rode off the next morning gayly, glistening, and smelling of coffin varnish, while the mourning plumes nodded, and tossed, and swayed as though they were cutting up capers at a wedding.

I stood in the door and watched them until they were out of sight. They would turn their heads as quickly as two woodpeckers, and look in each other's faces in such a happy way that it made me glad to see them so satisfied with each other.

When she came to take her housekeeping goods from our home, the parting, the breaking up of the old relation between us, was sad. It could not be otherwise, even though we were all glad that newer and dearer ties had usurped the old ones. As we bade good-bye and kissed each other, she said with quivering lips and broken voice: "Char-ity Runnels, you've bin a dear, good, patient, kind sister to me; God bless you—and that's more'n I can say of any other woman I know. May the Lord be with ye, Char-ity, and bless ye for what you've done."

Oh, then I was so glad that I had curbed my temper, and held my wishes in check, and so patiently borne with his sister in the beginning of my married life. It was so much better than to have quarrelled with her, and reigned mistress against her will, and made us all unhappy.

I tell this episode in my own life, hoping it will be like a helping hand to young wives similarly situated. It is so much better to take life's vicissitudes coolly, and calmly, and cheerfully, and hopefully.

CROOKED PLACES.

PART IV.—MILLICENT'S ROMANCE, AND WHAT IT WAS MADE OF.

CHAPTER I.—WHERE TWO STORIES MEET.

IN all the outskirts of London, there could be scarcely a gloomier dwelling than Blenheim House, Hackney. It turned its side to the high road, a great, dirty, brick side, only broken by two lights, a barred window on the ground-floor, and another, high up, on a staircase. The front of the house looked into its own dank, green garden, amid dreary walls with their deep-set, olive-green door, bearing the inscription: "David Maxwell, surgeon."

The interior was as dismal. The rooms could never have been cheerful, but they had once been handsome. Now, the marble mantels were discolored by neglect and careless usage, the wood-carving had been chipped and never repaired, even the windows had been cheaply mended with coarse, defective glass. Whatever colors the heavy sprawling-patterned carpets had once possessed, were worn away under the steps of many years. The only pictures were a few engravings after Benjamin West, and a set of Hogarth's "Rake's Progress." The mirrors were framed in ebony. But there was none of that stately precision which gives dignity to gloom. There was always a clay pipe on the mantel-shelves, and Mr. Maxwell liked to drink his ale, at all hours, out of a pewter-pot.

The inmates were like their home, as they generally are, since they either make it or it makes them. They were only four in number—master, mistress, son and servant.

The surgeon had belonged to respectable connections of Scotch origin, but long settled as manufacturers in an eastern county. He did not belong to them now. He had found his own level, far below theirs. His closest ties were dead, and what slight communication passed between him and those who remained, were due entirely to their pitiful regrets for one who had sunk so low that he did not know his own degradation. Mr. Maxwell was a thoroughly coarse man, not without a kind of rank cleverness, which he would have been better without, for while too idle and unscrupulous to earn or deserve an honest professional confidence, this afforded him a slippery back staircase to a small, doubtful celebrity, which he valued more for its excitement than even for its uncertain profits. He was the easy-going doctor who asked no awkward questions in sundry matters connected with births and deaths, whose decorous certificate was always forthcoming—and he liked to reckon how many reputations he held in his mercy. Yet his professional income was not nearly so large as the decent, humdrum parish doctor's, and had he not possessed some small private means, he could not even have maintained the dismalness of Blenheim House, even though he was not very particular how he took payment. The only handsome modern article in Blenheim House was a velvet pile table-cover, which had come from the scene of the suicide of an old wicked patient of his. It was as good as new, except that there was a little stain on one corner, which nobody could tell was not port wine. But Mr. Maxwell did a great many dirty deeds for nothing, and therefore fancied himself a liberal man, though he never entered a shop without beating down the shopkeeper, nor paid a bill till he had been dunned many times. Mr. Maxwell professed to despise society, and called all visiting "rubbish and nonsense," which simply meant that he found his most agreeable companions in pot-houses; and that he begrudged to give that hospitality which reserves the minimum of sensual gratification to the host.

And it was very easy for him to scoff at respectable tea-parties and neighborly gatherings; but the fact was, he had really put himself out of society many years ago, and he knew it.

There had been two "Mrs. Maxwells" at Blenheim House. The first, who had been dead before Mr. Maxwell came to Hackney, had never had any right to that style—the second had only acquired it, after tardy years, at the urging of some well-meaning and wealthy connection of the surgeon's, who had vainly hoped to purify two corrupted and unrepentant lives, by a spiritual salt, which became a savorless formula the moment it touched them.

Of the mistress of the house, it is therefore needless to say much, for she was just what might be expected, except, perhaps, that having become a wife when she least thought to be one, she measured the honor, not from its proper basis, but from the depths of her previous degradation, and by her rampant self-sufficiency and insolence, justified Solomon's description of "the odious woman when she is married." She had not her husband's contempt for society. She hankered after it, as the stage whereon to strut and display her bran-new morality. Her vanity assured her credulity that nobody knew anything of her past, and she understood none of those finer feelings which shrink from taking credit beyond capital. She went regularly to church, though Mr. Maxwell never accompanied her. She angled for, and hooked an occasional invitation. Some people thought the floating rumors of the district might be only a scandal, founded on her husband's undeniably bad character, and that if she were the virtuous, though common and disagreeable wife, of such an abandoned man, she deserved a little countenance, while one or two social ghouls who believed the worst, accepted her acquaintance in the hope of getting a real peep into the Blenheim chamber of horrors. But Mr. Maxwell never encouraged his wife to return the invitations she received.

"You'll make a fool of yourself, Poll," he said; "but you sha'n't make one of me."

And so, when one of the ghouls came, he had his cup of tea sent out of the parlor into his surgery, but came into the room after, and behaved with such a mixture of coarse repulsion and coarser familiarity, that even the ghoulish retreated in dismay, and reported "that it was quite impossible to visit poor Mrs. Maxwell, the surgeon was so very peculiar."

And so Mrs. Maxwell presently became content to pay a limited number of visits on the understanding that they were not returned, on account of her husband's "eccentricities." And she did not object to the arrangement so long as it could be thus made without blighting wholly her social ambitions. Nevertheless, she had her Mordecai, and that not merely at her gate, but within it.

Many a respectable matron in Hackney, troubled, even in those days, with raw servants, that came and went, burning the linen, smashing the crockery, and diversifying the monotony of this by occasional larcenies, wondered how it was that dreary Blenheim House had won a domestic treasure which they could not find for their own snug habitations. For Phoebe Winter had been in Mr. Maxwell's service for more than twenty years, at least. She had arrived, perched behind his goods, when he came to Blenheim House. She had seen the home-coming of its present mistress. She knew all about everything. Phoebe Winter wore a wedding-ring, and was doubtless a widow. In years, as in residence, Phoebe was older than her mistress. She could never have been a pretty girl. But she was grand now. She was like some great, majestic rock, which has been stripped of all its clinging herbage. An artist once stopped her in the street and asked her to sit to him. Phoebe was savagely indignant. "Am I to be insulted at my time of life," she asked, "that nobody dared insult when I was a gal?" He wanted her for a model of Jael, the wife of Heber. Fancy what she must have been, for him to detect her fitness in her coarse, clinging dress and rough kitchen-cap.

Mrs. Maxwell had to bear many congratulations about her "faithful old servant." When the ghouls called upon her, the ghouls considered it "only a fit mark of respect to such a commendable domestic," to try to open a little conversation with her, when she attended while the ghouls resumed her clogs. Just a little harmless patronizing conversation, which, had it been received with grateful cordiality, might have led to a few more words if the lady and the servant chanced to meet in the market or at the church-door. But Phoebe Winter was not cordial.

Mrs. Maxwell wanted to get rid of Phoebe. Phoebe was determined not to go. And Phoebe had her way. If Mrs. Maxwell blustered, Phoebe did not care. If Mrs. Maxwell assumed kindness, and urged her to better herself, she only grimly answered, "that folks had their own ways of taking care of themselves." If Mrs. Maxwell taunted her for her poor spirit in staying to earn a girl's wages of six pounds a year, and no perquisites, Phoebe coolly said "that she'd seen such a many drabble-tails marry-come-up in their satines and cambrics, that she didn't covet any better than a honest linsey-woolsey for herself." This generally despatched Mrs. Maxwell to her own business in the parlor. She never took courage to give Phoebe a direct notice to quit. She knew by heart all that Phoebe would say to her side-hints, but she was not at all sure what Phoebe might say to that—and she preferred not to know.

After all, many people might have as old servants as Phoebe, if they were prepared to endure such service as hers. She certainly worked hard, but she did not know how to work. She could not have entered service till her ideas were set beyond readjustment, and they had surely been formed in a country-laborer's cottage. Every detail showed it. She could cook well in flour, milk, or potatoes, but her meats were either raw or cindery. She could scrub, but she could not dust; she could wash, but she could neither starch nor iron. Twice or thrice Mrs. Maxwell had supplemented her deficiencies by another servant. But no other servant would stay long at Blenheim House. Some were afraid of the master. Some declared they would not stop in a place where the mistress did not think they were of the same flesh and blood as herself. They each poured out their grievances to Phoebe before they went away. Phoebe pursed up her mouth, and said nothing.

Such was the woman who lived in Blenheim House kitchen, with its prospect of dust-bin and pump. But wherever the Blenheim House skeleton cupboard was, it surely had a door into that kitchen, whether the master knew it or not, and although Mrs. Maxwell had never found it—perhaps because she feared to search too close.

But there was one young life in the dismal, hopeless place. There was one who had played—faintly and quietly, perhaps—about the gloomy rooms, Little David Maxwell, as he was called by repute, had not arrived in Hackney with Phoebe in the goods cart. He had been brought up next day by a maid who had a box and baggage of her own with her, as if she expected to stay, but who presently went away again, box and all, counting money in her purse.

Phoebe had the sole charge of him, from then, till the new Mrs. Maxwell came, seven years after. Since then, she might be said to have had double charge of him—not only to preserve, but to defend.

Little David had sat at meals with the surgeon and his wife. But he had learned his lessons in the kitchen. He had had his playmate there, too, in the shape of a great, good-tempered cat; but when the new mistress came home, she ordered this to be sent away, saying: "Some little boys should be thankful to be fed and clothed themselves, without expecting money to be wasted on meat for useless animals."

She wanted it to be destroyed. She would give a man sixpence to do it, she said. "Last money need never be grudged." But with apparent indifference Phoebe had suggested that she thought this expense might be spared, she knew where she could find a home for David's favorite.

So she did. That very evening she carried it off to an almshouse near. David went with her, to see his pet completely installed on a soft cushion in an old woman's snug domicile. In his passionate childish grief at leaving his playfellow, he did not much notice that old woman's garrulous assurances.

"Deed, mem, an' it shall be taken care of. I'm fond of beasts—cats in particular, an' I'd have had one long ago if I could afford its keep, and it shall have its cat's meat and milk just as you say, mem, and you're welcome to look in, an' see that I'm a-layin' out your money as you mean it to be."

"There, there, Davie," said Phoebe, as they walked home, "don't cry, you'll be able to come with me and see Tommy now and then."

"But I sha'n't have him always any more," sobbed the boy.

"Pussy is quite comfortable," Phoebe assured him, "he is better off than with us, for that nice little room will be warm all night, much nicer than our damp kitchen. If you care for poor pussy, David, you shouldn't mind giving him up for his own good."

Fivepence a week for cat's board was a heavy tax on six pounds a year. Phoebe could not have clearly explained why she paid it. But David growing satisfied in the dull kitchen, because he had a glimpse of his favorite, sleek and snug on the almshouse window-sill, had learned the childish version of a price-less lesson.

David went to school, and won the favor of his master. His schoolfellows did not know him. His solitude, and the dispiriting sense of an unintelligible inferiority, forced on him by his stepmother, had not taught him how to make friends. He would decline a share in sports which he was really longing to join. If there were any lad for whom he felt a particular admiration and warmth, from that boy he especially shrank.

At fifteen, he closed his career as a pupil. Instead of the dozens of friends which most youths fancy they have made for life, David Maxwell had but a trembling possession of one. This was a boy named Fergus Laurie, the son of a very needy widow, who had given him the advantage of a year's "good schooling" before putting him into a neighboring manufactory.

David and Fergus were about the same age, and Fergus was sent to earn his bread two years before David left school—a fact whereon Mrs. Maxwell made many edifying comments. There were many points of sympathy between the boys. For both, it was desirable that the friendship should be an outdoor one. David had never called forth express injunction on the subject, but he quite understood that no acquaintance of his would be welcome at Blenheim House. On the other hand, Mrs. Laurie lived in a perpetual muddle, and was a woman who would never admit any stranger to a sight of the scanty fare which she could scarcely get for her own children. For though she would often put herself into protracted difficulties by a burst of extravagant indulgence in the table luxuries, after which she constantly hankered, yet to share such dear-bought luxuries with others formed no part of her enjoyment.

Fergus's life would be hard if David's was repressed. Fergus was like a plant left open to battle with the storm. David was like one shut up from light and air.

Fergus gave David his first great pleasure—the exquisite delight of having something to give worthy of another's taking. Fergus's education was broken off just at the climax of his longing for knowledge. As David advanced beyond his friend, he discovered that he might help him forward.

There was a pathetic humor in the lads' shifts. They had to carry on their studies wandering in the streets. Sometimes they would snatch a chapter of history by the friendly light of some shop window. Once, on a frosty night, David bought a pennyworth of roast chestnuts, that he might seek out the derivation of a word by the warm light of the chestnut vendor's fire. David lent his school-books to Fergus between the respective class days. David even lost a prize because Fergus forgot to return one in time for him to get up an important task.

The two lads were "confirmed" at the same time. They went together to the vicar for preparation. Mr. Devon was considerably interested in them both. Mr. Devon was one of those who believed no more of the queer reports about the Maxwells than that the surgeon was a very bad man, the shadow of whose vices had fallen on two probably innocent wives. He was rather annoyed that Mrs. Devon persisted in being very freezing to Mrs. Maxwell whenever she called at the vicarage. Mrs. Devon never contradicted him when he asserted his view of the case, which discreet reservation only made it the harder for him to blame her for a very subtle line of behavior, which, had the good gentleman only known it, Mrs. Maxwell was far too hardened and arrogant to feel, or to care for.

"That young Maxwell has really a remarkable scriptural knowledge, and a child-like clearness of belief," said the vicar to himself. "I cannot suppose he acquired it at school, for I fear there is not much lively evangelical truth taught in the academy. He must owe it to his stepmother, after all, coarse, vulgar woman as I must own—not to Mrs. Devon—that she appears!"

That same night, speaking with her nurse-like freedom, which she had never resigned, Phoebe inquired: "Well, David, could you answer the parson's questions?"

"I think so, Phoebe. Thanks to you, if I did. You must have taken a great deal of trouble with me."

David had not long left the Academy before he returned to it as a teacher. Apart from Mrs. Maxwell's taunting hints, he had a right-minded boy's desire for independence, and, in his father's utter apathy, only too eagerly seized on what first presented itself as a road thereto.

Fergus Laurie stoutly blamed him for entering a line of life with such narrow, dim prospects. Fergus was already advancing in his manufactory, and had made up his mind to die a merchant prince. Fergus Laurie was a slight, small creature, but strong and sound in his very delicacy, and possessing that nervous-bilious temperament which always carries so much before it. He had hazel eyes for David's gray eyes, stiff, drab-brown hair for David's chestnut locks, and though they were both equally taciturn, when Fergus Laurie spoke, it was not with David's timid proffer of ideas, but with authority, and the air of one who would have spoken long before had he cared to take the trouble. Fergus Laurie had fronted the world, compounded family debts, negotiated family loans, and learned how to make sixpence represent a shilling, while David Maxwell had had nothing to do but sit still, and accept the hard fact that his parents were not like other parents, nor his home like other homes.

Fergus Laurie decorated his bedroom with such texts as—"The hand of the diligent shall bear rule," "Be strong and of good courage: be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed." He transcribed them himself, on cartridge paper, in quaint characters, that made every letter a capital one.

In David Maxwell's pocket Bible the marker lay ever on the ninety-first Psalm, and had it been removed the book would still have opened there.

He did not develop into a strong man. Perhaps it was not likely that he should. But like many another, nobody noticed that he was only struggling on till he dropped. There came an evening when he met Fergus Laurie for their accustomed walk, and was obliged to ask him not to practise his French upon him that night, he felt so queer and misty. And Fergus, who was very anxious to get on with his French at that particular time, hinted to him that he "gave way" very easily. But next morning David was not in the teacher's seat at the Academy. And he never was there again.

He did not die. He went to the very gates of the grave and struggled back again. It was in the days of doubt, that Fergus Laurie first made his way into Blenheim House.

Phoebe let him pass very easily, and he boldly presented himself at Mrs. Maxwell's parlor door.

"I don't ask to see him to-night," he said, "but I cannot rest satisfied without getting the report from head-quarters, and then, of course, you will tell me, as soon as ever I may venture in."

Fergus meant to gain admittance, and he gained it. Was he, Fergus Laurie, who meant to conquer the world, to be exiled from his only friend by a woman whose measure he took as he did Mrs. Maxwell's? It was no use shutting moral doors in his face, he walked straight through them all. He could see no reason why Blenheim House should maintain such seclusion, since it certainly had not his own family reason of proud and selfish poverty. When David got better—and he would be sure to get better—how much more comfortable it would be for them to sit and read together in any of these vacant chambers than to wander in the streets!

David did get better, but his had been an illness which entails years of convalescence. His father opened his purse-strings a little, and gave him change of air in lonely sojourns at dull watering-places, and whenever some old, old parsimony made itself unpleasantly manifest in the household, Mrs. Maxwell sighed and made appropriate remarks about "the expenses one must incur for poor afflicted invalids."

For a long time, David hoped that each succeeding week would find him fit to recommence battle with the world, and on some more independent scheme—if not, oh, beautiful mirage, on an altogether new battle-field. But it was no use. He presently became convinced that this dreary page of life was too large to be left blank. He must fill it in as best he could.

His father discussed each of his suggestions with as much interest and gravity as if they had related to the politics of Lilliput, instead of the welfare of his own flesh and blood. Mrs. Maxwell dashed them by reproachful hints that "he was not grateful for his good home, and that he'd be better employed thinking of his duty to the father to whom he owed so much, than worrying about his own affairs."

David at last did the only thing that it seemed he could do. He went into the surgery. He could make himself useful there in many small ways, in lieu of young men whom his father had hitherto hired, for miserable pittances indeed, but the sparing of which would certainly cover the expenses of his board. His father had often talked of taking a pupil instead of these assistants, saying that one would be quite as useful, and save the salary. David would be this pupil. Had he known more of the world, or had a less simple-minded forgetfulness of himself, he might have been daunted by the miserable prospect before a delicate man as a medical practitioner. Nor did he know what Mr. Maxwell was as well as everybody else did. From the inside and from the outside things saw differently. And the very habit of household life, however miserable, begets a kind of confidence and fetters the critical powers. But David just did the best according to his judgment and knowledge, and it is sometimes well that one's judgment and knowledge have limits. To be over prudent, is to be less than wise.

Henceforth David almost lived in the surgery. *In the evening Fergus Laurie came there, and was still helped forward in his general studies. In the morning David sat behind the barred-window and read his medical books. It was sitting so, that he first noticed a neat, brisk, little figure that constantly went by, always carrying a drawing portfolio. He grew to look for her. Perhaps it was the utter absence of any such figure from his own life that invested it with such a peculiar charm. He wondered what the house must be like where she lived.

"Don't you know who that is?" Fergus Laurie asked, one morning, when he happened to call in at the surgery, and perhaps observed that David's eyes followed the little passer-by as she went down the road. "That is Miss Millicent Harvey. She lives with her mother, in a little house in Grove Lane. She works for our firm."

"Does she, really?" David asked, adding, with a tell-tale blush. "Isn't she very sweet-looking?"

"Is she? Well, yes, I suppose she is," admitted young Laurie.

"What does she do for your firm?" David asked.

"Designs patterns," said Fergus.

"I should think she's clever," commented David. "I should think she might be able to do something above designs. She has eyes which look as if they saw a great deal. And I've noticed her looking up at the sunsets, and how few people do that—I used not myself. I suppose you know her to speak to?" he added, with ill-affected indifference.

"I require to speak to her sometimes," Fergus answered. "Have you never seen her at church? No—you can't, they sit in a corner that you don't see from your pew, and they come in and out by a different door. She has a mother and a brother. He writes for the papers."

This was all that David Maxwell ever knew of Millicent Harvey till the night when, after much demur and shrinking, he accepted the vicar's unexpected invitation.

He went home from that party with a springing step. It had come naturally to speak to her, and she had been so pleasant. He flashed upon the brutalized surgeon and his sullen wife in their forlorn parlor, like a lamp suddenly shining into a dark place. He had the same effect. The brightness stirred and irritated them.

"What's up now, Dave?" asked Mr. Maxwell. "Are you fancying some girl has fallen in love with you? Hope she's got money."

"I should think David has too much sense," said Mrs. Maxwell. "He has got something else to think of besides falling in love. He has to get back his health and make money before he dreams of that nonsense. And girls must hold themselves very cheap, if those that have a chance to visit at the vicarage would look at David."

The darkness seemed to conquer. The light went out. David went up to his bed-chamber, feeling as if it would never again be so easy to speak to Millicent.

But did the light go out? or was it only shaded and screened from the cold, cruel blast? He had caught a glimpse of beauty and joy and courage possible even in the same world as Blenheim House. The world could never be the old, dull world again. There was a yearning within him for that brighter, freer life of which he had caught a glimpse. It could not have been satisfied by the mere shadow which had awakened it. Had he been able to seize that shadow, his grasp would have swept the glory from it, as the gold perishes on a caught butterfly. But it passed softly away from his life, only to find refuge in his very soul, and to be elevated into that pure ideal, which the Saviour surely meant, when He said, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Next day, David took a leaf from Fergus's book. He, too, wrote out a text, but he did not put it up on his chamber wall, but laid it in the secret drawer of the old bureau, which Mr. Maxwell said he might use as his own.

This was the text: "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thy heart."

CHAPTER II.

A SHARP YOUNG MAN.

AFTER David Maxwell's comments, Fergus Laurie took more notice of Millicent than he had ever done before. He discovered that she really was pretty, when one came to look at her. Business prevented him from being one of the vicar's guests, on the occasion when David introduced himself to Millicent, and perhaps this accidental loss incited him to greater zeal next time he met her, in the ordinary way, in the counting-house.

Once something obliged her to wait there awhile. Fergus set a chair for her in just the most agreeable position. Fergus had often been very remiss in such common civilities. He had a nature in which politeness was not an instinct, and the occasional attentions of such are often set at a different value to habitual courtesy, except by very wise people. We need not pity those who form this false estimate, for it is generally vanity that betrays them into it, as the civility which is not of natural grace has a delicious savor of special personal tribute.

Then Fergus began to talk about her designs, and told her of praise which the head partner of the house had privately bestowed upon them. Next he asked, if she ever sketched.

Millicent hesitated. "I am seldom in the country," she said. "I have never seen such scenery as people care for. But I have tried a few things that took my own fancy; tumble-down cottages; and the church tower, trifles that nobody could see any beauty in."

"Perhaps, because they have not learned to use their eyes," Fergus answered, with an emphasis on the nominative. "But whoever does one thing well can generally do many things tolerably, and if you can sketch half as well as you design, I should think you might develop into a good artist. You must have had first-rate teaching?"

"Only my mother's," Millicent replied.

"Ah,—well,—doubtless she must have been a good teacher, and yet perhaps we only learn what we teach ourselves. You have only had a home training in art, and I only had one year's good schooling, and yet I think we have known greater dunces than we are, Miss Harvey," he concluded, with a slight laugh, as he turned away to his ledger.

Millicent was interested. The suggestion of the "one year's good schooling" touched the sympathies of George Harvey's sister. And then Fergus had hitherto been so blunt and curt, that this burst of friendly candor made one wonder what more lay hidden within him. Wonder is ever credulous. There was hardly yet a locked-up room which was not credited either with hidden treasure or a ghost; and yet rooms are sometimes locked up, simply because they are out of repair and are not wanted!

"He must have had his troubles, too, poor fellow," Millicent thought, "and troubles are apt to harden and chill one on the outside."

In those days, though only about forty-five years ago, art was in a very different position from what it is in at present. Pictorial works were costly, and consequently rare; and of the pictures which then passed as beautiful, many would now be condemned as spiritless and conventional. Yet, at the same time, art was not then degraded into a "regulation property," and if comparatively few authors saw their thoughts reflected back in pictures, at least they were not so liable to see them distorted therein. Artists were not then assured enough to ride their pet model roughshod over a poet's conception, till the reader is fairly puzzled between the womanly woman who lives on the page, and the brazen vixen who stares him out of countenance from the "cut." And there was also more scope for individual fancy, ill-trained as it might be. Wealthy people of taste had not then left off having favorite poems illustrated, and special places sketched, to their own particular order. A bride, who wished to remember the church of her wedding-day, and a widow, desiring to recall the grave of her hopes, could not then make a facile purchase of the same photograph, to serve equally as a memento of joy and sorrow. No; the bride had a sunshiny painting of the old church porch, the beech avenue, and the lych gate, while the widow procured a moonlight view of the yews among the graves behind the church, with the great east window illuminated by some evening service within.

Now one of the partners in Mr. Laurie's firm, a Mr. Smith, was greatly addicted to this kind of dabbling in art. He had made a good deal of money in business, and had a childlike enthusiasm for poetry, which he only half understood. Wordsworth was his especial adoration. The man whom necessity had chained half his life in city alleys, and whom fashion now kept in a west-end square, was yet captivated by the mountain bard's sweet pictures of "Old places, full of many a lovely brood,

Tall trees, green arbors and ground flowers in flocks,
And wild rose tiptoe upon hawthorn stocks," and only wondered that such "a poet of nature" could ever have been so forsaken as to think there was something worth writing about in "the filthy waterside corners one sees from Westminster Bridge."

This gentleman who went in stoutly for every kind of reform, except the Catholic Emancipation Bill) had paid considerable sums of money for a series of illustrations of the White Doe of Rylstone. He kept them in tissue veils, and paper cases (for the preservation of their mounts), in a portfolio in his drawing-room. He had put each of their prices on their backs, for their recapitulation was part of the show, and he did not want to make mistakes. And his good lady thought her husband entirely what she called him, "quite a Macenas."

His attention had latterly been drawn to the noble poem, "Resolution and Independence." He thought it "a fine moral piece," and liked to quote lines from it in the counting-house. This good-hearted man, whose faults were only foibles at which angels themselves might smile, always talked a great deal to Fergus Laurie. Fergus did not only assent in monosyllables, with the respectful stupidity of most of the young men. Fergus often dissented, or put questions which "drew on." The kindly master told his wife that this clerk was "a sharp young man," and did not dream that his well-meant conversations were recited for the amusement of Mrs. and Miss Laurie, and his truisms epitomized into household bywords.

"Yes, Laurie," he said, "that 'Resolution and Independence' is a very fine moral piece. I should like every young man to read it. I would not mind giving five pounds for two or three little sketches to set it off. They'd be an excuse for bringing the subject forward, and then I'd read the lines. Just simple little sketches, you know. They need not be fine, like my 'White Doe' set, because I don't want these so much as a matter of art as of doing good."

"And, of course, it is desirable to do that as cheaply as possible," said Fergus, gravely.

"Yes, of course," answered the merchant, in his simplicity, "for then one can do the more of it."

"I think I know somebody who could do what you require, sir," said Fergus.

"Indeed!" and out came a little private note-book, where percentages and shipping rates mingled oddly with quotations in rhyme, and wise adages. "If you'll just give me the name and address, Mr. Laurie, I'll be vastly obliged."

Fergus hesitated. "Will you mind giving me the commission, sir?" he asked. "I will name your terms, but will not pledge you to pay anything till at least one sketch is finished and approved of. There are circumstances that make it better the artist should not be known unless the work is successful. And it may not be successful; the artist is untried in this way; but, I think, worth trying."

"Eh, eh, young—rising, eh? I like to give a turn to such. Very much indebted to you, Mr. Laurie. Leave all to your discretion. Sha'n't mind raising the terms a little if I'm very pleased. But leave all to your discretion."

Fergus knew the way to the Harveys' house well enough. Indeed, he had called there once or twice about business, and had left messages with Mrs. Harvey for her daughter. But he required first to look in at Blenheim House, where David Maxwell was expecting him.

David was sitting, as usual, in the surgery, with a volume of Plutarch opened before him.

"I can't stay," Fergus said, in his abrupt way, "so I won't sit down. I must go on to Miss Harvey's house. I have just got a good chance for her. Our Mr. Smith wants some sketches for Wordsworth's poem, 'Resolution and Independence,' and I put in a good word for her, and if she does one well, she'll get the order."

"She'll do it," said David. "It's well to be you to have such chances of serving people."

Fergus accepted the congratulation as a matter of course.

"I hope I shall do greater things in that line soon," he observed.

David had already turned to the poem, in the copy of Wordsworth which Fergus had put on the table. He wanted to read what Millicent would be presently reading.

"She will want models," he observed. "If she cannot think of anybody for the leech-gatherer's figure, you might remind her of the old sweeper by the churchyard. I have often been struck with that old man's resolute, patient face. She could go into the graveyard and get a sketch of him without his knowing. I think it would spoil his look if he knew, and he seems a man who might even object, like our Phoebe."

David received the suggestion in silence, and David thought that very likely he condemned it as worthless, but was too kind to say so.

"I'll go with you as far as the Harveys," David proposed, cheerfully. It seemed getting near Millicent to walk with somebody who was going to speak with her. And as he went along, he revolved in his mind what other hint he could give to secure Millicent's success. He desired it with such single-heartedness, that he would risk Fergus's belief in his good taste and wisdom, by giving nineteen foolish suggestions, if out of such a bundle of blunders might come one worth consideration.

"You say Miss Harvey is to do one picture on approval—don't you, Laurie?" he asked.

"Yes," said Fergus, "and the first lines are easy to illustrate—a few trees, and a bit of brightish sky reflected in some pools."

"But I don't see that she need make the first picture the specimen," David observed. "You might tell her to take the subject that most struck her own fancy; she would be sure to do that best."

"Oh, of course I shall talk it over with her," said Fergus; "there is no use in planning what I shall advise till I see what she says."

They paused before the Harveys' gate.

"You may as well come in, too," Fergus went on.

"You have met both Miss Harvey and her brother at the vicarage. Come in."

"No, I think not," David replied, with a wistful look at the lighted parlor window. "They won't care about seeing me, and while business is being talked over, the fewer people there are about the better."

"That's quite true," said Fergus. "So, good-night." And he went in, and David crossed the road, and stood in the dark, watching the shadows that presently wavered across the blind.

Mrs. Harvey, Miss Brook and Milly were all at home, and they now constituted the whole household, for George had been married two months before the night of this memorable visit.

Fergus stated his commission in his own cold, brief way, and in the pause while Milly read and re-read the poem he laid before her, he had time to survey the parlor in which the little family group was seated. It was a pretty little room; but what struck Fergus was that its prettiness seemed so cheap and easy. Its elegancies represented very little cash, for, with unselfish foresight, Mrs. Harvey had gently overruled George whenever he had wished to buy any article of luxury. What could have been the total cost of all the ornaments?—the home-made feather-screens on the mantel, the cardboard frames in which were set especial bits of Milly's drawing, the hand-worked fringing of the book-shelves, the patch-work cover of the side-table? A mere trifle, that anybody could afford. Therefore, Fergus asked himself, why should not his mother and sister make their sitting-room look as well? And they were neither of them bread-winning women, as all of these were, or, at any rate, had been, till quite lately. "If we had a room like this," said Fergus to himself, "we could invite anybody to visit us—and I should like to invite people. Our place ought to look quite as well, for I'm sure our furniture is really better, and mother and Robina must have more leisure than these."

With all his sharpness, Fergus had not yet learned that those who do much, always find time for more, and that whatever does not cost money, involves a mental and moral wealth, which is not nearly so easily acquired.

"I am to draw one picture on trial?" Milly asked, looking up at last, with a catch in her voice such as people have as they brace themselves to climb a hill. It never even occurred to Milly to say that "there was no use in trying." Effort was certainly in her power, whether success was, or no.

"Yes, and take any one you like," said Fergus. "Don't feel yourself bound to begin at the beginning."

"I should prefer to take a scene that would include the leech-gatherer's figure," Milly mused aloud. "I should like the test sketch to be one of the most important, because I should not like to succeed in that, and fail afterward."

"Certainly not," said Fergus, "but the first picture will get all the criticism. Succeed brilliantly in that, and the others will be trusted. It is like when artists or authors make a name, people take the rest of their work on credit. Nobody is always inquiring into things. Get a reputation for early rising, and you may sleep till noon-day."

"Humph?" said Miss Brook, from her corner.

"Perhaps I may suggest that if you want a study for the leech-gatherer you may find one in the sweepstake by the churchyard," Fergus went on. "Just go inside the palings, and take a look at him, and perhaps you may get from him two or three good lines to give individuality to your lay figure's correctness. Have you any lay figures, Miss Harvey?"

"Oh, yes," said Milly, "I bought one a long while ago."

"If not, I was going to offer to bring one for you, as I shall be in the West End to-morrow. So, I suppose you have had thoughts of this kind of work before?"

"Scarcely," Milly laughed. "But I like it, and I thought my designing would be none the worse for it."

And then Fergus rose, and departed amid Mrs. Harvey's thanks and Milly's grateful assurances that he had already given her some most valuable hints, and that any more he might think of would be extremely welcome.

"And if your friend" (who he was, remained a secret from Milly) "is not quite satisfied with my first attempt, tell him I shall be most happy to throw it aside and try again, if he will let me," she pleaded.

"Oh, of course I shall see it first," Fergus answered, "and I who know his ideas, and exactly what he requires, will be able to judge whether it will do, and if you give me leave to tell you if I think not, you can try again, without his knowing anything about it."

"Give you leave?" echoed Milly, "it will be the greatest kindness you could show me. And I will set to work diligently, that I may have time for three or four failures."

And as Fergus came out of the bright little passage, with the eagerly grateful faces of the mother and daughter beaming behind him, David Maxwell turned and fled in the darkness, and then presently, fearful lest Fergus might see him in some sudden cross light, stepped into a deep, shady porch, and stood there breathless, till Fergus's springing step had passed far down the road.

CHAPTER III.

HOW FERGUS LAURIE GOT HIS OWN WAY.

MILLY set to work upon her sketches with all energy. Fergus Laurie presently sent her a note saying that he would take care that she was not called upon as early as usual for her regular supply of designs, and she wrote back, thanking him, and saying this would help her forward with the "sense of freedom." But he found that her designs arrived on the same day as usual.

Fergus presently made up his mind that he would take his sister Robina to call on the Harveys as a preliminary to inviting them to take tea with his mother. To name such schemes was to produce a revolution at home.

"I hope you've counted the cost before you think of beginning such things," said Mrs. Laurie.

"What cost can there be?" said her son, serenely. "Will it ruin us to buy another half pound of tea and some currants and candies for Robina to make into a cake?"

"I'm not going to make a cake for people to laugh at," observed Robina. "Don't do these things at all unless you mean to do them properly."

"Well, at any rate, come with me to see these people," Fergus pleaded, "and afterward I'll settle everything exactly as you like. Only come," and he added an argument likely to be more effectual in these quarters. "We shall never get on, or be able to afford anything, if we shut ourselves up like hermits."

"I've seen these Harveys at church," said Robina Laurie. "They are always very particular well dressed. I would like to pay visits as well as anybody, yet unless I can get something better to wear than my last winter's bonnet, I'd rather not go."

"What would it cost to get a bonnet as good as Miss Harvey's?" Fergus asked, in helpless masculine ignorance.

"It could not be bought under a guinea!" said Robina, with triumph. "Yes, indeed," she added, spitefully, "it is very easy to be always hinting how neat and pretty she looks, but neatness and prettiness cost something, I can tell you, sir; and if one is to have them, somebody must pay for them!"

Fergus was astounded. This put all his calculations about economy at fault. But he knew enough traditionally of the Harveys to feel sure that they had no private income, and he jumped to the conclusion that if their means justified such expenses, so did his own. A very common conclusion, though scarcely worthy of Fergus's reasoning powers. But he wanted his will, and would not let even his own logic stand in its way. And how was he, poor male creature, to know or suspect that the Harveys' bonnets were all home-made, and came out year after year pleasing and apparently new, but at only three or four shillings of fresh cost? Still some vague notion of such possibility came across him.

"Can't you make a bonnet for yourself cheaper than that, Robina?" he asked.

Robina bounced out of the room. She could bounce, though she was a little mite of a thing, after her brother's mould. She came back with her marketing bonnet in her hand. It was a coarse straw bonnet, badly dyed, with a piece of washed ribbon strained awry across it.

"There," said she, "that's the sort of thing people who have never learned millinery can get up at home. Would you like to take me visiting in that?"

This settled the question. "Get whatever you must have," Fergus conceded. "I'll pay for it. But I can't believe that you need to make all this fuss about paying a call to people no better off than we are ourselves, if so well off. For everything put together, including whatever allowance they get from the son since his marriage, I should not think they have more to live on than my salary, and we have mother's pension besides."

"Ah, you'd better think of letting that accumulate for us, than go wasting your money to show off to strangers," sighed Mrs. Laurie. "And how do you know what people have? They have a good lodger, anyhow."

"I was just thinking so might we, mother," said Fergus. "We have two rooms standing empty."

"I'll not have any one but ourselves in my house," Mrs. Laurie returned. "I've not been used to that sort of thing. Still, it's profitable for those that don't mind it."

"In my father's time, and until I paid the rent," said Fergus, "you were not 'used' to live in a house where there was a room to spare." Fergus had struggled stoutly for his family, and took a kind of pride in connecting all his ambitions with them. But he was not dutiful with his tongue. Indeed, the whole Laurie family affection was of the curious kind which thinks itself above courtesy or restraint, and delights in proving with what immunity it can give and take thrusts which would prove death-blows among outer-world friendships. But it was only a compound form of selfishness; and the good-nature with which they each took the other's home-truths was only as real as the frankness with which some men are wont to accuse themselves of pride, hastiness, or folly.

However, in two or three days, Robina announced to her brother that she was ready to accompany him to the Harveys whenever he chose, and so they went together that very evening.

Hatty Webber happened to be visiting her mother, and was sitting chatting with Mrs. Harvey and Miss Brook, while Milly was hard at work on her sketches at a side-table. Hatty Webber never took work with her to visit; she would no more have thought of carrying the children's stockings in her reticule, than Milly would have dreamed of taking her pencils and india-rubber when she went to tea with the Webbers. "Everybody must rest sometimes," was Hatty's dogma, "and whoever is always at work before people, must take it easy behind their backs."

Of course, Milly's drawings were the first topic. She was just putting the last touches upon the test picture. Fergus looked at it, but approved so coolly, that Milly got frightened, and eagerly begged that she might do another.

"Oh, no, there is no need for that," Fergus said. "I have no doubt this will do well enough. Only the figure is almost too much like the old crossing-sweeper. A little more fancy—a little idealization would have been better, perhaps. Still, tastes differ. And I dare say, the gentleman who has to judge this picture will not know about the crossing-sweeper."

"But what can it matter if he does?" asked Hatty.

"Oh, he might think it was commonplace," Fergus explained. "It is easy to revere this old leech-gatherer—a particular branch of poverty we are never likely to come across; but it spoils the romance to confound him with an old beggar, to whom any of us can give a halfpenny when we choose."

"A crossing-sweeper is not a beggar," said practical Hatty; "for, whenever we use his crossing without paying him, we have more occasion to say 'thank you' to him, than he has to us, when we do pay him."

"You are like a friend of mine," Fergus answered. "When there has been a particularly poor object-looking being standing at a crossing, I've known my friend go sloshing through the mud, rather than pass him without a fee."

"Is that Mr. Maxwell?" asked Milly, simply. She had often seen him with Fergus.

"Ah, you know him. Yes, it is he."

"And now," said Miss Laurie, addressing Mrs. Harvey, "I must give you our special excuse for this intrusion. We have come to invite you and Miss Harvey to take tea with us this day fortnight."

Mrs. Harvey glanced at Milly. Milly looked bright and eager.

Therefore Mrs. Harvey answered: "Thank you. We shall be very happy to come."

"We are very glad to have the opportunity of making such friends," Fergus observed, with that touch of reserved warmth in his tone, which suggested so much.

"Yes, indeed," said his sister Robina aside to Mrs. Webber, "for paying a visit or receiving one has grown quite a novelty with us. We have been so very poor, that it has been quite impossible for us to keep any equal terms with such people as we would wish, and we are rather too proud to accept friendship on any other footing."

"We have been very poor, too," said Hatty, but she spoke stiffly.

"We are going to invite Mr. and Mrs. George Harvey," Fergus went on. "Very likely they will not despise an opportunity for a long evening with you. And we shall be delighted to see you and Mr. Webster, too," he added, turning to Hatty. "My mother and sister will do their best to entertain you."

"Oh, yes, we'll do our best," said Robina, "only my brother knows a great deal about it, you know, and fancies it is quite as easy to receive twelve people as six. But do come—if you'll only look over short-comings, and take us as you find us."

"Thank you very much," Hatty answered, with the chill of her manner setting into hard frost; "but we do not go out very often, and cannot see our own old friends as often as we would wish. So you must excuse us."

And then Robina Laurie felt she had done something wrong, and that she would have a scolding from her brother, and would have been glad of a little more delay, before he requested that Milly's drawing might be wrapped up, and put in his charge, and then took leave.

"What do you think of them, Hatty?" Milly asked, eagerly, when they were gone. Fergus Laurie had been such a prominent subject in all her recent conversations with her sister, that she was delighted to hope that this personal acquaintance might give them a mutual interest in him.

"Well, Milly, I can't say I fell in love with either of them," Hatty returned.

"I don't think you understood him," said Milly. "You thought he himself meant what he said, whereas he was only stating the general feeling of most people."

"Well, at any rate, I don't like the sister," persisted Hatty, "and as they are people who are so particular to have their friends on an equality with them, they have no right to invite our George."

"Oh," said Miss Brook, grimly, "don't you know that equality generally means that one's as good as one's superiors, but better than one's equals, and above touching one's inferiors?"

"I don't know more of Miss Laurie than you do," Milly conceded. "But I cannot understand how she gave Hatty so much offence. She owns that she has lost the habit of talking to strangers, and I daresay it is a kind of nervousness which makes her over open. In a world where we all require to have so much patience with each other, it is surely easy to be patient with that. You are generally so good-humored, Hatty—a great deal more good-humored than I am. But Miss Laurie saw you were affronted."

"I can't endure being patronized," said Hatty. "And if she did not find it a pleasure to have us, why should she think it could be a pleasure for us to go?"

"Children, children," put in Mrs. Harvey, "don't forget that the Bible exhorts us to that charity which thinketh no evil. Better to be disappointed in people, than grow so wise as never to trust, or to forgive in little matters where there may be mutual misunderstanding."

"Do you think I have much of that wisdom, mother?" Hatty asked, pitifully. This married daughter was always keenly touched by the least reproof from Mrs. Harvey. "I'm sure I don't want it," she added, "and I'm quite ready to own that perhaps I didn't take to the Lauries because I couldn't help wondering what they would have thought of me, in the happy old days when I scoured down the house at Mile End."

"They would have loved and admired you," cried Milly. "At any rate, he would. In spite of his cold manner, I am sure he is very warm-hearted and far seeing. They are but shallow people who fancy warm manners and warm hearts must go together?"

Shallow indeed! But scarcely more shallow than the sentimentalists who think that warm hearts are always hidden in cold exteriors.

Meanwhile, Fergus and Robina trudged some distance in silence. Robina was afraid to speak, lest she should bring out the lecture which she felt was due. It came soon enough.

"I don't know what you can think of yourself," said her brother. "I extend my invitation to somebody who is accidentally present when the original one is given, and you back it up by saying what an immense deal of trouble it will give if it is accepted. You have no breeding, Robina. But you might have a little regard for me. I think I am the first person to be considered in these affairs. The entertainment is mine, and if you find I am putting too much work upon you, you could but tell me privately that you must have assistance."

"I'm sure I'm very sorry," said Robina, in a tone curiously balanced between conciliation and defiance, "But I did not think you could really want the Webbers' company. The man keeps a shop in the Mile End Road, and speaks like a person who has never been to school. You spoke of going a little into society because it might help you to get on. I don't see that the Webbers' friendship could be any advantage to you."

Robina had only quoted his own words, though certainly with that added shade of meaning which quoted words always have. He could not deny them, but they jarred him now. They had been uttered less as his own sentiment than as a motive which would appeal to his mother and sister. Fergus had genuine hospitable and social instincts. His greatest fault was his egotism, with its strong self-will. But then that is the lean kine which swallows many fat ones. He would have his own way, and whoever refuses to turn aside in that path must certainly often wade through dirty places.

"I dare say Mrs. George Harvey will not be sorry not to meet her brother-in-law," Robina put in, emboldened by her brother's silence. "Now I do hope she and her husband will come. I wonder what the Devons will think of our inviting their niece? But we have quite a right to do so. You are able to serve Miss Harvey, and Miss Christian was not above marrying Miss Harvey's brother. Besides, I don't know what Mrs. George Harvey's own father was. Her Uncle Robert, who adopted her, was only a bookseller."

Fergus heard and did not hear. He was ready enough at times to listen to such talk and to join in it. But it was not what pleased him best. Still it was one of the influences of his life. If he had taken one of his own minor wills he would have silenced it, as small, mean and unworthy, but then he had a larger and more material will, in gaining which it seemed to him that his sister Robina might be useful. And though their view of family affection gave him freedom to gibe at Robina, it was unprecedented among the Lauries to administer that kind of firm, loving rebuke which claims an altered course of speech or action. Robina would not have borne this; Fergus would never have thought of giving it.

Next day Milly received this note:

"DEAR MISS HARVEY—Your sketch is accepted with great approbation, as I expected and as it deserved. Go on as you have begun. I hope to get better terms for you than those I first stated. But, with your leave, I think it best to keep you and my friend in your present mutual ignorance till this transaction is concluded. I do not think you will lose if you repose this much confidence in me.

"With my respectful greetings to your mother, I remain,

"Faithfully yours,
"FERGUS OGILVIE LAURIE."

"She's done it," he announced to his friend David Maxwell when he met him that evening. "It's my belief that she'd do whatever she took in hand. And she does it in such beautiful simplicity. Tries and succeeds, and doesn't seem to know it! But I think she wants somebody to tell her what to try. She doesn't feel her own strength enough. It is not sufficiently stirred within her to goad her to put it forth on something. She wants leading out."

"What line did she choose for the first picture?" David asked.

"Motionless as a cloud the old man stood," quoted Fergus. "And she made a downright portrait of that crossing-sweeper. I was afraid at first that it might be too literal to be pleasing, for it was wonderful as a likeness. But Mr. Smith never dreams of noticing a face out of a picture."

And then David Maxwell, left to himself, fell into a train of thought which had never troubled Fergus or occurred to Millicent. He thought to himself that if the outward man of this parish crossing-sweeper would serve so well as a type of the grand simple old hero of the poem, might not the fitness rise from some spiritual resemblance? Was it quite fair to take him as a type of patient endurance, and not try to lighten his burden—if by ever so little? This old man had unconsciously done Millicent a service which she must have missed had he not kept his face noble and steadfast amid all the cares and squalors of bitter poverty and decrepitude. David, loving Millicent in his silent romantic way, felt a yearning to show kindness to him for her sake, as well as sympathy for the possible sufferings and character which might have made him so fit a form for a fine ideal. David did not understand the too common enjoyment of rubbing up one's emotions without producing one electric spark of action. Never mind that, all he could do in this case was to buy his winter gloves of Berlin thread instead of kid, so that on the next Sunday morning, when his stepmother happened not to be with him, he was able to slip half a crown into the sweeper's hand.

The old man looked up suddenly, but without a start.

"God bless you, sir," he said. "I knowed it would come, for things was just about down at their worst, and something allays does come then. God bless you, sir."

Next Sunday the old man was not in his accustomed place. He was dead. He had died suddenly of heart disease, and the parish people found a whole shilling in his little canvas bag. David's charity had gone with him to the end.

"I cannot think how that Mr. Maxwell can choose to wear Berlin gloves," thought Milly to herself, "he must be very stingy."

She little dreamed that if there were more of his genuine appreciation of the truths which all art is only created to illustrate, there might be fewer subjects for sad pictures and pathetic poems and—more Berlin gloves!

UNKIND WORDS.

BY MARIE S. LADD.

WE have no balm to heal the wound,
We speak them in an evil hour,
To neutralise their grievous power
There can no anodyne be found.

We give regret and bitter tears
That pride of ours should cost so much,
The dear regard and trust of such
As loved us through the fading years.

And yet the ill-starred hour will come
When falls the cutting word of ire,
That burns some heart with eating fire,
And love we held, for us is dumb.

And so a spell the dim years weave,
O'er many a heart of fearful strength,
And treasured friends become, at length,
Estranged, though silently they grieve.

How hard it is to feel that the power of life is to be found inside, not outside; in the heart and thoughts, not in the visible actions and show; in the living seed, not in the plant which has no root! How often do men cultivate the garden of their souls just the other way!

THE putting in order is a delightful occupation, and is at least analogous to a virtue. Virtue is the love of moral order.

THE WINE QUESTION IN SOCIETY.

IT is universally admitted among sensible and candid people that drunkenness is the great curse of our social and national life. It is not characteristically American, for the same may be said with greater emphasis of the social and national life of Great Britain; but it is one of those things about which there is no doubt. Cholera and small-pox bring smaller fatality, and almost infinitely smaller sorrow. There are fathers and mothers, and sisters and wives, and innocent and wondering children, within every circle that embraces a hundred lives, who grieve to-day over some hopeless victim of the seductive destroyer. In the city and in the country—North, East, South and West—there are men and women who cannot be trusted with wine in their hands—men and women who are conscious, too, that they are going to destruction, and who have ceased to fight an appetite that has the power to transform every soul and every home it occupies into a hell. Oh, the wild prayers for help that go up from a hundred thousand despairing slaves of strong drink to-day! Oh, the shame, the disappointment, the fear, the disgust, the awful pity, the mad protests that rise from a hundred thousand homes! And still the smoke of the everlasting torment rises, and still we discuss the “wine question,” and the “grape culture,” and live on as if we had no share in the responsibility for so much sin and shame and suffering.

Society bids us furnish wine at our feasts, and we furnish it just as generously as if we did not know that a certain percentage of all the men who drink it will die miserable drunkards, and inflict lives of pitiful suffering upon those who are closely associated with them. There are literally hundreds of thousands of people in polite life in America who would not dare to give a dinner, or a party, without wine, notwithstanding the fact that in many instances they can select the very guests who will drink too much on every occasion that gives them an opportunity. There are old men and women who invite young men to their feasts, whom they know cannot drink the wine they propose to furnish without danger to themselves and disgrace to their companions and friends. They do this sadly, often, but under the compulsions of social usage. Now we understand the power of this influence; and every sensitive man must feel it keenly. Wine has stood so long as an emblem and representative of good cheer and generous hospitality, that it seems stingy to shut it away from our festivities, and deny it to our guests. Then, again, it is so generally offered at the tables of our friends, and it is so difficult, apparently, for those who are accustomed to it to make a dinner without it, that we hesitate to offer water to them. It has a niggardly—almost an unfriendly—seeming; yet what shall a man do who wishes to throw what influence he has on the side of temperance?

The question is not new. It has been up for an answer every year and every moment since men thought or talked about temperance at all. We know of but one answer to make to it. A man cannot, without stultifying and morally debasing himself, fight in public that which he tolerates in private. We have heard of such things as writing temperance addresses with a demijohn under the table; and society has learned by heart the old talk against drinking too much—“the excess of the thing, you know”—by those who have the power of drinking a little, but who would sooner part with their right eye than with that little. A man who talks temperance with a wine-glass in his hand is simply trying to brace himself so that he can hold it without shame. We do not deny that many men have self-control, or that they can drink wine through life without suffering, to themselves or others. It may seem hard that they should be deprived of a comfort or a pleasure because others are less fortunate in their temperament or their power of will. But the question is whether a man is willing to sell his power to do good to a great multitude for a glass of wine at dinner. That is the question in its plainest terms. If he is, then he has very little benevolence, or a very inadequate apprehension of the evils of intemperance.

What we need in our metropolitan society is a declaration of independence. There are a great many good men and women in New York who lament the drinking habits of society most sincerely. Let these all declare that they will minister no longer at the social altars of the great destroyer. Let them declare that the indiscriminate offer of wine at dinners and social assemblies is not only criminal but vulgar, as it undoubtedly is. Let them declare that for the sake of the young, the weak, the vicious—for the sake of personal character, and family peace, and social purity, and national strength—they will discard wine from their feasts from this time forth and forever, and the work will be done. Let them declare that it shall be vulgar—as it undeniably is—for a man to quarrel with his dinner because his host fails to furnish wine. This can be done now, and it needs to be done now, for it is becoming every day more difficult to do it. The habit of wine-drinking at dinner is quite prevalent already. European travel is doing much to make it universal; and if we go on extending it at the present rate, we shall soon arrive at the European indifference to the whole subject. There are many clergymen in New York who have wine upon their tables and who furnish it to their guests. We keep no man's conscience, but we are compelled to say that they sell influence at a shamefully cheap rate. What can they do in the great fight with this tremendous evil? They can do nothing, and are counted upon to do nothing.

If the men and women of good society wish to have less drinking to excess, let them stop drinking moderately. If they are not willing to break off the indulgence of a feeble appetite for the sake of doing a great good to a great many people, how can they expect a poor, broken-down wretch to deny an appetite that is stronger than the love of wife and children, and even life itself? The punishment of the failure to do duty in this business is sickening to contemplate. The sacrifice of life and peace and wealth will go on. Every year young men will rush wildly to the devil, middle-aged men will booze away into apoplexy, and old men will swell up with the sweet poison and become disgusting idiots. What will become of the women? We should think that they had suffered enough from this evil to hold it under everlasting ban, yet there are drunken women as well as drinking clergymen. Society, however, has a great advantage in the fact that it is vulgar for a woman to drink. There are some things that a woman may not do, and maintain her social standing. Let her not quarrel with the fact that society demands more of her than it does of men. It is her safeguard in many ways.—Scribner's Monthly.

THE MISTRESS OF ABBEYLANDS.

AN ENGLISH STORY.

CHAPTER I.

"SIR ROBERT was married yesterday, Miss Penn, and he and my lady are to be home in a fortnight. Mother's had a letter from him."

Bessie Martyn, the housekeeper's pretty, innocent daughter, told her news quite jubilantly, but her glad, dimpled smile died away as her companion turned from the window, where she had been staring moodily out at the autumn foliage and leaf-strewn glades of the park, and smiled scornfully at her.

"Many thanks for your stale news, my dear. I knew 'my lady' was coming to us in a fortnight. 'My lady,' forsooth! The poor old Manchester shop-keeper hardly thought his daughter, Miss Kitty Mansfield, would be the mistress of Abbeylands—hardly, indeed—Lady Katherine Lindsay!"

"Well, but isn't she, Miss Penn?" urged Bessie, rather timidly.

"Of course, my dear—Lady Katherine Lindsay, by all means. She will take you for her maid, Bessie, until she gets a French one; or perhaps she will keep two—such a grand lady might."

There was such a world of contempt and bitterness in those last words that Bessie, glancing uneasily from Miss Penn's smiling mouth to her cold, vengeful eyes, shrank away in silence, and left the room. It was rather an odd thing that this young woman's acquaintances always became nervously fearful of her anger, although they might be no ways concerned in it.

"And I say I wonder at you, to talk like that before Bessie," said Mrs. Martyn. "She'll tell on you one of those days—mark my words; she's a wilful lassie."

"And I say I don't care one pin, Mrs. Martyn," retorted Miss Penn to the housekeeper's warning; and, opening the glass door, she went down the old-fashioned stone steps to the terrace.

"Ah, but you do care, my girl; and why shouldn't you?" muttered Mrs. Martyn to herself. "I am not much better pleased than yourself at the changes making, but I can keep my tongue quiet and civil, which you can't, Caroline Penn; and you'll rue it, as sure as I stand here."

Mrs. Martyn went her way to prepare for the coming of the new mistress over the household, which had owned no sway superior to her own for many a day and year; and Caroline Penn wandered up and down in the coming twilight, looking at the irregular outline of the old Abbey, the projecting gables, the clustering chimneys, the queer old mullioned windows, and the side-wings of the building, ivy-grown, crumbling and ruinous; at the broad, smooth walks beneath the ancient linden trees, along the wide terrace, past the small octagonal room with the southern aspect, which was known as "my lady's," and where "my lady's" own favorite garden-chair, with her initials carved on the woodwork, yet stood beside the darkened window.

Caroline Penn's position in Sir Robert Lindsay's household was a somewhat anomalous one. She had been old Lady Harriette Lindsay's salaried "companion," nurse, confidante, and slave for several years; and when she died, she left Caroline a small annuity—a very small annuity it was, in truth; but Sir Robert had hardly the power, if he had the will, to enlarge it. His mother's faithful attendant was a lady-like, intelligent person, who made herself very useful—oh, how useful she did make herself to Sir Robert! She had no home to go to; she spoke pitifully of her friendless state, and implored to be let live in some forgotten room of the old ruined wing of the Abbey, and never interfere with dear Sir Robert. So the result was, that dear Sir Robert offered her a home in the Abbey for an indefinite term, and was very kind and courteous to her in his frigid, stately way, looking upon her merely as a sort of upper servant—he had never looked upon her as anything else. He was one of the proudest, coldest, haughtiest men in England; and Caroline Penn owned it to herself, in dire and keen mortification, as she stood beside my lady's chair; for she had hoped for something else, upper servant though he might consider her. It was for that she had striven night and day to please him, to make herself useful and agreeable to him, to constitute herself his amanuensis and account-keeper; it was for that she had labored ceaselessly to win some expressions of condescending esteem and approbation. And now, after all the splendid châteaux en Espagne she had built, after all the glowing hopes and ceaseless anxiety, after all the presumptuous dreams and all the wiles and efforts, Lady Katherine Lindesay was mistress of Abbeylands—mistress of Abbeylands, though her birth was of lower degree than Caroline Penn's, whose father had been "a barrister and a gentleman," as Caroline was wont to say. "What a thought!" she would exclaim angrily, and with a regretful sigh, "a Manchester tradesman's daughter, because of her heavy purse, comes here as 'my lady,' and to rule over me!"

She repeated the words bitterly and passionately several times, as she continued pacing up and down by the rows of dark-shuttered windows—more bitterly and more passionately each time. "It was the climax of injuries, the acme of wrongs to Caroline Penn, with all her crushed hopes and ambitions lying at her feet, like the withered damask petals from the tall standard roses, or the sere and fallen leaves, which stirred and rustled on the terrace walk in the cold night wind.

No wonder pretty smiling Bessie Martyn, sitting at her mother's tea-table, in the housekeeper's cosy room, with its warm crimson carpet and chintz-covered sofa and chairs, its glowing fire and bright lamp, and the tempting little round table draped in white, glittering with china and burnished spoons and teapot, and a suggestive dish-cover over some hot dainties—no wonder pretty Bessie looked aghast at the figure that stalked in, who was to form a third in the social party. She was shivering with cold, her dress disordered, her hair roughened and wet with the night dew; and in Caroline Penn's pale, sharp features was an expression not good to see.

Bessie saw it no more, however, after that evening. Miss Penn's face wore its usual expression all through the ensuing fortnight, amid the bustle of preparations for the advent of the bride. All through the laying down of carpets, and hanging up of drapery, and decorating, polishing and adorning of my lady's own apartments, Miss Penn made herself useful, and not disagreeable; and even on the last evening, when they were all assembled in the hall to receive the bride-party, Miss Penn was smiling most affably, and looking almost handsome in her flowing brown-silk dress, which had been Lady Harriette's, and the jet ornaments, which had also belonged to her late mistress. And when Sir Robert and my lady at length arrived, the most courteous smile and most demonstrative welcome they received was from Miss Penn. But for one moment there was the look in Miss Penn's face which was not good to see. "It was the moment when my lady paused beneath the soft-lit radiance of the great globe hall-lamp, to acknowledge the respectful greeting of her new servants.

She was a young, foreign-looking woman, of medium height, a pale-olive complexion, delicate features, large radiant eyes of changeful hue, and a noble brow crowned by a wealth of shaded, waving, curling hair; she was dressed in a splendid maize-colored silk, shading from hazel to bright gold, like her hair; her bonnet, of black tulle, sparkling with powdery golden scintillations and dewy Ghoire de Dijon roses, of creamiest, pinkiest tint, looked like the diadem of an empress; there were diamonds glittering on her slender hands, diamonds pendent from her tiny, shell-like ears. There was more than all the wealth and charms beside—there was the evidence of a lofty spirit, a strong will, and the truth, pride and honor of a noble, womanly nature apparent in her face, voice and bearing.

She was proud, honorable, courageous, beautiful, and wealthy; and Caroline Penn, looking on her, hated her from her inmost heart. She was Lady Lindesay, the mistress of Abbeylands, from the highest wave of her curling hair to the hem of her gorgeous silken robe, and, looking after her, as Mrs. Martyn obsequiously escorted her to her apartments, Caroline Penn muttered anxiously to herself, "The Manchester tradesman's daughter."

Yes, it was truth, that fact which Caroline Penn had had malicious triumph in discovering. Old Joan Mansfield had made his fortune by patenting some discovery in cotton dyes, and his daughter was Katherine Lindesay, the mistress of Abbeylands. Her mother was dead, she told Sir Robert, and her father had died only two years before. So much the better, Sir Robert thought. For this was the thorn in the flesh to him, the gall in the cup of sweetness, the cloud on the sunshine of his prosperity. This beautiful, wealthy woman whom he had married, whom he had brought to his ancestral home to share in and perpetuate its glories—she who was to take her place in the family tree amidst the haughty, high-born dames of the house of Lindesay, who was to be the mother of the heirs of Abbeylands, whose wealth was to stay its crumbling foundations and revive its fading splendor—she was a low-born woman, a plebeian, a child of uneducated, hard-handed tradesfolk. She was a blot on the stainless escutcheon, for all her money and her beauty. Robert Lindesay de Lindesay, the descendant of barons, knights and warriors, had sold himself for the Manchester tradesman's gold. Others might do this, but not a Lindesay. At the spotless lists of their pedigree none might point and say, "Here were honor and principles bartered," or the keenest malice whisper, "A mesalliance." If the fair and haughty maids and matrons of the house of Lindesay brought little else for dower, they brought fields, argent and fields or, gules, supporters, and mailed hands; unfortunately, because of the degeneracy of the times, even these were inadequate to supply the place of more material aids, and the bitter truth became more and more evident to each titled generation, that the vulgar, democratic, pertinacious guest, Poverty, had come to dwell in the shadow of the tattered banners and time-dimmed escutcheons—to impress its grim crest and motto on empty jewel-cases and on lean purses, and darken, by the shadow of its baleful presence, all the pride and glory of the old Abbey and its broad lands.

It was left to Robert Lindesay to save the stately barque which had floated so gallantly through four centuries of time, or to stand by in inert despair, and see it go down in a whirlpool of cruel debt and mortgage. For it would go down; nothing could save it, except the yawning gulf were bridged, the raging whirlpool appeased. Vampire claws, with the dread fiat "Foreclosure" held threateningly aloft, were stretching out over the ancient woods, the broad smooth glades with their herds of quiet deer, the gray tarrets, and escutcheons carved in stone; and they must be restrained, else they would never draw back until they had seized all the substance and glory of the house of Lindsay, the titles and dignities and heirlooms—all its past, present and future.

Robert Lindsay restrained them, bridged the yawning gulf, brightened the tarnished splendors, and placed the crumbling foundations of his ancestral home on a sarer basis than they had had for many a day and year. He accomplished it all with old John Mansfield's money. The tradesman's gold, earned in dingy shops and factories, was the means of rescuing all the knights and barons and titled dames from oblivion. To know this was bitter enough, but it was still bitterer to Robert Lindsay's sensitive pride and honor to feel that it was, in truth, Katherine Mansfield who bestowed home and lands and titles on him—not he on her. He knew it, and the knowledge irritated him into justice; for he did not love her, this beautiful young woman, whom he had married for her money. His pride had been too deeply humbled before her and her vulgar Manchester trustees; the poverty of the Lindsays had been in the dust before the coarse tread of these purse-proud cotton-lords. He had been false to all the traditions of his race, for the sake of the golden dross which she possessed abundantly, and which he so sorely lacked. He hated her money, and there were times when he felt that he might come to hate herself. It might be all very well for the "Lord of Burleigh" to point to his stately castle and liveried retainers, and say to the village maiden whom he had wedded, "All of this is mine and thine;" but it would not be quite so pleasant for the "Lord of Burleigh" to feel that it was the village maiden who owned the stately castle and retainers in reality, and that he was to be a mere pensioner on her bounty.

Besides, a deeper feeling was at work in Sir Robert Lindsay's heart, which was that of a good and true man, beneath all the haughty coldness. There were times when he felt that he might have wronged Katherine Mansfield, even when he made her mistress of Abbeylands. If the woman he had married had been unlovable in mind or person, a stolid, elderly, money-loving spinster, the mercenary barter would have been more evenly balanced; but each day brought the knowledge more fully home to him, that the preponderance of obligation was cruelly on his side, do what he would, since she had cast into the scale, besides her splendid gift of wealth, her youth, her high spirits, her native talents, her fresh, gay, girlish heart, and her winning, peculiar beauty. Not that he believed this clever, quick-tempered, frank-spoken, handsome girl felt one particle of real love for him. He soothed his uneasy heart with the miserable assurance that in this matter, at least, he had not accepted at her hands that which he could not repay.

CHAPTER II.

"WHERE is Lady Lindsay, Miss Penn?"

"I really cannot tell, Sir Robert," replied Miss Penn, laying down her work in order that she might emphasize each syllable more distinctly. "Her ladyship ordered out the ponies and her own phaeton, and drove away more than an hour ago. She may have gone to Charlton Mere; I heard her say something of it the other day."

"To Charlton Mere?" repeated Sir Robert; "that is a strange fancy. Along such a bleak, bad road, too! Who went with her?"

"Her own groom—her 'tiger,' I think her ladyship calls him—ha, ha! Odd name, isn't it, Sir Robert? She prefers him to the other grooms—he is such a clever, active boy."

Sir Robert made no reply, but left the room with a frown on his brow, of which Miss Penn caught a momentary glance.

"Her ladyship," and 'her ladyship's' humors, my dear Sir Robert," she muttered, with a grimace and a mocking courtesy to the half-closed door. "High-born ladies have many whims and fancies, you know, sir; and besides 'my lady' bought you."

Audible soliloquies are dangerous, and Miss Penn seldom indulged in them, except when sure of the absence of eavesdroppers. But the wisest may err, and the most cautious cannot always guard against accidents, and it so happened that Bessie Martyn, who had stepped back into a recess beside a tall knight in armor standing on guard near the library door, when she saw Sir Robert about to enter the room, had, after his hasty exit, heard every word of Caroline Penn's malicious self-communing. Bessie knew that Caroline Penn disliked and envied the rich, beautiful young lady who had come to reign over them all, but there was evidence of some deeper, darker feeling in her carefully veiled taunts to Sir Robert of his wife's wilfulness and haughtiness and independence of him and his belongings, expressed in those few deferential sentences to which her scornful after-utterances were as a key. The light-hearted, affectionate girl absolutely shivered with some indefinable apprehension, much as she had done that first day, when she announced Sir Robert's marriage to the ambitious lady-dependant.

"Mother," she said, about a quarter of an hour afterward, to the portly housekeeper as she sat in the warm red-carpeted sanctum, making up tradesmen's bills, "I am afraid Miss Penn will make differences between my lady and Sir Robert."

"Law bless me, Bessie!" cried her mother, putting down a pair of ducks at ten and sixpence, and a leg of mutton at half a crown, "you don't say so, child?"

"I am afraid of it, mother," said Bessie, shaking her head; "I know she hates my lady."

"She's not very fond of her, that's certain," said Mrs. Martyn; "but what has she been saying?"

"Well, I can hardly tell," replied Bessie; "not much; but she says things so spitefully, and she is always watching my lady wherever she goes."

"Ham!" replied Mrs. Martyn, taking up her pen; she knew well the sneers and innuendoes that Caroline Penn had uttered to her against her mistress in spare hours of gossip. "Don't you get into trouble, child, and don't mind Caroline Penn," she said, unwilling, even in her common worldly shrewdness, to poison her innocent daughter's mind by any repetition of Caroline Penn's malignant hints. "What's that you're making, Bessie?"

"A black satin sash for my lady's new velvet walking-dress, mother," replied Bessie, holding up the rich shining material, which she was tastefully fabricating.

"You're very clever with your needle, Bessie," remarked the mother, with much pride.

"That's what my lady says," said Bessie, laughing and blushing; "and she's going to give me her beautiful blue-cape dress, mother. It's not a bit soiled, only my lady says it doesn't become her, and that it will become me—that dark, royal blue, mother."

"I know, Bessie," responded her mother; and, looking at her pretty, happy daughter, and thinking how the blue cape would set off Bessie's fair hair and rosy cheeks, her heart softened unwontedly.

"She's very kind to you, lassie, isn't she?" she asked, gently.

"Oh, very, mother," said Bessie, earnestly; "I never met any one so good; and she is so handsome, and so gay and pleasant, and not a bit proud."

"Well, Bessie, my girl," advised her mother, steadily, "you keep to my lady, and don't mind what any one says against her."

Moodily, up and down the long terrace, beneath the now budding linden trees, Sir Robert paced in the chill calm of the spring evening, awaiting my lady's return.

"She comes and goes without telling me a word," he said, bitterly, "with 'her own' carriage, and 'her own' ponies, and 'her own' servants! Even Caroline Penn notices it—I am sure she does. Of course, what else could I expect? What right have I to blame her? She can do as she pleases; she has money enough in her own right to keep a separate establishment if she likes! I have no power—I must be silent. She gave me her money, and bought her title of Lady Lindesay with sixty thousand pounds, and she has a right to enjoy it! She has over so many more thousands to spend as best suits her; and when she paid off the mortgage on my estate and gave me possession of my own roof again, she did all that can be expected of her."

Sir Robert switched savagely at some delicate crocuses in a border beside him, and smashed them with his walking-stick—he did not know that Caroline Penn was watching him, and enjoying the sight of his perturbation.

"I could hardly be absurd enough to expect that she was going to devote herself to me," he went on, with a sharp, impatient sigh; "she is very handsome, and clever enough to know it, and a great many other things beside. I was afraid at first that she would not become her position, that she might do unconventional and eccentric things, but—but—"

What was Sir Robert going to say? The expression of his face would have puzzled Miss Penn if she could have seen it; but, by the time he reached her window in his long promenade, there was nothing but stern gloom on his features.

"Will you not come in, Sir Robert?" said Miss Penn, opening the French sashes, and smiling pleasantly. "I have heard you coughing, and the evening is really very cold, although it is so still—it is very late, too."

She stirred up the blazing fire in the brilliant register grate, until its mellow radiance tinted the ceiling and walls of the large, lofty room; she wheeled over a velvet easy-chair and footstool, and adjusted the reading-lamp on the small table by Sir Robert's evening paper.

"Do come in, dear Sir Robert!" she pleaded. "I am really uncomfortable to leave you out there with this raw mist coming over the woods as it does every night."

So Sir Robert came in, and sat down in his velvet chair, and pretended to read his paper; but all his attention was absorbed in listening for my lady's return—and Miss Penn knew it.

"I will run up to her ladyship's dressing-room," she murmured, presently, as if to herself. "I hope her maid has good fires in her apartments, after such a long, cold drive!"

The watchful eyes marked how Sir Robert stirred uneasily at this allusion, and she went on.

"What a splendid driver Lady Lindesay is, Sir Robert! She thinks nothing of thirty miles, she told me."

"Ah," said Sir Robert, deep lines coloring on his broad forehead, "her ladyship is fond of driving, when she goes long distances in such weather as this."

"Yes, indeed," Miss Penn began, when the sound of crunching wheels, and a sharp volley of knocks on the great oaken door of the front entrance, stopped her.

"Here she is!" interrupted Sir Robert; and there was a flash of relief and pleasure in his eyes and voice.

The door opened, and my lady entered, handsomer than even on that first evening that Caroline Penn saw her, with a glowing color, radiant in scarlet draperies and white furs, beautiful, proud, and prosperous. What a contrast she was, with her bright hair clustering behind her in rich disorder, her gay, rich, voluminous wrappings, and the white and crimson plumes of her hat waving in the current of air made by her entrance, to Caroline Penn's rigid neatness and simplicity of attire!

"You have had a long drive, my lady," said Sir Robert, in the cold, courteous tone he always assumed to her; perhaps a shade warmer it was—but for Caroline Penn's presence, perhaps, it might have been tender.

"Yes—rather; I hope I have not kept you waiting dinner, Sir Robert?" she said, and there was a trace of nervousness in her voice.

"No, Lady Lindsey, I have not waited dinner," he answered, stiffly; "but it is very late."

Did Caroline Penn know what he was thinking of all the time he sat staring at the article in the newspaper, until dinner was announced, and he conducted my lady into the dining-room.

"In what direction did you drive Lady Lindsey?" he asked, during a pause in the progress of the second course.

"Toward Charlton Mere," said my lady, without looking up.

"Such a wretched district to fancy, to drive through!" observed Sir Robert, gazing at her. "I wonder you would take your ponies along that dangerous, marshy road?"

Was it the hue of her ladyship's violet dress that made her face so pale? Caroline Penn wondered. "She was rosy enough when she came in," she thought. "I'll go to Charlton Mere one of these days," decided the astute young woman.

"No, I was not afraid to take them; they went beautifully," said my lady; but she did not look at her husband's face.

"There's mischief brewing," muttered Caroline Penn, smiling cunningly to herself, in her own neat apartment, late that same night. She was tacking "tuckers" on her dresses, was tidy Caroline, and affixing small bows of ribbon in front. "There's mischief brewing, as sure as I sit here. Ah, Sir Robert, you'll rue your rich, handsome young wife, my dear gentleman! Abbeylands is too dull and too tiresome for such a gay, spirited young woman! I'll find out about Charlton Mere before I'm a week older."

"Beessie Martyn," said my lady to her maid, in the luxurious dressing-room on the first floor, above the octagonal boudoir down-stairs, and as she spoke she gazed wistfully with her large, gray, soulful eyes at the two faces mirrored before her, as Beessie brushed out her silken hair, and laid away in their many-shaped morocco cases the tinkling, glittering ornaments she had worn—"Beessie, have you many friends?"

"Yes, my lady," replied Beessie, with a smile of surprise.

"You are a happy girl," said her mistress, slowly; "there are many in the world who have not one they can trust."

And who was he who restlessly tossed on his lonely pillow through the long hours of darkness, uttering feverishly, as the silence and the gloom brought up troops of delirious, unreal fears and harassing regrets, "Oh, Katherine, Katherine! I am rightly punished for my mercenary marriage! Oh, Katherine! I should have loved you before I married you, and tried to make you love me, my beautiful young wife, who neither trusts me nor cares for me now?"

Could this be the same stately gentleman who slightly alluded to a bad headache at breakfast next morning, as an excuse for his want of appetite, and in the same breath informed my lady that he had decided on giving the dinner-party about which he had been speaking to her yesterday, and if she had anything to suggest, he should be glad to see her in the library after breakfast.

"No, I have nothing to suggest," she said, languidly, leaning on a chair near the library window, with the bright, cold, spring sunshine radiating in the glossy ripples of her brown hair. She hardly looked at the list of invited guests, and sighed absently as she twined her delicate fingers in the tassel of the window-blind.

"Are you not well, Lady Lindsey?" asked her husband. He put the question anxiously, but it was uttered in a cold and measured tone.

"I am quite well, Sir Robert," replied her ladyship, rather sharply, and facing him in the determined, almost defiant attitude, that had grown to be rather habitual to her in the four months of their married life. Presently she inquired if he wished to say anything more to her, and upon his saying "No," quitted the room, with her proud head erect, and her crimson cashmere morning-rebe flowing back like a regal train; and, reaching her own dressing-room, she went in, locked the doors, and, flinging herself down on the nearest seat, sobbed and wept pitifully, like a desolate child.

"What a life—what a life!" she cried, crushing the silken pillows around her prostrate head to stifle the sound of her grief. "Other women have something or some one to love; I have nothing, except—except that which is only a pain and—and—disgrace almost. Nothing! No friends, no one to love me, no husband, no children! I am Sir Robert Lindsey's wife, to be sure, and he regards me as an incubus, and thinks he sold himself cheaply when he married me. I am mistress of Abbeylands, without a creature I can thoroughly trust near me, and with a miserable secret torturing me day and night. Oh, father, I wish you had never made all this money!" cried the poor girl. "I was ten times happier when I only wore a linsay frock and diaper pinafore, and ran home from school to your country house, to sit on the old desk near you, and eat sugar-candy—a happy little child. What is the use of being rich and being Lady Lindsey? I am truly miserable and friendless."

Miserable, and friendless, and alone, save for the presence of her little maid, from whose mute sympathy she strove to conceal her fair face, all blurred with passionate weeping; her youth, beauty, and title, her wealth, her rich attire, her luxurious apartments, availing not one jot to alleviate the pain and anxiety at her heart.

"I am not well, Beessie," she said, drearily. "Do not allow any one to come in unless—unless Sir Robert comes?"

But Sir Robert never came. He sat alone in the library, with his head resting on his hands, until the entrance of Caroline Penn, with a modest apology for disturbing him, obliged him to rouse himself.

"About your proposed dinner-party, Sir Robert," said she, with a meek smile; "there are several little matters in respect of which I should like some directions from you or her ladyship. Mrs. Martyn will be anxious. Game now, for instance—it ought to hang so long, you know, Sir Robert; and really, just some directions about any particular dishes you might wish, or, if any of the guests were likely to remain at the Abbey, the suites of apartments should be aired."

Miss Penn always alluded to Sir Robert's station and Sir Robert's residence as if they were semi-royal at the least.

"Oh! whatever you and Mrs. Martyn think best, Miss Penn," said Sir Robert, ungratefully impatient; "I don't know anything about it—you had better ask Lady Lindsey."

"Her ladyship is in her own apartments, Sir Robert," urged Miss Penn, with deferential reproachfulness; "she would not allow any one to disturb her."

She saw the grim lines around his lips, and she went away with a ladylike smile and inclination of her small aleck head.

Sir Robert shut the door savagely after her, tore up an unoffending sheet of paper, glanced over the list of guests with a heavy frown and a sigh, and muttered: "What a wretched, hopeless, galling, miserable mistake a loveless marriage is!"

EMILY FAITHFULL

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

IT was one of the dreariest of mountain autumn mornings, when my friend, Mrs. Laura C. Ballard, and I parted at the depot in Littleton, New Hampshire.

That whole scene comes back to me now with a singular vividness—the great black-throated depot, the white-gray clouds, and the dark masses of fog which shut in all the majesty and beauty of the mountains, and the face of my friend like a solitary star shining out into the cold and darkness. Down in the world below, beyond the clouds and mists, men were in the thick and strife of the coming election, but only the outer circles of the great wave reached the quiet mountain town where we had been passing the last month, and which closed with the cars rolling away into the gray ocean of mist that opened and swallowed them up.

And over another ocean, stormy with gales and equinoxes, a steamer was at that time bearing toward our shores, bringing the distinguished Englishwoman whose name had become already widely known amongst us, associated with strenuous efforts in behalf of the industrial and educational interests of her sex.

It had been arranged that Miss Faithfull, on first arriving in America, should make her home with my friend, who was now leaving the mountains to receive her guest.

It was not, however, until midwinter that I met Miss Faithfull under her friend's roof, on the evening of the "Women's Reception at Steinway Hall," and subsequently learned the facts which will form the substance of this article.

Emily Faithfull was born at Headley Rectory, in Surrey. Her father was a distinguished clergyman of the Church of England, and her life opened in that atmosphere of culture, convention and tradition which everybody on this side the water has glimpses of in the English stories and novels of the day.

The small Emily soon gave evidence, however, of the energy and courage which have distinguished her whole career. She was not more than ten years old, when, a pupil at a famous Kensington school, she ran away from the establishment because she had been accused of "fibbing" by one of the teachers.

The high-spirited little English girl could not bear this disgrace. She climbed a wall twenty feet high, and proceeded to the nearest cab-stand, where she coolly ordered a cabman to take her to an elder sister's, residing at Clapham.

Looking at the small specimen of humanity who delivered this order, the cabman suspected the truth, and insisted on taking the runaway back to school.

The child was not daunted. She bravely turned to another cabman, who, more stolid or good-natured perhaps, carried the little girl to her elder sister's, where she was seriously admonished for her flight, and ordered to instantly return to school.

Somewhat crest-fallen by this time, the child entreated that she might be allowed to return in another cab.

All this happened between twenty and thirty years ago, and such a glaring defiance of the Kensington school authorities could not, of course, be overlooked. One learns with a kind of shudder that the little girl was "confined for three weeks in a damp room, where was laid the foundation of the asthma which has afflicted her for life."

But the woman's own verdict comes flashing like a ray of light down into the words: "That asthma was the guiding star of my life."

It forced her away, in her youth, from the air of Surrey, out from the pleasant English rectory, with its culture, and its traditions, and its picturesque old English life, to the wider opportunities, the hurry and friction of the great capital.

The young lady was presented at court; the most cultivated and fashionable circles of London were opened to the high-born English girl. But what could these offer to one whose heart and soul had been fired with an earnest purpose to be of some real service in the world where she found herself?

Early—so early that when I questioned her as to the time she could not remember—Miss Faithfull became deeply impressed with the needs and position of women in her own country. She discerned with her clear vision the tragic side of their limitations and helplessness. She saw how they were hedged in by social canons and traditions. She wanted to open new avenues of employment to them, where, without harm to their womanly delicacy and dignity, they could maintain themselves independently; to make all honest labor respectable and remunerative for women as for men. She also earnestly desired to advance the educational interests of women; to elevate their standard of culture; to inspire them with nobler aims and purposes in living.

Most praiseworthy aspirations, certainly. But how was the young Englishwoman to set herself about carrying out this work? She had to face those tough old Anglo-Saxon prejudices and conventionalisms which have wrought themselves into the very fibre of English social life.

The cry, centuries old, was raised again, that these new-fangled notions would certainly take woman out of her appropriate sphere, and remove her from her home duties. As though whatever enlarged and elevated her nature could make her less fitted for all the duties and delights of the home whose God-appointed mistress she must always be!

In the face of all opposition, however, Miss Faithfull set her resolute soul to the work. Of course, much at first had to be tentative in this matter. The world turned its cold shoulder to her enthusiasm, and she had very little sympathy at the beginning. Very little of the world's great work ever does have.

One rule Miss Faithfull insisted on at the outset, from which she has never deviated, and that was that men and women should do their work together, so far as possible. She would not make invidious distinctions between the sexes. So earnest was her conviction here, that she positively refused to establish a fortnightly meeting for women only. Whatever benefit was to be derived from this movement by one sex the other should share also.

The lady was content with small beginnings. She cast her seed in the furrows nearest to her hand. First of all, she was associated with a small circle of friends in establishing a society for promoting the employment of women in any department for which she was fitted.

Here, of course, Miss Faithfull encountered all the delays, discouragements and vexations which are the certain lot of the benefactors of humanity. And I record here her solemn testimony, gained in the long, hard school of her manifold experience: "The greatest impediment in the way of woman's advancement in any department of remunerative industry is her lack of training."

It was in 1863 that Miss Faithfull first published the Victoria Magazine, which, though advocating pre-eminently the industrial claims of women, has a decided literary value. It circulates among the most cultivated and influential circles in England, and pleads eloquently there the cause and the needs of women, its compositors being composed entirely of these.

But Miss Faithfull discovered finally that no amount of essays on the subject so dear to her heart would awaken the English reading public to a sense of its importance. She resolved at last on a new movement, engaged the Queen's Concert Rooms in Hanover Square, and delivered a lecture, entitled "The Position and Claims of Women."

I suppose we in America can hardly imagine the courage which this step cost a woman a little over her thirtieth birthday; for it was, I believe, in 1867 that Miss Faithfull delivered her first lecture.

Had the English gentleman's faith been less fervent in the cause to which she has dedicated her life, she would have shrunk from thus shocking the prejudices and ideas amid which she had been educated.

She herself had no expectation of the general interest which her lecture would arouse, and told me she would have been content with a small audience. But, to her surprise, the elegant rooms at Hanover Square were crowded with the fashionable and literary society of London. The clear rich voice must have told the large audience that night some truths that thrilled them; some honest words they must have carried back to the graceful, luxurious homes to haunt the soft air, like the solemn utterances of a prophet. And as Emily Faithfull looked that night upon the crowd of upturned faces, she must have felt a glow of enthusiastic pride that her hour at last had come, and that her work was recognised of men and women.

Indeed, that first lecture made a new era in her life. She quite took the hearts of the people by surprise. She made a name and a place then, which will doubtless last longer than her own life, as a Representative Woman, speaking the needs and wants of the dumb thousands who could find no voice for themselves.

The papers endorsed her views, and beamed encouraging paragraphs on her work. And from that hour it has gone bravely and steadily onward in the sunshine of public favor. Indeed, it seems almost incredible when you come to think, of the amount of work this one woman manages to perform. It is well that she has inherited a fine English physique, or she never could carry the burdens which, after all, seem to sit lightly upon her genial, warm, humor-loving nature.

At her rooms in Norfolk Square she gives lessons in public speaking, not only to ladies, but to clergymen and to Members of Parliament. She has established a Working Society for women, where anything in useful or ornamental handicraft finds a market. And here the Princess of Wales sends for needle-books and pincushions; while Miss Faithfull has the editorial charge of the Victoria Magazine, gives poetic and dramatic readings, and also lectures, frequently with great success, on historic and literary subjects, beside having the burden of an immense correspondence on all sorts of subjects on her hands.

In connection with this, she related to me a little incident, which, so far as I know, has never been repeated in this country.

Mrs. Caroline Norton, the poetess, had had some private correspondence with Miss Faithfull regarding the welfare of a young person in whom the former was deeply interested.

The advice desired had been generously bestowed, although neither of the ladies had ever seen each other. At last, however, the two met at a London party. The Honorable Mrs. Norton gazed with surprise on the fresh, thoughtful face before her, and exclaimed in amazement, "You Miss Faithfull, to whom I have been writing, and on whose advice I have been acting? Why, I pictured you to myself as a dear, old lady, with gray hair and a mob-cap!"

Queen Victoria, too, has shown the warmest interest in Miss Faithfull's work. She recently sent a message that the catalogue of the library at Buckingham Palace was being prepared by women.

At the World's Fair, also, Miss Faithfull exhibited specimens of her printing, which took the prize.

Just before sailing for America, she was made the recipient of a handsome testimonial from some of her distinguished countrymen and countrywomen. The gift consisted of a silver tea and coffee service—kettle and salver—of exquisite design, with a magnificent epergne. The inscription on the base of the epergne is as follows: "Presented to Miss Emily Faithfull, for her valuable services in promoting the educational and industrial interests of women."

Among the donors are the names of the Earl of Shaftesbury, Lady Franklin, Sir Charles Dilke, and others, whose names are graced with honors, not of inherited titles; but with the real nobility of Art, Science, Literature and Philanthropy.

In Miss Faithfull's reply to the presentation, there was one sentence which I cannot forbear quoting: "It is quite true that for some years I have devoted myself to a subject which has for me such an absorbing interest, that it is removed once and forever out of the region of self-sacrifice; but I wish I could persuade myself that I have been able to render any great or permanent benefit to the cause I gladly serve."

Miss Faithfull's especial object in visiting America was to obtain some new knowledge of the working of our institutions; especially with regard to the condition of working-women, their varied employments, their position, remuneration, anything, in short, relative to the subject so dear to her heart.

Her mission was semi-officially acknowledged in a note, which has never been published in this country, and which I therefore lay, for the first time, before my readers, as it was written by the Secretary of State:

"HOME DEPARTMENT.

"Dear Miss Faithfull—Lord Shaftesbury informs me that you propose visiting the United States of America for the purpose of making inquiries, among other matters, respecting the condition of women and children employed in manufactures.

"I am rejoiced to hear it.

"There are few women in England better qualified than yourself to make such an inquiry, or to impart the results in such a manner as to secure the attention of your countrymen.

"I admire the public spirit which animates you in thus undertaking a costly and troublesome journey.

"Any assistance I can give you through the foreign office, for the purpose of facilitating your inquiries, is at your service.

"Believe me,

"Very faithfully, yours,

"H. A. Bruce."

My first interview with Miss Faithfull took place, as I have already stated, on the evening of the reception at Steinway Hall, a "Tribute from the women of New York to a distinguished woman from 'over the sea.'"

It was the recognition of the value of her services in behalf of her sex; of the indomitable energy which had impelled her through these years to elevate the labor of women in all departments; to organize it into a guild full of dignity and honor, loftier than those we read about whose members used to parade the streets in long processions, with waving banners and strains of stirring music and gorgeous insignia, and filling some golden summer or autumn day that lies away off in other centuries with all the pomp and parade of war.

The great hall was crowded to overflowing that night. I think, as Miss Faithfull arose and gazed over the vast audience who had come together on that winter night to honor her zeal, her courage, her indomitable faith in multiplying the employments of women, she must have felt she had achieved a large success, however far she may have fallen below her own ideal.

Of this meeting, unique in many respects, some writer says:

"Not less interesting than the guest were the hosts. The working-women of New York represent many phases of social existence and many avocations. The radiant first lady of the opera, women who bear distinguished names in art and literature and the drama, singers and speakers and teachers claimed the right to be considered as honest, as purposeful and as tireless workers as women who sew or stand behind counters or keep books, or tend machines.

"At last, we have seen in this pleasure-loving city a congregation of many hundred women, to whom brains seemed more interesting than the bonnets which covered them, and the conduct of life a more serious business than its clothes."

After her cordial reception, the speech and the music, Miss Faithfull rose on the platform and spoke to her audience. She told her hearers what had brought her to America, and something about the condition of their sisters in England. How much that was pathetic and tragic was involved in the facts which the clear, rich voice of the Englishwoman held up to the men and women who heard her that night.

Her country, she acknowledged, was no longer that Paradise of Women, which it had once been called. Machinery had, in great measure, superseded the old employments of domestic life. It spun and ground and wove and baked, in the place of hands, while in higher circles the tendency to rash speculation had plunged many families into irretrievable poverty; and the speaker was in the daily receipt of letters from Englishwomen, of what are called "good families," asking for something to do—work of any kind, so long as it is fitting and honest. That cry to a man or woman with a heart to feel is well nigh the most agonizing in the world. And what are these women, thrown upon their own resources, calling for "any honest work," to do? There they sit, with their fair, white, helpless hands, nurtured in comfort and luxury, with the slavery of dependence or the bitterness of starvation staring them in the face!

That great problem of bread and butter, which has to be solved for every human being by itself or another, confronts these women, and if they cannot meet it by sweat of brow or toil of brain, what is to become of them?

This is the dreadful question which salutes one on the threshold. Miss Faithfull is trying to answer it; but when she told her audience that the census of 1871 showed that in England alone there were two and a half millions of women depending on their own exertions for their daily bread. She fairly appalled her hearers. Looked at from any side, it is a harrowing fact. Many of these women have been brought up in the pleasant, guarded seclusion of English homes. Their faculties have been trained for no work; they have no handicraft which can command any price in the market. The fathers, husbands, brothers, on whom, according to English theories of social and domestic life, they should depend for support and protection, are dead or wrecked in fortune; at all events, they are powerless at this crisis.

Two millions and a half of Englishwomen wanting their daily bread! Think of it!

Miss Faithfull has "thought" to some purpose. She believes that every possible avenue for self-support should be open to women—to use her own incisive way of putting it—that "equal remuneration to both sexes for the same kinds of labor, meant simply that woman has as good right to her bread as man."

Who really doubts that? Yet, in how many kinds of employment it is never acted on, and this fact alone has a powerful tendency to degrade the labor of women. When it is raised to the same honor and dignity as man's work, then this whole question will be disposed of.

"So long as work for money is regarded as discreditable to woman; so long as it affects her position socially," says Miss Faithfull, in substance, "so long she is cruelly enslaved by custom and public opinion."

And the writer whom we have quoted before adds pointedly: "A man who lives on relatives or friends to whom he is a burden, forfeits the name of gentleman. Work is his patent of gentility. Why should a woman in that plight be hindered from honorable toil? This moral ligature that withholds our girls of so-called position from manual labor is crueler and more mischievous than any French corset or Chinese slipper that ever maimed or tortured."

It is, of course, quite impossible to do justice, in these limits, to Miss Faithfull's arguments in support of her theories. In that large audience were many women, of course, whom fortune had placed far above the necessities of labor; but if they did not that night, under the spell of the speaker's eloquence, revolt in heart against the cruel barriers that hedge around their less fortunate sisters, and shut them out from any field of labor into which they could enter and earn an honorable livelihood, they are less than women.

We have almost swung out of the third quarter of this nineteenth century, and we think we have swung far out of the Mediæval darkness and bigotries. We are proud, and we well may be, of our advance, on many lines, of thoughts and living; but this old, barbarous notion that a woman somehow loses her position by supporting herself belongs to the twilight in which those old centuries lie. It has no right to show its head among us now. It is every true woman's duty to help throttle it.

Miss Faithfull read, at the close of her speech, a poem which narrated a story of touching heroism, performed by a poor woman during a frightful storm on the English coast. The story, and the tones of the reader, held the vast audience breathless and brought tears to many eyes, the lady sitting down at last amid storms of applause, frequently renewed; and then there was a singing of old ballads, that seemed to fill the whole air with an English morning's fresh sweetness—and the great reception was over.

Miss Faithfull is a woman of tall, commanding figure, with dark hair and eyes, and a bright, spirited face. I see her now, moving with slow, majestic tread up and down the room, as she gave me the main facts of this sketch, while the winter winds clamored outside.

She had, I saw, been greatly impressed with the rigors of a winter, unusually severe, even in our climate, and the asthma seized her on entering America, as the catarrh seized Dickens almost from the moment he landed on our shores. She has a keen sense of humor, and it plays about all her talk, and breaks out in stories which fairly convulse her hearers like some old English comedy. I never shall forget how she amused us by her account of the woman whom Miss Faithfull met on her Western tour, and who insisted that she had Queen Victoria's autograph, and was in the habit of visiting her, describing the English sovereign "as a pleasant, chatty person!"

Indeed, it is quite evident that Miss Faithfull believes heartily in looking on the bright side, in making the best of things as they are, and while she faces with indomitable courage and energy these great questions, in which are involved the happiness and dignity of womanhood, she still looks hopefully off where God's light gilds the mountain-tops, knowing that in time it will surely strike and irradiate the valleys.

JOSHUA DAVIDSON.*

THE author of this book, said to be a woman, writes with a caustic pen, uncovering the nakedness of fashionable Christianity, and showing its utter lack of sympathy with the life and teachings of our Lord when upon the earth. The imaginary hero of her volume, a poor carpenter in an obscure English village, starts in life, as a lad with the earthly example of Christ among the poor and suffering, as the ideal of his own. His experiences are not very satisfactory. His first realization of the difficult task before him is thus related;

There was nothing very remarkable about Joshua's childhood. He was always a quiet, thoughtful boy, and from his earliest years noticeably pious. His parents came of the Friends' stock; not of the strict kind themselves, for they joined in the Church services; but the fact is just an indication of the kind of influences which helped to mould him in early youth. He had a habit of asking why, and of reasoning out a principle, from quite a little lad; which displeased people; so that he did not get all the credit from the schoolmaster and the clergyman to which his diligence and good conduct entitled him. They thought him troublesome, and some said he was self-conceited; which he never was; but the more he was in earnest the more he offended them.

He was never well looked on by the vicar since a famous scene that took place in the church one Sunday after afternoon catechism. He was then about fourteen years of age, and I have heard say he was a beautiful boy, with a face almost like a young woman's for purity and spirituality. He was so beautiful that some ladies and gentlemen staying at the vicarage noticed him during church time, and said he looked like a boy-saint. But he knew nothing about himself. I question if he knew whether his hair was black like mine, or, as it was, a bright brown like ripe nuts in the sunshine. After catechism was over he stood out before the rest, just in his rough country clothes as he was, and said very respectfully to the vicar, Mr. Grand: "If you please, sir, I would like to ask you a few questions."

"Certainly, my lad, what have you to say?" said Mr. Grand, rather shortly. He did not seem over well pleased at the boy's addressing him; but he could not well refuse to hear him because of the ladies and gentlemen with him, and especially Mr. Freeman, a very good old man who thought well of everybody, and let everybody do pretty much as they liked.

"If we say, sir, that Jesus Christ was God," said Joshua, "surely all that He said and did must be the real right? There cannot be a better way than His?"

"Surely not, my lad," Mr. Grand made answer;

"what else have you been taught all your life? what else have you been saying in your catechism just now?"

"And His apostles and disciples, they showed the way, too?" said Joshua.

"And they showed the way, too, as you say; and if you come up to half they taught, you'll do well, Joshua."

The vicar laughed a little laugh as he said this; but it was a laugh, Joshua's mother said, that seemed to mean the same thing as a "scat"—our Cornish word for a blow—only the boy didn't seem to see it.

"Yes; but, sir, it is not of myself I am thinking, it is of the world," said Joshua. "If we are Christians, why don't we live as Christians?"

"Ah, indeed! why don't we?" said Mr. Grand. "Because of the wickedness of the human heart; because of the world, the flesh and the devil!"

"Then, sir, if you feel this, why don't you and all the clergy live like the apostles, and give what you have to the poor?" cried Joshua, clapping his hands and making a step forward, the tears in his eyes. "Why, when you read that verse, 'Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?' do you live in a fine house, and have grand dinners, and let Peggy Bray nearly starve in that old mud hut of hers, and widow Tregellis there, with her six children, and no fire or clothing for them? I can't make it out, sir! Christ was God; and we are Christians; yet we won't do as He ordered, though you tell us it is a sin that can never be forgiven if we dispute what the Bible says."

"And so it is," said Mr. Grand, sternly. "Who has been putting these bad thoughts into your head?"

"No one, sir. I have been thinking for myself. Michael, out by Lion's Den, is called an infidel; he calls himself one; and you preached last Sunday that no infidel can be saved; but Michael helped Peggy and her base child when the Orphan Fund people took away her pension, because, as you yourself told her, she was a bad woman, and it was encouraging wickedness; and he worked early and late for widow Tregellis and her children, and shared with them all he had, going short for them many a time. And I can't help thinking, sir, that Christ, who forgave all manner of sinners, would have helped Peggy with her base child, and that Michael, being an infidel and such a good man, is something like that second son in the parable who said he would not do his Lord's will when he was ordered, but who went all the same—"

"And that your vicar is like the first?" interrupted Mr. Grand, angrily.

"Well, yes, sir, if you please," said Joshua, quite modestly, but very fervently.

There was a great stir among the ladies and gentlemen when Joshua said this; and some laughed a little, under their breath, because it was in church, and others lifted up their eyebrows, and said, "What an extraordinary boy!" and whispered together; but Mr. Grand was very angry, and said, in a severe tone: "These things are beyond the knowledge of an ignorant lad like you, Joshua; and I advise you, before you turn questioner and reformer, to learn a little humility and respect for your betters. I consider you have done a very impertinent thing to-day, and I shall mark you for it!"

"I did not mean to be impertinent, sir," said Joshua, eagerly; "I want only to know the right of things from you, and to do as God has commanded, and Christ has shown us the way. And as you are our clergyman, and this is the house of God, I thought it the best plan to ask: I want only to know the truth; and I cannot make it out!"

"Hold your tongue, sir!" said Mr. Grand. "God has commanded you to obey your pastors and masters and all that are in authority over you; so let us have no more of this folly. Believe as you are taught, and do as you are told, and don't set yourself up as an independent thinker in matters you understand no more than the ass you drive. Go back to your place, sir, and another time think twice before you speak to your superiors."

"I meant no harm. I meant only the truth and to hear the things of God," repeated Joshua, sadly, as he took his seat among his companions; who tittered.

When they all went out of church Mr. Grand was heard to say to Mr. Freeman: "You will see, Freeman, that boy will go to the bad; he will turn out a pestilent fellow, a freethinker and a democrat. Oh, I know the breed, with their cant about truth and the right! He richly deserved a flogging to-day if ever boy did; to dare to take me to task in my own church!"

But Mr. Freeman said gently: "I don't think he meant it for insolence. I think the lad was in earnest, though, of course, he should not have spoken as he did."

"Earnest or not, he must be taught better manners for the future," said Mr. Grand.

And so it was that Joshua was not well looked on by the clergyman, who was his enemy, as one may say, ever after.

All this made a great talk at the time, and there are many who remember the whole thing at this present day; as any one would find if they were to ask down at Trevalga; but all that Joshua was ever heard to say of it was: "I thought only of what was right in the sight of God; I never thought of man at all."

He did not, however, repeat the experiment of asking inconvenient questions of his social superiors in public; but it was noticed that after this he became more and more thoughtful, and more and more under the influence of a higher principle than lads of his age are usually troubled with. And though always tender to his parents and respectful to the schoolmaster and minister, and the like of that, yet he was less guided by what might be called expediency in his conduct, and more than ever a stickler for the uncompromising truth, and the life as lived by Jesus Christ. He was not uncomfortable to live with, his mother said; quite the contrary; no one ever saw him out of temper, and no one ever knew him to do a bad thing; but he somehow forced his parents to be always up to the mark, and even the neighbors were ashamed to talk loosely or say what they shouldn't before a lad whose whole thought, whose sole endeavor was, "how to realize Christ."

"Mother," he once said, as he and Mrs. Davidson stood by the cottage-door together, "I mean when I grow up to live as our Lord and Saviour lived when He was on the earth. For, though He is God in Heaven He was only man here; and what He did we too can do with His help and the Holy Spirit's."

"He is our example, lad," said his mother, reverently. "But I doubt lest you fall by over boldness."

"Then, if imitation is over bold, His life was a delusion, and He is not our example at all," said Joshua. "Which is a saying of the devil."

But, with his ideal firmly fixed, Joshua could not rest. The lad gathered about him other lads, and endeavored to lead them to imitate the life of Christ in personal purity, in humble-mindedness and in helpful deeds to the poorest and vilest; but in so doing he was misunderstood by such representatives of Christianity as Vicar Grand, and denounced as a pestilent fellow.

On attaining manhood, he went to London, and there consorting with the poor, the vile and criminal, endeavored to lift them up and lead them back to innocence and virtue—so trying to imitate his great Exemplar. But though he led a life of purity and gave himself for the good of others, he was misunderstood, misjudged and persecuted by the very class of people who represent the Christian moralist of to-day. And no wonder; for associating with the vile—but only to do them good—he was judged partially and by the company he kept.

He now became blown about by many winds of doctrine. Christianity, as he found it, seemed everywhere false to the example and teachings of Christ, who was meek and lowly in heart, and cared for the poorest and vilest—seeking to save that which was lost. He was like an unpiloted vessel. He was beset with doubts, in which the only thing that kept its shape or place was the character of Christ; and nothing turned him aside from his work of doing good among the people. But, setting conservatism at naught; paying no regard to appearances; consecrating in his purity with the vilest that he might, if possible, save them; he was rejected by Christian people; imprisoned by the authorities because found in the company of evil men; and finally set upon by a mob of his countrymen, to whom he was trying to preach the doctrine of Communism—by which he meant the brotherhood of man based on the teachings of Christ—and murdered.

One of the chapters, showing how aristocracy sometimes comes down to the work of helping and saving the poor and debased, is so well told, that we copy it entire. Lord X., notorious for his philanthropy, of an unsteady and spasmodic kind, met Joshua in his wanderings among the poor, and as "no one could come in contact with him without feeling that inexplicable charm which is inseparable from great earnestness and self-devotion," Lord X. was at first strongly attracted by the man; and for a time they worked together. Joshua was much elated, thinking now that he had wealth and influence on his side, and he could do wonders for his poor friends. What came of it all is told in the following chapter, which we copy entire:

LADY X.

This was Joshua's first introduction into a wealthy house of the upper classes; and from the retinue of servants in their gorgeous liveries thronging the hall, to the little lapdog on its velvet cushion, the luxury and lavishness he saw everywhere almost stupefied him. To a man earning, say some twenty-five shillings a week, and living on less than half—sharing with those poorer than himself, and content to go short that others might be satisfied—the revelation of Lord X.'s house was a sharp and positive pain. The starvation he, the noblemen, had seen in his wanderings—starvation in all probability relieved for to-day; but to-morrow and the day after and for all future time, till the pauper's grave closed over all?—and then had come to an abundance, a fastidiousness, of which the very refuse would have been salvation to hundreds; the miserable dwellings he visited, mere eyes of filth, immodesty and vice, where the seeds of physical disease and moral corruption are sown broadcast and from earliest infancy—and then returned to a dwelling like a fairy palace, where every nook and corner was perfect, redolent of all kinds of sweetness and loveliness—to a man of the people like Joshua, fairly oppressive in its richness and grandeur; the gaunt and famine-wasted men and women and children that he had so often met, the little ones brutally treated, half starved, sworn at and knocked about, swarming through reeking courts and alleys where the very air of heaven was poisonous—and the lady's lapdog, with its dainty food, its tender care, well washed, combed, curled, scented, adorned, on a velvet footstool, a toy bought for it to play with: and that man and that woman—this lord and lady—were professing Christians, went regularly to church, believed that Christ was very God, and that every word of the Bible was inspired! It was habit; but at first sight it looked incomprehensible to one who lived among the poor, and was of them.

Lady X. soon came into the room where Joshua and Lord X. were. She was a tall, fair, languid woman, kindly natured but selfish, dissatisfied with her life as it was yet unable to devise anything better for herself; having no interest anywhere, without children, and evidently not as much in love with her husband as model wives usually are: a woman whose intelligence and physique clashed, the one being restless and the other indolent. Every now and then she took up her husband's "cases," partly out of complaisance to him, partly from profound weariness with her life, and also from the natural kind-heartedness which made her like to do good-natured things and to give pleasure to others. But she soon abandoned them and set them adrift. She was a woman with great curiosity but no tenacity; full of a soft sensual kind of passion that led her into danger as much from idleness as from vice; she loved out of idleness, and worked out of idleness. It was a gain to her to be interested in anything—whether it was the fashion of the day or the salvation of a human soul; but there was no spirit of self-sacrifice in her, and she would have considered it an impertinence if she had been asked to do a hair's-breadth more than she desired of her own free will. Had she been born poor, she might have been a grand woman; as she was, she was just a fine lady whose nobler nature was stifled under the weight of idleness and luxury.

But she liked Joshua, and took to him kindly.

She gave him at that first interview a really handsome sum of money for his poorer friends; she promised clothes and soup-tickets, books for his school, toys for his children, good food for his sick. The simple yet so grand earnestness of the man interested her, and she too felt as every one else did, that here was a master-spirit which had a claim to all men's reverence and admiration. She was not satisfied with this first visit, but Joshua must go to see her again; and after he had been there twice, she of herself offered to come and see him in his lodgings, over the little sweet-stuff shop which Mary Prinsep kept. And Joshua did not forbid her.

Was there ever such an incongruity? The street—East Street—in which we lived, was too narrow for her carriage to come down, so she had to walk the distance to Joshua's rooms. And I shall never forget the sight. Her dainty feet were clothed in satin on which glittered buckles that looked like diamonds; her dress was of apple-blossom-colored silk that trailed behind her; her bonnet seemed to be just a feather and a veil; she wore some light face thing about her that looked like a cloud more than a fabric; and her arms and neck were covered with chains and lockets and bracelets. She was like a fairy queen among the gnomes and blackmoors of an underground mine, like a sweet-scented rose-bush in the midst of a refuse heap as she came picking her way with courage, but with exaggerated delicacy, her footman in his blue and silver at her back, and the mob of the street staring, too much astonished at such an apparition to jeer.

When she came into the little shop and asked for Joshua, I was standing in the doorway (it was on a Sunday) between the shop and Mary's back room; and for the first time I saw Mary in an ugly light. She turned quite white as the lady came in, and instead of answering, looked round to me with an agony in her face that was indescribable.

"Yes, madam," I said coming forward; "he is up-stairs."

"Do you want him, ma'am?" then asked Mary, the look of pain still in her large, fixed eyes; and I thought that the lady, looking at her—for Mary was young and very pretty, as I have said—looked uneasy, too. At all events, she looked haughty.

"Yes," she said; but she turned and spoke to me, not to Mary. "Have the goodness to tell him that Lady X. wants to speak to him."

I ran up-stairs and told him; and Joshua, without changing his countenance one whit, as if lords and ladies in gorgeous array were our natural visitors and what we were used to every day, came down and greeted the lady as he would have greeted the baker's wife—neither more nor less respectfully; which means, that he was respectful to every one.

Lady X. made a step forward when he came into the shop, and the blood flew over her face as she gave him her hand.

"Now, you must let me see where you live, and how you do such wonders," she said, with the most undefinable but unmistakable accent of coaxing, in the voice.

And Joshua, saying quietly, "Are you not too fine to come up our stairs, Lady X.?—we do our best to keep them clean, Mary, don't we? but, they are not used to such-like feet on them," gave her his hand, smiling.

"They will be used to mine, I hope, often," said my lady, kindly. "You know I have taken a great interest in your work, Mr. Davidson, and I am going to help where I can."

"If you will come this way, then, my lady, I will show you all I have on hand at the present moment," said Joshua, moving toward the stairs.

And again the lady blushed; and her long silk skirts trailed behind her with a curious rustling noise; and we heard her light boot-heels go tap, tap, up the stairs, and her chains and trinkets jingle.

Then Mary turned to me, and said, with a wild kind of look: "John! John! she is here for no good! She will harm more than she helps. What call has she to come here? who wants her? She will only do us all a mischief!"

She turned her face to the window and burst into tears.

"Mary! what ails you?" I said, vaguely; for I was shocked, and did not rightly understand her. I seemed to feel something I could not give a name to—a pain and a queer kind of doubt; but indeed it was all chaotic, and all I knew was that I was sorry. "You know," I went on, trying to comfort her, "that money and worldly influence at Joshua's back would give him all he wants. His hands are so weak now for want of both these things. Why should we be sorry, dear, that he has the chance of them?"

"She has come for no good!" was all that Mary would say; and I could only wonder at an outburst unlike anything I had ever seen before.

My lady stayed a long time up-stairs, and poor Mary's agony during her visit never relaxed. At last she came down, flushed and radiant. Her eyes were softer and darker, her face looked younger and more tender; she even glanced kindly at me as she passed me, saying to Joshua, in a voice as sweet as a silver bell: "And this is the John you have been telling me about?—he looks a good fellow!—and is this Mary?" but she was not quite so tender to Mary; and she added, in rather a displeased tone of voice: "Girl! you look very young to keep house by yourself, and have young men lodgers!"

"Ah, my lady, you forget that our girls have not the care taken of them that yours have," said Joshua, gently. "So soon as a girl of ours can get her living, she does."

"Well, I hope that Mary will be a good girl, and do you credit," said my lady, coldly.

She shook hands then with Joshua, but, with her hand still in his, turned to him and, with the sweetest smile I have ever seen on woman's face, said in the same strange caressing way: "I must ask you to be kind enough to take me to my carriage, Mr. Davidson. I think my footman must have gone to keep the coachman company; and I should scarcely like to go down the street alone."

"Certainly not," said Joshua, and led her, still holding her hand, out from the shop and into the little street to where her carriage was waiting for her.

"Mind the shop for me, John," said Mary; and with a great sob she ran away and shut herself up in her own room.

She would have been ashamed, I know, to let Joshua see that she was crying, and all for nothing, too; only because a fine lady, smelling of sweet scents and wearing a rich silk gown, had passed through the shop.

As for him, he came back without a ruffle on his quiet, mild face. There was no flash of gratified vanity on it; nothing but just that inward, absorbed look, that look of peace and love which beautified him at all times. As he passed through, he looked round for Mary; but I told him she was bad with her head; and as this had the effect of sending him into her room to look after her, poor Mary's attempt at concealment came to nothing. But I don't think Joshua found out why she was crying.

Many a day after this my lady's carriage came to the entrance of our wretched street, and my lady herself, like a radiant vision, picked her way among garbage and ruffianism down to the little sweet-stuff shop, where ha'pennyworths of "bulls'-eyes" were sold to young children by a girl who had once been a street-walker, and where the up-stairs rooms were tenanted by two journeymen carpenters. It was an anomaly that could not last; but the very sharpness of the contrast gave it interest in her eyes; and while the novelty continued it was like a scene out of a play in which she was the heroine. So, at least, I judged her; and the more I think of the whole affair, the more sure I feel that I am right.

And then Joshua's handsome face and dignity of look and manner might count for something.

She (the lady) was truly good and helpful to Joshua all the time this fall of hers lasted; for that it was only a fad, without stability or roots, the sequel proved. She brought him clothes and money, and seemed ready to do all she could for him. He had only to tell her that he wanted such and such help, and she gave it, aye, like a princess!

What took place between them neither I nor any one can say. Joshua never opened his lips on the subject; and after that day, by tacit consent all round, the name of Lord and Lady X. was a dead letter among us. All I know is, that one day, when she had come down to our place, as so often now, my lady, flushed, haughty, trembling, too, but changed somehow, with a sad, disordered face instead of the half-sleepy sweetness usual to it, came down-stairs—not this time holding Joshua's hand; he following her, pale and troubled-looking; that she passed through the little shop quickly and impatiently, with never a glance toward Mary or me; that at the door she turned round, and said, sharply: "You need not give yourself the trouble, Mr. Davidson, to come with me—I can find my way alone;" and that Joshua answered with more tenderness and humility of tone and manner than I had ever seen or heard in him before: "My lady, I must disobey you; I cannot let you go through the street alone." And that he followed her out, bareheaded, but at a little distance from her—not beside her.

This was the last time we saw her; nor did Lord X. keep up any association with my friend. And I heard afterward, quite accidentally, that he had said soon after this, he really "could not countenance that man Davidson: he was too offensively radical in his opinions, and a presuming fellow besides."

But word came to us both that my lady had found out all about Mary; and that she had expressed herself imited and revolted at Joshua's allowing her to enter a house kept by such a creature.

"It was all very well to be compassionate and helpful," she had said; "but no amount of charity justified that man Davidson in his proceedings with such a woman. Or, if he chose to associate with her himself, he ought to have warned her (her ladyship), that she should not have made the mistake of speaking to her as to a proper person."

So this first and last attempt at aristocratic co-operation fell to the ground; and society peremptorily refused to endorse a man who had set himself to live the life after Christ.

If Joshua was sorry for the loss he had so mysteriously sustained, poor Mary was not. All during the lady's visits she had drooped and pined, till I thought she was in a bad way, and going to be worse. Ah! this was a bitter thorn to me, for I loved her like my own; and I loved Joshua and his work and his life better than my own life; and I was perplexed, and in a manner torn to pieces, among so many feelings. But she revived after the day when the lady passed through the shop with her sad, proud, disordered face, and when Joshua came back from seeing her to her carriage, like a man who has had a blow and is still dazed by it. She waited on him after this, more assiduously than ever. She seemed to live only to please him. The place was the very perfection of cleanliness. Even my lady's palace could not have been more wholesome or more pure. The squalor of the shell, so to speak, and the poverty of the inside, was concealed or made to be forgotten by the exquisite neatness and cleanliness with which it was all kept; and when Joshua's countenance came back again, as it did after awhile, to its usual sweet serenity, Mary's also came to its peace, and the cloud that had hung over it like a distemper passed away.

"It will not do, John!" he said to me one day, some time after; "for the aristocracy to come down to the poor is a mistake. They are different creatures altogether, with different laws of honor and morality among themselves from what we know anything about. And the gulf is too wide to be bridged over by just one here, and another there, coming like the old Israelitish spies among us, to see the nakedness of the land. They do a little good for the time, but it is good that bears no blessing with it, and is not lasting. We must work up by ourselves into a state nearer to them in material good; but not," he added, as if by an after-thought, "in looseness of principle. That, however, has come only from idleness; and if great people had imperative duties and the absolute need of exertion, we should hear of fewer divorce scandals, fewer turf catastrophes, and the like, than we do now. However, that is not our affair. We are here to work on our own account, not to judge of others."

"It is an old saying, Joshua, but a true one, 'extremes meet,'" said I. "The very poor have no taste for refined pleasure, and indeed no power of indulging it if they had; and the very rich, sated with all that is given to them by their position, devise new excitements of an ignoble kind. I suppose that is something like it?"

"I suppose so," he answered. "At all events, there can be no such thing as levelling down. It would be no righteousness to bring the rich, the refined, the well educated down to the level of the poor; but to raise up the masses, and to impose on the upper classes positive duties, this is the only way in which the difference between high and low can be lessened. And if this can be done free of national revolt and bloodshed, it will be a godlike work, and the blessed solution of the greatest difficulty the world has seen yet. It cannot be a good thing that some men have to work till all the strength of intellect is worked out of them, while others are lapped in such idleness that all theirs is either benumbed and stagnated, or turned to evil issues for want of being wholesomely used. Come how it may, it has to come—this more equal distribution of the better things of life. I do not mean that the duchess will have to share her velvet cushions with the seamstress; but it has to be that, either by education or improved machinery, or both, there will not be the enormous difference there is now between the duchess and the seamstress. We have made a great parade lately of our sympathy with the North, on the ground of emancipation; but society here in London holds slaves as arbitrarily and as cruelly as ever the Southern planters did; and its vested interests, however demoralizing, are as sacred to us as were the vested interests of the planter to him. I will never again try a fraternal union with a rich house. When the workmen have their political and social rights, and have utilized their leisure to refine and elevate, to beautify and adorn their lives, then, when we are radically equal, we can meet as men and brothers. As we are now, we are experiments to some, mere temporary amusements to others, inferiors to all; and we pin our faith to a straw—hang our golden hopes on gossamer—when we look for vital co-operation from them."

"I thought Joshua would find her out in time," was Mary's comment. "I took stock of her from the first, and saw she was no good."

HABITUAL MOVEMENT IN THE LOWER ANIMALS.

THE following curious facts are from Darwin's last work, "Expression of the Emotions in Man and the Lower Animals."

Dogs, when they wish to go to sleep on a carpet or other hard surface, generally turn round and round and scratch the ground with the forepaws in a senseless manner, as if they intended to trample down the grass and scoop out a hollow, as, no doubt, their wild parents did when they lived on open grassy plains or in the woods. Jackals, fennecs and other allied animals in the Zoological Gardens, treat their straw in this manner; but it is a rather odd circumstance that the keepers, after observing for some months, have never seen the wolves thus behave. A semi-idiotic dog—and an animal in this condition would be particularly liable to follow a senseless habit—was observed by a friend to turn completely round on a carpet thirteen times before going to sleep.

Many carnivorous animals, as they crawl toward their prey and prepare to rush or spring on it, lower their heads and crouch, partly, as it would appear, to hide themselves, and partly to get ready for their rush; and this habit, in an exaggerated form, has become hereditary in our pointers and setters. Now I have noticed scores of times that, when two strange dogs meet on an open road, the one which first sees the other, though at the distance of one or two hundred yards, after the first glance always lowers its head, generally crouches a little, or even lies down; that is, he takes the proper attitude for concealing himself and for making a rush or spring, although the road is quite open and the distance great. Again, dogs of all kinds, when intently watching and slowly approaching their prey, frequently keep one of their forelegs doubled up for a long time, ready for the next cautious step; and this is eminently characteristic of the pointer. But from habit they behave in exactly the same manner whenever their attention is aroused. I have seen a dog at the foot of a high wall, listening attentively to a sound on the opposite side, with one leg doubled up; and in this there could have been no intention of making a cautious approach.

Dogs scratch themselves by a rapid movement of one of their hind feet; and, when their backs are rubbed with a stick, so strong is the habit, that they cannot help rapidly scratching the air or the ground in a useless and ludicrous manner.

Horses scratch themselves by nibbling those parts of their bodies which they can reach with their teeth; but more commonly one horse shows another where he wants to be scratched, and they then nibble each other. A friend, whose attention I had called to the subject, observed that, when he rubbed his horse's neck, the animal protruded his head, uncovered his teeth and moved his jaws, exactly as if nibbling another horse's neck, for he could never have nibbled his own neck. If a horse is much tickled, as when curried, his wish to bite something becomes so intolerably strong, that he will clatter his teeth together, and, though not vicious, bite his groom. At the same time, from habit, he closely depresses his ears, so as to protect them from being bitten, as if he were fighting with another horse.

A horse, when eager to start on a journey, makes the nearest approach which he can to the habitual movement of progression by pawing the ground. Now, when horses in their stalls are about to be fed and are eager for their corn, they paw the pavement or the straw. Two of my horses thus behave when they see or hear the corn given to their neighbors. But here we have what may almost be called a true expression, as pawing the ground is universally recognized as a sign of eagerness.

The sheldrake (Tadorna) feeds on the sands left uncovered by the tide, and, when a worm-cast is discovered, "it begins patting the ground with its feet, dancing, as it were, over the hole," and this makes the worm come to the surface. Now, Mr. St. John says that, when his tame sheldrake "came to ask for food they patted the ground in an impatient and rapid manner." This, therefore, may almost be considered as their expression of hunger. Mr. Bartlett informs me that the flamingo and kagu (Rhinocetus jubatus), when anxious to be fed, beat the ground with their feet in the same odd manner. So, again, king-fishers, when they catch a fish, always beat it until it is killed; and in the Zoological Gardens they always beat the raw meat, with which they are sometimes fed, before devouring it.

WASHINGTON IRVING once said of a pompous American diplomatist, "Ah, he is a great man; and, in his own estimation, a very great man, a man of great weight. When he goes to the West the East tips up."

PRIDE is increased by ignorance; those assume the most who know the least.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSEIWAT POTTER.

No. IV.

IT was a tiresome walk home, and I was sorry I had not ridden Humbug. She was running idle in the hill pasture. Pipey Ellen's quinsy had not reached its worst when I arrived, and I was glad of it, and told her mother what to do to bring relief. Her hair was put back carefully out of the way and tar spread all over her throat and up under her ears, and then a cloth covered over all. She had not slept for two nights, but in less than an hour she was sleeping sweetly.

When she awoke the next morning all soreness and swelling were gone, and nothing remained of the coat of tar but a yellow stain, and that was easily washed off with castile soapsuds.

I regard this as the best known cure for quinsy, and the one that brings the surest and quickest relief.

When Ida was taking up the roast beef, after I came home, she spilt a little grease on the pantry floor. She had just read in the Ohio Farmer how to take grease out of floors, and this was a good time to try the experiment. Immediately after spilling it she spread on soft soap, and run a hot flat-iron over it a few times, and then washed it off clean. It took out the grease entirely, and nothing was left but a brown stain, such as tobacco spittle would make.

This remedy should be applied immediately. Of course a careful housewife keeps one iron on the stove all the time.

It is not likely that the job of soap-making will be done when you women, readers sit down to cut the pages of this number. I have spoken of this before, but I know some things about it that I did not last year. Last spring I made almost a hogshead full of nice soap—did it all myself, like a little lady.

The new things I learned were these. We had a good deal of old strong smoked meat, rinds, bits of old hams and such like. When I looked at the heap of stuff I was quite discouraged; some of the material was as hard as a lot of old boots; but I managed nicely. I put all into a barrel, the horniest pieces at the bottom, filled it with water, and let it stand a week or two. The whole mass was softened, and when put into strong hot lye it soon disappeared. The sediment went to the bottom of the kettle and the grease to the top.

Rube framed a leach for us, securely put together, one that will last for years.

I asked a good woman, who seems to know everything, how she managed her soap-making, and this is what she says;

"I am so fortunate as to have a large cauldron set in brick, with a leach on one side and an ash-crib of brick on the other. When my husband fills the leach he puts a little lime at the bottom. After I have run off what lye I need for my soap, I put on more water and make lye enough to quite fill an old fish-barrel. Into this I put bones, scraps, rinds and whatever may accumulate through the summer. Flies and rats do not trouble it, then.

"When ready to make soap in the spring, I run off a little new strong lye and put it into the cauldron with all the stuff that has collected during the winter that is not clear grease. Boil all together until the rinds, bits of meat, etc., are dissolved, then pour in water enough to completely cover the refuse which will settle; then add a double handful of salt, stir well, and leave until the next day, when the cleansed grease will be at the top, and the bones, glue, dirt, etc., at the bottom. Then I take off the grease, put it in the soap-barrel, add my other clean grease and lye, stir it a little every day, and I soon have soap, nice and thick. The grease at the top will not be like that which is rendered; sometimes it will be a little soapy. What is left we use to wash our apple-trees, and the bones, easily broken, go to the manure heap."

We doctor too much. Every day that I live the fact is more and more impressed upon my mind. We compress the lungs by tight lacing, we cramp our hands with tight gloves, we crumple our feet out of their natural shape by squeezing them into tight shoes. I want it understood when I say we that I only say it through courtesy, and don't mean myself at all, at all. I never laced in my life, I so thoroughly despise it. I measure twenty-six inches round the waist; I rarely wear gloves, and always wear shoes a size or one and a half sizes too large.

"What will people say?" is a bugbear that never stood in my path. While I respect every person, I don't care a crook o' my thumb what they think of me.

I was in at Coulter's store the other day selecting a pair of No. 7 gaiters, and wondering if I could wear them with two pairs of woollen stockings, when Miss Fildget stepped up beside me, and in a voice shrill as a cricket's piped out, "Let me look at your No. 7's;" and she cocked her eye up at me—unconsciously, of course. Bah!

Impure blood is the foundation of all sickness; whatever arrests the flow of blood through the body engenders disease. Cold or compressed hands and feet show a want of free circulation of the blood. If our shoes are too tight our feet are numb or cold, the blood that should flow in them is stagnant.

We break nature's laws every day, and while wilfully and deliberately breaking them we groan and sigh and follow the prescriptions of the physician.

We doctor too much. We wear shoulder-braces and trusses, and we swallow drastic purgatives, when we only need to exercise the small degree of common sense that we surely have. Nature needs to be left alone with her marvellous and intricate and well-ordered machinery.

Instead of wearing braces, learn to walk with your shoulders thrown back, your chin slightly above a horizontal line, or your eyes directed to things a little higher than your own head.

Dr. Hall says one will walk properly, pleasantly and without any feeling of restraint or awkwardness in this position. To aid in securing this habitual carriage of body, accustom yourself to carry your hands behind you, one hand grasping the opposite wrist.

This position of body is common among the English, who are admired the world over for their fine bearing, full chests and broad shoulders.

Instead of cathartics eat only one or two meals a day, exercise enough, be cheerful and content to let matters rest without your very wise interference.

And so of any other ailment; don't think about yourself all the time, eat nutritious food, laugh, tell funny stories, bring yourself in contact with your neighbors, try and do good to somebody; look on the bright side of life, and believe and know that if you hadn't this trouble you'd have some other, and perhaps a worse one. Think over your neighbors' trials, and see if you can select one that you'd rather have than your own.

Don't grieve over your beloved dead. God knew best; not a sorrow comes from His hand that is not a blessing in the end.

I often think of an incident I once read. A child lay dying. The frenzied mother, in an agony of grief, besought her Heavenly Father to spare her boy-baby. She prayed without ceasing, she impetuned agonizingly; and it seemed the Father, in whose hands are all our destinies, yielded. Slowly the babe came back to life from the verge of eternity, and that mother lived to see her son a drunkard, a criminal, convicted for murder and hung. How much better that he had died in his infancy!

I think none of us—and here I mean myself—accept of life with all its vicissitudes as cheerfully and unselfishly as we ought to do. We find too much fault; we would have things just as we choose; we put too high an estimate upon ourselves, and our capabilities, and our own petty acquirements. This is the reason we see only ourselves in our august proportions.

Heh! how common it is to hear people at the breakfast-table regale their friends with a particular narrative relating to themselves.

With an injured or an important air they will say: "I lay awake full two hours in the night;" or, "I had a horrible dream last night;" or, "I had a dreadful pain in my chest;" or, "My big toe was very painful awhile;" or, "I feel as if something were going to happen."

Really, it is too bad to permit ourselves to be tied down by so short a tether, to see no further than our own selves.

I would suggest a plan to those making new rag carpet that will be found excellent. I was over at Goose Creek church to a prayer meeting the other evening, and the woman with whom Elder Nutt boards, Sister Hartman, told me of it. Tell the weaver just exactly how long your strips will need to be, how many yards from one end of your room to the other, and let him keep correct measure, and when the strip is long enough, leave off the filling in of rags, and weave eight or ten times across with coarse tow yarn, or thread like the chain. That will serve for a binding; all you need to do will be to turn it in like a hem. I think binding carpet is tiresome work; still, if you prefer to sew on a binding, don't use woollen goods; the moths will find a lodgment there. Drilling the color of the carpet is preferable. After sewing on and turning in a carpet binding it is well to sew across it once, good honest back-stitch.

In sewing strips of carpet together, the stripes or figures will always match easily if the edges are sewed together that came at the same side of the loom. Frequently one side of a web will be smooth and even while the other side is loose and uneven. The fault lies in putting it on the yarn beam carelessly.

In times of house-cleaning be careful in taking up carpets. Some women in removing a dusty carpet stand up straight, and as far away as they can get, and jerk it up regardless of the tacks that tear through and are left sticking in the floor. With care, a carpet may last many years.

Now that the season of house-cleaning is upon us, don't make fools of yourselves, and doctor bills for your ignored husbands to pay. Don't turn the contents of your house all out of doors and go staving about like a monomaniac.

This periodical warfare against dirt; this splashing the suds like a wounded whale; this season of colds, and neuralgia, and chills, and toothache, and ugly glum yellow faces and frowzy heads, and all the discomforts of the worse than homeless, is one of the silliest whims that ever attacked weak womanhood. I have no patience with it. But it is no use for me to say anything. I would merely suggest that you do not be in a hurry to commence your tooth-and-nail attack; when you do, try and go about it coolly, take one room at a time, work in the forenoons, when you are the strongest, and have a girl to help you. Don't move the kitchen stove until June, and then in its place put up a parlor stove in case of sobbing all-day rains and bleak cloudy evenings.

Don't do any work in which you have to reach up high, or above your heads. If you know anything at all of physiology, of the intricate and delicate mechanism that constitutes woman, you will know this to be highly injurious.

About door-yards. In the debilitating spring days women often waste all the nervous energy they have in spading and throwing up earth into flower-beds. For a weak woman this is very hard work. Now, really, there is nothing prettier than smooth, grassy door-yards, the broader the better.

If you want flowers in the yard, let them, by all means, be flowering shrubs, trimmed into pretty shape. Don't allow the evergreen shrubbery in your yards to be close together—let each tree have plenty of room, that there may be no imperfect side to it.

But grass, we think, should be the chief adornment of every door-yard.

By moving a fence every spring, we can enlarge our front yard so as to take in a sloping meadow of several acres.

We always assist the deacon most cheerfully in carrying away this unsightly fence.

A house standing in a meadow, beautified by trees of native growth, is one of the few beautiful things that we never weary of admiring.

If possible, have pig-pens, cow-yards and calf-sheds away from the house, they are the bane of country life; but if you cannot have it so without harsh words and tears, and hearing taunts about women being "more nice than wise," then bear it as cheerfully as you can, and make the best of it.

Don't say bitter things that you would gladly recall when you look upon a coffin and a pallid face, and hands folded forevermore. It is better to bear all these little trials with gentleness and patience.

Once, in the heyday of my girlhood, I was passing a humble cottage in the edge of a wood in Cochocton county, and I grew very enthusiastic over the bean and cypress and morning-glory vines that festooned the windows, and draped the posts of the rustic porch, and curtained and made "living green" the bare, gray walls. I never saw such luxuriance and beauty as those riotous vines afforded. We rode very slowly, that I might prolong my enjoyment.

I could see by the surroundings that the wife and her husband were not both admirers of the beautiful in nature.

While I was gazing, the husband came out of a tumble-down wagon-shed, with a load of old, rusty harness on his shoulder.

I said, "Do you live here?"

"Yess'm," was the reply.

"Does your wife keep house, and 'tend to everything herself?"

"Yess'm."

"Well, I wish you'd tell her that I say she's a real lady, and I love her."

"Why?" said he, winking fast.

"Oh, 'cause she makes everything so beautiful about her little home-nest."

"Ho! you're as big a fool as she is," said he, stuffily, through his ugly, flat nose.

That was just what I expected.

We took tea at Sister Bodkin's the other evening. The conversation turned upon buying supplies by the quantity—by the barrel, box and web. I had been telling the deacon for years that it would be better to buy our coffee, tea, sugar, muslin and calico by the quantity; that we would save money, time, and the vexation of being out just when an article was wanted. There would be less danger then of getting poor articles.

Another suggestion that was made by one of the sisters was, that of paying as you go, instead of buying upon credit. We all concluded that this plan would pay pecuniarily, and would pay in increased independence and self-respect, in freedom from care and annoyance, and consequent good-humor with one's self and the rest of mankind.

Sister Bodkin had a new kind of preserve, that we all liked very much.

While she was washing dishes, I wiped them, so I could have the chance of asking her how she made them. She said, take fair sweet apples, with firm flesh, pare them nicely, cut them across the core in slices the fourth of an inch thick, remove the seeds, but not the core, as it improves the appearance of the preserve. Boil very gently in a little water till tender, and then lift them carefully on plates. Take half the number of lemons that you had of apples, cut them across the core in slices the same thickness of the apples, remove the seeds, and spread the slices on earthen platters. Take pulverized loaf-sugar—the weight equalling that of the fruit weighed before boiling—sprinkle half of it over the lemon slices, let it stand a few hours till liquid enough has formed to cook them in, then drain it off and put it over the fire in a porcelain-lined kettle with the rest of the sugar. When it boils, drop in both lemon and apple slices, and boil gently till the fruit is clear. For those who dislike the flavor of lemon-peel, the apples can be made as above, substituting lemon juice for lemon slices; or, the apples can be left whole, if the cores are carefully cut out.

I forgot to say that while we were eating father got a fish-bone in his throat. He is always trying to talk while he is eating, or laughing immoderately, or something else; and it is no uncommon thing for him to choke until he is as black in the face as a wheel-head.

He had been telling an old story about the miraculous conversion of his great-grandfather—the company were paying good attention, and all at once father leaned forward and made a noise that sounded like the hock of a wild goose. I knew what was the matter. I sprang up as quickly as my rheumatism would allow, without even waiting to take the roast spare-rib out of my mouth, and commenced pounding him in the back. I whaled away with all my might, but it did no good. I jerked him, and rubbed his throat and twisted his head, first one way then the other, but he couldn't catch his breath. Oh, he was blacker'n Elder Nutt's best coat!

As soon as Sister Bodkin said, "Doctor, he's choked," the doctor ran like mad to the pantry and got a fresh egg and broke it, and made father swallow it.

The white of the egg seemed to catch round the fish-bone, and it removed it instantly. He soon felt well enough to resume his story.

Sister Bodkin says she has known cases of severe choking relieved by this means; one case where a man had a peach seed in his throat. I hope mothers will not forget this. If once trying don't remove the obstacle, try again. Nothing but the white of the egg is needed, however.

At this season of the year, Float is a nutritious and healthful dessert, just while everybody has plenty of fresh eggs and cream and good milk. There are many ways of making it, all of which are good. If your children like it, let them have it—I mean your big boys, too; and if you don't know the best ways of making it, ask some of your neighbors' girls who do. Brother Rube's Mattie makes it often, and he says: "I tell you, Pipesey, it is most wretched good!"

I call that violent praise.

I wish husbands praised their wives more than they do. If they only knew how precious every little thank was, they wouldn't be so chary of them, Oh, I have seen wives who would cheerfully toil until they were exhausted, and feel richly rewarded if their husbands would only say: "You are very kind;" or, "How very thoughtful you are;" or, "I thank you, dear."

I've seen gruff, lordly husbands that I just longed to shake as I would a mealy sack—men who would eat to repletion, and gorge and guzzle, and then go snarling off from the table and dump down as glum as the boa constrictor did after swallowing his blanket. How easy to have remarked, "How good your bread is!" or, "What delicious tea!" or, "My! what a wife for such an unworthy fellow!"

Weak words of praise they would have been to put new life into the tired little mortal, and would have cost nothing at all.

I guess there is nothing that makes a woman handsomer or happier than to be loved. I don't know much about these things; I only surmise.

I do remember, though, when I was young, and Professor O. Howe Greene was my escort to singing schools, and I thought he loved me—why I walked as though I was set on casters! I hardly felt the mundane sphere beneath my feet. It was a bright face that looked out of the mirror upon me as I stood chattering in the cold, intent on making little curls on my forehead and temples. The kind he liked.

I will have to tell it right here! How much I am amused! I find myself smiling unconsciously all this morning. A man trying to tell how a bride was dressed!

The brother who came home from California on a visit was married last night; he had been engaged to his faithful little Maggie for twelve years; he will return next week, and she will go to him in a year or so. They will settle in Santa Barbara, on the coast, a little gem of a city where summer breezes blow all the year; then if my catarrh and asthma still abide with me I am going to live with them.

The ceremony was performed at the parsonage, very quietly, none of us being present but Rube. Just before bed-time, Rube came rushing in, bowing and saying: "Ladies, Philander Gibbs is no more!"

Ida sat him a chair and took his hat, and composed herself on the lounge, saying: "Young man, divulge. Tell us what the bride wore."

"She wore a dress," said he.

"What color was it?" said Lily.

"Well, let me see," and he looked all round the room; "it was the color of—color of—" and he stared at the ceiling and walls, and peered closely at the figures in the carpet, looked at the picture frames, and stove, and furniture. "I see nothing the color of her dress at all."

"Was it black, or white, or gray, or brown? Strange you didn't notice. A man is so obtuse," said Ida, uneasily.

"Oh, now I know!" and he pounded his knee. "It was a little the color of Griffith's pigeons."

"Was her dress long or short?"

"Well, let me see," and he drew his brows and smoothed down the legs of his pantaloons; "kind o' long and kind o' short, I believe. Yes, I mind now, it was a little short before and strung out and piled up on the floor behind her."

"Did she wear a bow of ribbon or a breastpin, or what?" asked Lily.

"Yes she did," and he nodded.

"Was it a bow of ribbon? What color?"

"Yes, a bow of ribbon, the color of—color of—" and he looked sharply at the stove pipe, and the brown legs of the piano, at the window curtains, the lamp mat, the top shelf of the what-not, the black velvet lining of the writing desk, and then down at the legs of his gray pantaloons, saying: "'Twasn't hardly the color of my breeches—oh, a little the color of that pink place in the rug."

At this both girls laughed aloud, and declared it was no use to ask any man how a bride was dressed.

"What did you say to her after the ceremony, Rube?" said Ida.

"Oh, I walked up as bravely as a sheep and kissed her, and said some very fine things."

"That was all right, the kissing, only it should have been done in behalf of the family at home," said Lily. "But what did you say to her?"

"Oh, I said this is pretty cold weather we're having, and I s'posed we'd have an early spring; and how's the folks at home, and—"

"Oh, Rube, tell the truth," began both girls; but he darted out of the room to go home, saying as he went down the steps:

"So, Philander Gibbs is no more!"

While I think of it, don't forget to set out one or more trees in April. Don't fail to plant a willow in a damp spot, and remember and not put trees too closely together; give them room to grow on all sides. If possible, have one poplar or quaking asp somewhere in sight of the living room. The constant tremor of the leaves is suggestive of cool breezes.

When I die my monument will be the trees I have planted.

Have you any faded calico dresses, girls, that you are tired of; that don't look well only when first put on fresh from the ironing-table? Don't make big aprons of them, or mops, or wash-rags. I'll tell you what to do.

You can bleach them as white as snow, put new hems round the bottoms, neat new bands on them that will just meet and button, and you have good, new skirts.

To bleach them: wash well in hot suds, and boil half an hour; lay them out on the young grass, wetting and turning frequently. If the sun shines out hot, and they lie too long, they will mildew. If the color does not all come out, boil them again, adding the water in which has been dissolved about a handful of chloride of lime.

I have seen some very pretty white dresses, that had once been lawn, dotted with pink, or brown, or purple.

We always bleach lawn dresses, and make skirts of them to wear with thin white dresses.

One of the most charming girl-friends I had in years a-gone, a ripe, sweet, intellectual woman, told me it was the last and the hardest thing for her to learn to keep her house looking so that she wasn't ashamed to have a visitor drop in.

Her mother died while she was young, before her habits as a housekeeper were formed.

One day, when dinner was almost ready, she chanced to look out, and there came her beau riding up the lane toward the house.

Everything was ditty—their scant dinner was quite ready, but she was so scared that herself and her little sister flew at things to try and bring order out of disorder.

A bed stood unmade at the other end of the kitchen. Jenny snatched the boiling tea-kettle and thrust it back under the bed, among old bags and bundles and boxes. Lydia followed her with a spider full of frying meat, which she tucked out of sight.

While Jenny drew down the valance and smoothly spread the heavy coverlet, Lydia snatched the broom and soon filled the kitchen with mingled dust and ashes. They dampened their hands and smoothed their hair, and with flushed faces and glittering eyes, were soon ready to greet the young gentleman.

They had settled down as demure as two old spinsters, when their noisy little twelve-year-old brother Tom came rushing in, saying, "I want my boots; I have to hurry and drive the hogs out of the truck-patch." And he started for the bed, knowing that under it could be found a little of everything.

"They're not there, Tommy," said Jenny, uneasily.

"Oh, I'll bet they're under the bed; most everything's there," said he, stoutly.

The sisters looked at him pleadingly, winking and blinking with mute distress in both faces.

"Never mind, girls, I'll soon find 'em," and he raised the valance and started under, head first. "Jemima! if here isn't the tea-kettle, piping hot!" he hailed out as if his mouth was full of feathers. The girls coughed and fidgetted, and tried to think of something to talk about, but not an idea came.

Again he called out in a muffled voice, "Lordy! there must be a family living in this corner. I saw, if here isn't meat a-fryin' away like sixty, and the spider settin' on an old feather tick! I tell you, Mr. Hamilton, it would make you bug your eyes to get down into these comfortable quarters," and out came Tom, blowing like a porpoise, the spider of meat in one hand, and his old boots in the other.

The girls were disposed to cry, but their good sense prevailed, and they all laughed heartily. Jenny told the young man how it came about, and he said they were silly girls, to be afraid of him.

For the benefit and encouragement of little, new blundering housekeepers, I will add that these girls, Jenny and Lydia, made good, intelligent women and excellent housewives.

THE WRECK.

BY SUDIE.

THE tiny sails, all torn and wet,
From mast and pennant sever—
Upon the jagged rock she drifts,
A shattered wreck forever!
Two pairs of childish eyes look out
From under glistening lashes,
Where just beyond their eager reach,
The treasured plaything dashes.

The sweet winds blow, the waters flow
Soft as a whispered blessing;
The sunshine drops through trembling leaves,
Each childish head carressing.
Oh! little ones, whose cheeks to-night
Will press a tear-stained pillow,
Heaven guard your sails on broader seas,
Where great wrecks strew the billows.

For, oh! the skies are black with wrath,
Sails part, and hawsers sever,
When some sweet hope the dear Lord gave,
Drifts out of life forever.
The wind is fierce, the night is black,
The awful breakers thunder—
We only gaze with stony eyes,
Where something bright went under.

Oh, blessed, when the torn soul drifts
Through storm and wreck and slaughter;
If sweet faith, like a "peace be still,"
Drops o'er the stormy water.
Oh, blessed, if we feel God's love,
Some strength and comfort giving,
When salt seas break above the dream,
That made life worth the living.

Be cheerful always. There is no path but will be easier travelled, no load but will be lighter, no shadow on heart and brain but will lift sooner, in presence of a determined cheerfulness.

RELIGIOUS READING.

CALLING AND LEADING HIS SHEEP.

YOU think if the Good Shepherd were calling you by name and leading you out, the leading would, fail surely, be into other fields and paths than those through which you have of late been passing, or in which, haply, you still are found. You look for peace, and behold trouble. You are very weary, and He appoints you more work. You have sweet companionship, but in one desolating hour He sends you out alone. You know, indeed, that all these things, according to the promise, will work together for your good if you love God. You know this, and try to believe it, but you venture to doubt whether such things as these can ever be put down as symptoms of any special attachment on His part, or indeed as consistent with anything that deserves the name of special love to you. Let me beseech you to be careful here. Walk softly, for we are now within holy ground. Any mistake here on your part will be far-reaching.

If it be that He, the Good Shepherd, deeply considering the things which really make for your peace, taking the long look for you, and providing for a future you cannot see, in the meantime giving you the cross, the thorn, the cup of anguish, in very love—thus making these His love-tokens—then be sure it will be a sad loss to you if you never come to see this; while to him who thus loves, and who is thus requited, it can hardly be less than sorrow and grief of heart. I have seen a shepherd, on a bitter snowy day, gathering all his sheep carefully to the windy side of the hill. The silly creatures, left to themselves, would all take the other side; they would go straight to the most dangerous places, to the sheltered spots where the deep snow-wreaths form silently, in which they would soon find at once a refuge and a grave. On such a day the life of some of the sheep depends on facing the blast. The shepherd would not let the youngest, he would not let the weakest one of the flock, lie down in the shelter. For the very love he bears it, "he calls it by name, and leads it out," or drives, or carries—even in such an hour as that—facing the bitter wind and blinding snow.

Indeed, my brethren, it will come to this, that if we know the love of Christ in a deep and true manner, and if we really believe that it is a personal love to ourselves, we shall not be so apt to distinguish and select certain special modes for its manifestation as alone suitable and proper. One mode will seem to us almost as good as another if it be the one that He selects, and we shall hear the loving voice in the darkness as well as in the light; in the roar of the wintry storm as in the hush of the summer silence. The lover of souls can make trust with His beloved ones, and will keep it anywhere, and almost in any manner. He is, in fact, calling His own by name, and leading them out by means of circumstances of every variety of aspect. Some are being led as into the garden where the roses bloom and the rich fruits hang ripely; and some into the wild, where there seems to be no sustenance. Some are led gently by the soft flowing streams, and under the pleasant shadow of the trees; and some up among the misty mountains or across the stormy billows of the sea, toward unknown shores. What matters it if He be the leader—if He be the guide? You can go into tranquillity, you can go into conflict, you can go up the breazy hills of health, or lay yourself down in the sick chamber—you can stand at the marriage altar, or lie down on the bed of death—if only He calls you by name and leads you out.—The Little Sanctuary.

RESERVE IN PLEASURE.

IF in business, where duty lies, where daily bread is won, there should be moderation and reserve, still more will the true pilgrim and stranger on the earth practice such self-restraint and withholding in pleasure—in pleasure, the unbridled love and quest of which is absolutely fatal to all that is highest and purest in human character. A pleasure-loving soul never can be unselfish, magnanimous, serene, brave, pure. Such qualities come from sources far higher than personal enjoyment. They come from the love of truth, from the practice of duty, from the habit of self-sacrifice, from seriousness, reflection, prayer. The love of pleasure cannot give these things, but the love and pursuit of pleasure can take them away; will certainly much diminish their strength, and put them all in peril. It is therefore one of the Christian's daily lessons to teach himself effectually how to "use this world as not abusing it;" i. e., how to extract from present things all fair and honest enjoyment, without allowing selfishness and mere appetite so to touch and transmute them in the process that the enjoyment shall have in it some admixture of baser elements, and be no longer the thing which the Divine beneficence provides for man's hunger and thirst.

Here have we the true answer to any such superficial formula as, "Surely pleasure is lawful." Lawful? Understood in the better sense, it is far more than lawful. It is inevitable. God has filled the world with it. Those who live well and wisely cannot miss it. It lies in the heart of all beauty. It hovers around every mountain, and murmurs in every stream. 'Tis like the sunshine of a summer day; you cannot look without seeing it, and all things by its means. But this lower, this simply sensual thing which men call pleasure, which is sought so eagerly by multitudes, and which is so abundantly provided, to satiate depraved and inordinate appetite, to stimulate jaded sensibilities, to kill time—how can it but kill the soul also, or at any rate the soul's best and purest life?

So, too, there need be no conflict as to the necessity, we might say for most people the absolute necessity, of some relaxation after, or amid, hard work. The bow that is never unstrung will the sooner lose the power to effectuate and fulfil the perfect aim of the marksman. The ideal human life is a beautiful compound of many things, each in good relations with all the rest, each set in its own just limits, and so bound by the same as to have no legitimate right to overflow and possess the neighboring and interpenetrating spheres. Faith is not so to possess a man that he cannot use his present senses. Seriousness is not to blot out the gleams of sunshine, and change all the sky into leaden gray. Well, but is not the principle of a just limitation and reserve equally applicable on the other side of things, where certainly the greater danger lies? The question comes to be one of degree and measure. It will practically take this form: How often? How much? How far? Ought there not to be some reserve even in lawful, even in necessary things? Ought not the possession of the higher taste, and the inward consciousness of immortal destination, to settle many a little question and controversy almost as soon as they arise? The "stranger in the earth" is being simply true to himself, and without any conscious effort, rises superior to many a vexed and agitated question as to the lawfulness of this, or the propriety of that. The controversy is settled before it begins. There is a foregone conclusion. He cannot be wrong in obeying the Heavenly impulse. He cannot be charged with any neglect of duty in preferring the silent, separated way; in making seriousness, rather than mirth, the mistress of the evening, and thus allowing much that might come to him without any positive guilt to go by, in order that he may preserve unbroken fellowship with serenest joys.—The Little Sanctuary.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

BABIES.

BY ELEANOR KIRK.

"WHAT do you know about babies?" I fancy I hear some inexperienced and very much tired parent exclaim. I do not wonder at all at the question. Every mother has the right to make this inquiry of any one who attempts to advise or enlighten her upon this juvenile subject.

"I have been trying," said a dear little woman the other day, holding a fretful infant with one hand and with the other turning the leaves of a huge volume, "to see what this authority"—mentioning an M.D. of considerable note—"has to say on the subject of babies; but I am disappointed, as usual, and have about made up my mind that everybody who has ever written on this topic has been either a bachelor or an idiot."

I examined the roughly-criticised book, and found—as may be imagined—not at all what she had led me to expect. It was a work for thoroughly drilled physiologists, well written, profound, and as scientific as a professed scientist could make it; but to this tired, perplexed young mother it was the veriest stuff. What more could have been expected? This wife and parent had, only two years before, graduated from a first-class ladies' institute, with a diploma setting forth in the strongest terms the astonishing progress she had made in her studies. She could speak French with an accent truly Parisian, charm the lovers of music with the wonderful brilliance and expression of her pianoforte performances. She could dance well and sing well; in short, could the programme her parents and teachers marked out for her have been the route she was to take through her earthly pilgrimage, she would probably have kept, as at school, at the head of her class; but love, that arch disarranger of the best laid plans, that great general disturber of the peace, that great remaker and rectifier, stepped in, and the result was harmony and inharmony; the last, in this case, brought about entirely by an improper education. My friend had been shown the necessity of painstaking and polish, to make sure of some rich and cultured life-partner, and very singularly—for such things seldom happen—and, very fortunately, she had found with this wealth and culture, love of the rarest and most enduring quality. All this had been done with a view to her obtaining a husband, but not the least preparation had been made for the life that should follow; the motto being, as in the majority of instances, "Catch him, and let the future take care of itself."

Now, this mother wanted to know why her baby cried a large part of the night, and moaned and fretted the greater portion of the day. She wanted to know why the little creature was not able to properly digest its food; and she desired this information in plain, simple terms, and in the work she had examined she had found neither information nor comfort. Now, I have had some experience with babies, and I could well sympathize with this exhausted woman, whose life was entirely given up to nursing this tiny bundle of flesh and blood. Trot, trot, trot, went the poor little baby on the poor tired little knee. "Hum, hum, sh, sh, there, there, hum, hum," up and down, back and forth, occasionally interpolating this jargon with a word or two to me. I had been invited to spend the day with my friend, and must confess I did not look forward with much pleasure to the visit.

"Why don't you let the nurse take him?" I ventured to inquire, after witnessing this distressing performance as long as my nerves would stand it.

"Nurse!" she repeated, in a disgusted, impatient sort of way. "She wouldn't stir a limb or move a muscle if the baby screamed itself to death."

I thought, perhaps, that the nurse knew more than the mother, but scarcely dared make the suggestion just then.

"Does he cry like this all the time?" was my next query, hoping to lead the conversation into a channel where I could, without appearing to be inquisitive, get at something like a history of the case.

"Nearly all the time," she replied. "I hain't known a decent night's rest since he was born, three months ago."

"Will you let me take him a moment?" I asked. "Perhaps, being fresh to the business, I may be able to do something for him; at least, I can rest your arms a little, if no more."

So Mr. Baby was transferred to me, and I immediately commenced a critical examination.

"You must have had a great deal of experience with babies," remarked my companion. "Do see if you can tell what ails this one."

There was nothing amiss with the child. It was as healthy a specimen of an American infant as I ever looked at—well proportioned, strong and active as a young colt, with flesh unusually firm, and a pair of lungs that utterly defy my vocabulary. I couldn't say to that mother in plain terms: "There is nothing the matter with your baby; all this fuss and worry is directly traceable to mismanagement." The temptation to blurt out this truth was great; but I have found, after many mistakes, that if one desires to accomplish any real good in this world, we must go to work in all cases very gently. This infant was beautifully dressed in nansook and valenciennes, richly embroidered flannels, and all that sort of thing; and was as faultlessly tidy and sweet as loving hands could make it. Notwithstanding all these advantages of dress and social position, this ungrateful baby would cry. I lifted the little one's elaborately-trimmed skirts, and what should meet my eyes but a "pinning blanket" (an article of infant's wardrobe I had supposed entirely obsolete) so fastened and doubly fastened that the poor child could not get a leg out to save its life.

"What are you doing?" my companion inquired, in wonder.

"Unpinning this thing," I answered. "Just look here! you have pinned this blanket so short that your baby hasn't room to stretch its limbs."

For a moment or more baby stopped crying, and kicked right and left with an evident relish for this description of leg liberty, and then commenced again.

"It isn't that," said my companion, with a sigh.

A cambric skirt covered the above-mentioned relic of barbarism, and both these affairs were made with waists, or bands, and fastened with three pins. It seems as incomprehensible to me now as it did the day I made the discovery, that an ordinarily intelligent woman even should not know that an infant's apparel should always be loosely put on; and here was the child of an usually well-informed and intellectual woman, actually gasping for breath on account of compression caused by tight bands. As I removed the pins the child gradually ceased screaming, and as I removed the last one such a grunt of relief as came from this baby's lips I never heard before or since. I rubbed his little back and sides, all creased with the wretched compressors, and the darling actually cooed with delight.

"There," said his mother; "that's just the way he acts when I give him his bath. I was telling his father this morning that I didn't believe he would ever cry if I could always keep him in the tub, or undressed. Some way he seems to hate to be dressed, and he always screams to the top of his voice just as soon as I begin to put on his clothes."

Now it took me some time to make that mother understand that she did not give her child as much credit for instinct even as her husband gave his Newfoundland pup about the same age: that the baby knew that this liberty of the bath was all he was likely to get, and resisted naturally the idea of such terrible physical bondage. I kept on with the soothing manipulations, and was very soon rewarded by seeing the blue eyes close, and after an exceedingly short space of time my charge was asleep.

"If you don't move just so, you'll waken him," said the mother, in a whisper.

"Hum, hum, sh, sh, there, there," she commenced, coming close to my side.

I took no notice of her "hums" and "shs" and "there's," but laid him gently on the bed, and not a sound was heard from that quarter for three long hours.

"Now," said my friend, making sure that the baby was not likely to waken, "I must have my bowl of tea. Shall I order a cup for you?"

"Tea!" I repeated after her, wonderingly; "what for?"

"Oh!" she answered, "I couldn't nurse my baby without it. Tea braces me up and keeps me going. I shouldn't be good for anything without my bowl of tea three or four times a day."

"If you want to undermine your own health beyond all power of restoration," I couldn't help saying: "If you want to see your child grow up a brainless, sidgetty nobody, keep on swilling tea and you will surely accomplish your purpose."

"Why, for mercy's sake!" was all the astonished woman could gasp, and then continued, timidly: "If I didn't drink something I shouldn't have food enough for my baby, and tea seems to give me strength. The nurse who was with me the first six weeks after baby was born used to make me drink it."

On this point again I found my friend entirely uninformed, with no more conception of the effect of tea upon the nervous system than her baby. I have had occasion a great many times to find fault with the work of certain monthly nurses; but I never felt so much like anathematizing the whole army of professionals as at this particular time. I found upon inquiry that this one had not only dosed her patient with tea, but had really laid the foundation for all the misery she was experiencing.

The proper person, possessing a proper knowledge of her business, arrived at by thorough education, could have so instructed this teachable and intelligent woman in the details of babydom that a mistake would have been next to impossible. This nurse had also insisted upon constantly holding the child, scarcely letting it out of her arms, asleep or awake; cuddling it close at night, and passing it over to the mother every time it cried, taking it for granted that hunger was always the cause of its unrest. She it was—this ignorant woman, who never had had a child of her own—who taught this young mother how to dress her baby, or rather the best method of stopping the circulation of blood; in other words, the speediest manner of putting an end to the little one's life. The only weapon that child had was its voice, and this he made use of indefatigably. So the lungs were used, and made to resist the deadly strain upon them. This infant was an uncommonly strong one. In nine cases out of ten the child would have long before this got through trying to resist, and given it up for a hopeless job; but this baby was born well, inheriting a strong constitution from both sides of the house; so it was quite a difficult matter to kill it.

Well, the upshot of the business was, that after that baby awoke from its long and refreshing sleep, I carefully dressed it, substituting a flannel skirt for the obnoxious pinning blanket, making sure to give it plenty of room to stretch and turn round in. I drew a pair of worsted socks on the chubby pink feet, and the little fellow cooed and laughed during the whole performance. About six o'clock a suspicious-looking vial made its appearance.

"What's that?" I asked.

"Baby's drops," was the answer.

"Pitch them out of the window," said I.

"But," she sighed, "there won't be a particle of peace for any of us without them."

Then issued another bottle, and it took some time to convince her that this Spartan baby did not need paregoric, and anise and morphine, and whatever other stuff goes to make up these disgusting compounds; but I won, and am happy to say that not a drop of anything of the kind has since been presented to the little one's lips.

Now, women who are nursing babies should never drink tea. If I had time I could tell you in plain terms the reasons for this assertion. I do not believe in tea for any one outside the countries where it is raised, and I have no doubt that there it is a national blessing. Americans need no such astringents, no such nerve quickeners. That tea-drinking is one great cause of nervousness among our women I believe every thinking man and woman will agree; and I often wish that our first row with our mother country had been one something worth fighting about, instead of an old tea-chest.

Oatmeal, Indianmeal, gruel and cocoa, or chocolate are the beverages to be partaken of by women who nurse their babies. These insure quality as well as quantity, and made of good rich milk can be freely partaken of. There is no need of an ordinarily healthy woman growing thin because she is nursing. Then, again, infants should be held as little as possible, and trotted and rocked never. Use your baby at once to the bed, or crib, and insist, whatever your nurse may say to the contrary, upon its sleeping alone. Then feed your baby regularly, and disabuse your mind of the impression that it is hungry every time it makes a noise. No woman should nurse her infant oftener than twice in the night, and at six months this should be stopped entirely, in order to guard the mother against the exhaustion which follows inevitably upon the keeping up of this unnatural night drag. Once in two or three hours during the day is also quite often enough. Bear in mind also that your baby wants, and must have, cold water to drink daily. Begin first, and immediately, with a teaspoonful, allowing the child to be its own judge as to the quantity.

Give your babies room enough, and enough to eat of the right kind, good air to breathe and plenty of sunshine, and my word on it you will have no trouble; and mothers can only do this by taking proper care of themselves. The present system of bringing up children is an abomination; but what more can be expected with so little preparation for life and its duties on the part of our women?—Herald of Health.

‘BOYS’ AND GIRLS’ TREASURY.

MOUSIE AND HER BABIES.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

ONE day last summer my father was working out in the fields, moving stumps and stones, so there would be nothing in the way of the plough, and in turning over a bit of a dry stump that lay on the surface of the ground, he uncovered the warm, dry nest of an old mother mouse.

She had six pinky baby mice, nestling around her soft furry body, and just taking their little wee dinner of warm milk. What were they to do? The whole roof was torn off their house when the stump was lifted and turned over, and there they were, with the summer sun beaming right down upon them. Their little bodies were exposed to all kinds of weather, and they were so helpless and young that not one of them knew how to walk two steps without rolling right over upon his back, with his four dainty little toes up in the air.

My father said he stopped forward to put the stump back again, and to leave them as cosy and as happy as he had found them. But the mother mouse, not knowing whether he was a friend or a foe, said in a little, fine, squeaking voice, that could hardly be heard by guess big ears, “Oh, my beautiful little darlings! I will never leave you nor forsake you; take hold of your mother and she will save you.”

Then the six little baby mice understood every word she spoke, and they knew what she meant, and they opened their mouths and took hold just as if they were going to suck, and then the wise little mother started off running in the direction of a pile of rails that lay near the fence.

Papa stood and watched her, and he said it touched his heart in the tenderest place to see in the lowest of God's creation the devotion and the strength of a mother's love.

While she was running as fast as she could with her beloved burden dangling about her feet and legs, and hindering her speed, one of the little ones loosened its hold and fell off.

For an instant the mother paused and looked at it, just as though she was saying, “Why how unfortunate! I don't see how one poor mother can manage so many dear little pink babies; but you, poor Plushy, must not be left behind! you are the weakest and dearest and sweetest baby of all;” and saying this she took it up carefully in her mouth, and with her head up a good deal higher, she trotted on her way, and safely reached the pile of rails. We do hope the brave little mother found a good home and a sure retreat, because she deserved it.

Well, mice are troublesome things, but it would be a very hard-hearted man or boy who could kill one under such circumstances as these were.

In connection with such stories, those fine old lines from the “Ancient Mariner” come sweeping up to me with such force and tenderness that I look through a mist of tears upon the page before me:

“He prayeth best who loveth best
All things, both great and small,
For the dear God who loveth us,
He made and loveth all.”

DASH AND THE DOCTOR.

A STORY is told of a fine dog named Dash that is quite wonderful. He had met, poor fellow! with a bad accident. In running across the road, under a wagon, he was not spry enough, and was caught by one of the wheels. A broken leg was the consequence.

Dash's master, who was fond of his dog and pitied him very much, took him to a surgeon, who set the limb and bandaged it so carefully that he could go about on his three legs without disturbing the fractured bone, until it was well and strong as before.

Some months afterward the surgeon was surprised by a visit from Dash, who came to his office door and commenced barking, scratching and howling for admission. As soon as it was opened by a servant, he ran in, and by his strange ways made the doctor understand that he was wanted outside.

On going to the door, what should he find on the step but a forlorn-looking dog with a broken leg, who looked up into his face and whined piteously.

"Poor fellow!" said the surgeon, kindly, for he understood it all in a moment, and was touched by the incident.

Dash wagged his tail rapidly, danced about, whined and by all the ways he knew asked the doctor to help his unhappy friend as he had helped him,

"Poor fellow!" repeated the surgeon; "come along in, and I'll see what can be done for you;" and he led the way into his office, Dash and his limping companion following.

As carefully as if he were attending to a human limb did the good surgeon set the bone and bandage the leg; and when it was over the two dogs left his house together, wagging their tails, Dash showing his delight by capering and barking like a half-crazy fellow.

Young and old cannot but read this incident with a feeling of pleasure, there is in it something so human and full of intelligence beyond which is usually found in dumb animals.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

[Halt's Journal of Health is always sensible and suggestive. We make some selections for this Department from a recent number:]

SWEET BREATH.

Foul breath may be occasioned by a decaying tooth, by dyspepsia, or it may arise from a scrofulous constitution; in each case a radical cure can be promised only on the removal of the cause. Yet there are times when it may be specially desirable to be free from any odor of an offensive kind; in such cases, have on hand, as a part of the toilet, a two-ounce vial of the concentrated solution of the "chloride of soda." To two tablespoonfuls of water add ten drops of the soda, and rinse the mouth out freely before leaving the house. Take a mouthful and keep it in for two or three minutes, and repeat.

If there are ill-smelling feet or odor from under the arm, take some of the same preparation in the hollow of the hand, and rub it well into the skin of the parts; if none at hand, use spirits of camphor or camphor-water. But persons who have ill-smelling feet should wash them well every night with soap and warm water.

TAKING COLD.

IN going from a warm room in the cold of out-doors, especially if there is a raw, damp wind, wrap up, button up, and draw on the gloves before opening the door, then keep the mouth resolutely closed so as to cause the air to pass through the nose, and the long circuit through the head, thus warming it before it reaches the lungs. Public speakers are especially enjoined to take this precaution; many a valuable life has been lost from inattention to this point.

Never stand at the crack of a door in winter for "last words;" in cold weather it is better far to send a servant to the door with your guest.

Never allow the family to come into the breakfast-room of a winter morning until it is heated to sixty-five degrees, especially if the children have to wash and dress in a room without fire. No one ought ever to eat in a chill. If, in sitting down to a meal, you are cold or very tired, take some hot soup or hot drink of some kind, and then wait a few minutes, or eat very slowly at the beginning of the meal.

In coming home, and not expecting to go out again for the day, draw off the shoes and stockings, hold the naked feet to a blazing fire, rubbing them well with the hands until most thoroughly warm and dry, then draw on a pair of dry socks or stocking, and put the feet into soft, warm slippers; there will be a comfort in this which will richly repay the trouble of the procedure.

If you purpose remaining in a room half an hour as a caller, do not lay aside the overcoat or shoes, even if the atmosphere of the apartment seems oppressive; it is always cooler than it seems to be, and it is better to go out of doors a little too warm than on the verge of a chill.

If you have to walk and ride on a cold day, do the riding first, and then warm yourself up by a walk; for, if you get warm in walking, and sit still in a cold vehicle, with the chance of some one opening a window, you will inevitably cool off too rapidly, endangering a chill, a bad cold or an attack of pneumonia or inflammation of the lungs.

Never open a window on entering a vehicle; it is an impertinence of which no gentleman or lady could possibly be guilty; if the apartment is too warm, or too confined for you, those who have been sitting still are quite cool enough already, and there is no reason why you should discompose half a dozen or more persons for your own accommodation. Under the circumstances, it is the essence of selfishness to ask permission to open a window, for cultivated persons would risk a personal injury rather than seem boorish by a refusal.

If it is cold enough to freeze outside, it is safer to keep the outer windows of the chamber closed, and to keep an inner door and fireplace open.

BARE LIMBS

OF children gratify the vanity of mothers, but they send multitudes of beautiful children to a premature grave. It would be safer to have the arms, hands, feet and legs warmly encased in double thickness of woollen flannel, with nothing whatever on the body but a common night-gown, in the fall of the year. It is especially important to keep the extremities of children and infants warm for every second of their existence. Whether a child is sick or well, when the hands and feet begin to get cold, it is nearing the grave, because the blood retreats to the inner organs, oppresses them, causing painful and dangerous congestions and inflammations, which often induce death in a few hours, as in croup, diphtheria, quinsy, and the like. A young mother should never go to bed until she has noticed that the feet of her little sleeping ones are abundantly warm; to be assured of that is to know that croup before the morning is impossible.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

TO TAKE GREASE OUT OF A FLOOR OR TABLE.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I wish to say to Pipsiway Potts that if she is so unfortunate as to get any more grease on her floor or table, to apply directly potter's clay, just wet with water so as to form a stiff paste. Spread it pretty thick upon the grease spot, and lay a thin paper over to keep it from being rubbed off. After twenty-four hours scrape it off and spread on fresh clay. It will gradually absorb the grease and leave the floor or table clean; but it may need to be renewed several times. When the clay looks clean, wash off with soap and water. If there is a pottery within reach it is well to pick up broken bits of the clay and keep them on hand for this purpose. The clay is also good to take grease from clothing applied in the same way."

DR. BELLOW'S IDEAL LOAF.—Dr. Bellows, in his work, "Philosophy of Eating," gives what he considers the true method: "My 'ideal loaf' is made from wheat perfectly fair, and free from smut or other disease, not having been wet or molded before or after grinding, carefully kept clean after being properly ground, so as to need no sifting; and not being bolted it retains every part that belongs to it, needing no addition except cold water."

TO MAKE GEMS.—See that your oven is hot enough to bake potatoes, and that your small oblong iron or tin pans are hot and greased with olive oil. Now mix wheat meal or Graham flour with cold water, or milk and water, if preferred, to the consistency of corn-bread batter with the greatest possible rapidity, and put instantly into the pans and bake twenty-five or thirty minutes. Success depends upon the speed of the whole process. Gems may be eaten while warm, but not while hot enough to melt butter.

APPLE-BREAD RECIPE.—Weigh one pound of fresh, juicy apples, peel, core and stew them to a pulp, being careful to use a porcelain kettle or a stone jar, placed inside an ordinary saucepan of boiling water; otherwise the fruit will become discolored; mix the pulp with two pounds of the best flour; put in the same quantity of yeast you would use for common bread, and as much water as will make it a fine, smooth dough; put into an iron pan and place it in a warm place to rise, and let it remain for twelve hours, at least. Form it into rather long-shaped loaves, and bake in a quick oven.

CORN-MEAL BREAKFAST CAKE.—For two baking tins, take one and a half pints of coarsely ground corn meal. Add water nearly boiling, but not enough to wet quite all of the corn meal; add cold water, a little at a time, stirring thoroughly between whiles, until you have it so thin that it has a tendency to settle as you pour it into your pie-tins. It should not be more than half an inch deep in the tins; and it should bake quickly in a hot oven.

MUSH MUFFINS.—Make mush as you ordinarily do, and when cold, thin it with one quart of milk, and stir in a few handfuls of wheat flour, seven eggs, and butter the size of an egg. Also some salt. Bake in rings.

JOHNNY CAKE.—One quart of sour milk, one half cup of sugar, half cup of butter, three eggs, meal to make a thin batter, one teaspoonful of soda. If eggs are scarce two will do nearly as well.

A PINCH of red pepper, the size of your fingernail, put into meat or vegetables when first beginning to cook, will aid greatly in killing the unpleasant odor arising therefrom. Remember this for boiled cabbage, green beans, onions, chickens, mutton, etc.

IRON MOULD IN LINEN.—Wash the spots in a strong solution of cream of tartar and water. Repeat if necessary, and dry in the sun.

Another method: Rub the spots with a little powdered oxalic acid or salts of lemon and warm water. Let it remain a few minutes, and then rinse well in clean water.

TO JAPAN OLD TEA-TRAYS.—First clean them thoroughly with soap and water and a little rottenstone; then dry them by wiping and exposure at the fire. Now get some good copal varnish, mix it with some bronze powder, and apply with a brush to the denuded parts. After which set the tray in an oven at a heat of from 212 to 300 degrees until the varnish is dry. Two coats will make it equal to new.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

WE'VE GROWN OLD TOGETHER.

SELL Billy! No, loosen the bridle;
 Unfetter the gallant old steed,
 His eye has grown dim and uncertain,
 Forgotten his olden-time speed;
 But memory haloes him over
 With thoughts that are sacredly dear;
 So I pledge him no longer to labor,
 And hallow that pledge with a tear.

Swift thought, glancing back past the shadows,
 Speaks first of that long-vanished day
 He stood all so patiently waiting
 By the "meeting-house" over the way,
 While I held a hand at the altar,
 And vows were recorded on high,
 Till the angels bent earthward to murmur:
 "Yours, yours for the ever and aye."

Oh! the air was all throbbing with music,
 And sunshine was gilding the way,
 When he sped with my bride to the cottage—
 Our home from that glad nuptial day.
 His step had the antelope's fleetness,
 The grace of the gentle gazelle,
 As he passed the fresh mead and the mountain,
 Toward the cottage we both loved so well.

But, Billy, time passed, and its changes
 Brought changes to you and to me;
 For sorrow sent tears to the farm-house,
 Like waves overspreading the sea.
 And, Billy, we two were grown older,
 My head was well threaded with gray,
 When you waited so solemn and silent
 By the meeting-house over the way.

A hearse stood in waiting beside you;
 A dirge floated out on the air;
 And tears trickled silently downward,
 While sobs choked the accents of prayer;
 And the bell in the old church-steeple
 Kept mournfully telling the tale;
 And the winds, floating tenderly outward,
 Bore softly the piteous wail.

Just there, where we stood at the altar,
 So happy in days long ago,
 The coffin was draped in the symbols
 Which typify bitterest woe.
 With her meek hands silently folded,
 Her sightless orbs shaded from view,
 With the pallor so still on her forehead,
 A coldness so strange on her brow,

They placed her beside that same altar,
 But this time all silent and lone,
 And they called her an angel in Heaven,
 Where sorrow may never be known.
 Then out from the door of the chapel
 They carried that silent clay,
 You bore it so slow and solemn,
 The sad funeral way.

No, Billy, we've grown old together,
 And you have been faithful and true;
 We've journeyed through gladness and sorrow,
 We'll journey life's pilgrimage through.
 So, buyer, please loosen the bridle,
 Unfetter the gallant old steed;
 And Billy, from hardship and labor,
 I pledge him is ever more freed.

Our Dumb Animals.

OVER AND OVER AGAIN.

OVER and over again,
 No matter which way I turn,
 I always find in the Book of Life
 Some lesson I have to learn.
 I must take my turn at the mill,
 I must grind out the golden grain,
 I must work out my task with a resolute will,
 Over and over again.

We cannot measure the need
 Of even the tiniest flower,
 Nor check the flow of the golden sands
 That run through a single hour;
 But the morning dew must fall,
 And the sun and the summer rain
 Must do their part, and perform it all
 Over and over again.

Over and over again
 The brook through the meadow flows,
 And over and over again
 The ponderous windmill goes.
 Once doing will not suffice,
 Though doing be not in vain;
 And a blessing falling us once or twice
 May come if we try again.

The path that has once been trod
 Is never so rough to the feet;
 And the lesson we once have learned
 Is never so hard to repeat.
 Though sorrowful tears must fall,
 And the heart to the depths be driven
 With storm and tempest, we need them all
 To render us meet for Heaven.

A LESSON FROM THE LEAVES.

BROWN leaves, that with aerial grace
 Slip from your branch like birds a-wing,
 Each leaving in the appointed place
 Its bud of future spring;

If we, God's conscious creatures, know
 But half your faith in our decay,
 We should not tremble as we do
 When summon'd clay to clay.

But with an equal patience sweet
 We should put off this mortal gear,
 In whatsoever now form is meet
 Content to reappear.

WAITING.

SITTING at the Heavenly portal
 Waits she, day and night;
 Seeking from the tender Father
 Health, and strength, and light.

Seasons coming, seasons going,
 Find her waiting there;
 Year on year, successive rolling,
 Hears the earnest prayer—

"Grant me, oh, thou gracious Parent," Pleads she day by day,
 "Health and power once more to serve Thee,
 On my homeward way.

"Gladly would I lay before Thee
 Deeds of active love;
 Thus by service toward Thy children,
 Love to Thee would prove.

"Yet, if weakness still enthral me,
 Give me Heavenly light;
 Through the paths of lowliest duty
 Guide my steps aright.

"Let me not despise the mission,
 Gentle words to speak;
 Pity offering to the fallen—
 Comfort to the weak.

"Slighting not the humblest power
 Kindly lent me still,
 Like the starlight and the dewdrop,
 I would do Thy will.

"Thus may dust and ashes praise Thee
 Till new vigor come,
 Or this frame, its hold releasing,
 Send my spirit home."

So she sitteth, watching, praying,
 At the Heavenly gate,
 Knowing that the good All-Father
 Blesseth those who wait.

BABY'S DRAWER.

THERE'S a little drawer in my chamber,
 Guarded with tender care,
 Where the dainty clothes are lying
 That my darling shall never wear;
 And there, while the hours are waning,
 Till the house is all at rest, sit, and fancy a baby
 Close to my aching breast.

My darling's pretty white garments,
 I wrought them while sitting apart,
 While his mystic life was throbbing
 Under my throbbing heart;
 And often my happy dreaming
 Breaks in a little song,
 Like the murmur of birds at brooding,
 When the days are warm and long.

I finished the dainty wardrobe,
 And the drawer was almost full
 With robes of the finest muslin,
 And robes of the whitest wool.

I folded them all together,
 With a rose for every pair,
 Smiling, and saying, "Gem fragrant,
 Fit for my prince to wear."

Ah! the radiant summer morning,
 So full of a mother's joy!
 "Thank God! he is fair and perfect,
 My beautiful new-born boy."
 Let him wear the pretty white garments
 I wrought while sitting apart—
 Lay him, so sweet and helpless,
 There, close to my throbbing heart.

Many and many an evening
 I sit since my baby came,
 Saying, "What do the angels call him?"
 For he died without a name;
 Sit while the hours are waning,
 And the house is all at rest,
 And fancy a baby nestling
 Close to my aching breast.

THE ANGEL OF PATIENCE.

BESIDE the toilsome way
 Lonely and dark, by fruits and flowers unblest,
 Which my worn feet tread sadly day by day,
 Longing in vain for rest

An angel softly walks,
 With pale, sweet face, and eyes cast meekly down,
 The while from withered leaves and flowerless stalks
 She weaves my fitting crown.

A sweet and patient grace,
 A look of firm endurance true and tried,
 Of suffering meekly borne, rests on her face
 So pure—so glorified.

And when my fainting heart
 Desponds and murmurs at its adverse fate,
 Then quietly the angel's bright lips part,
 Murmuring softly, "Wait!"

"Patience"—she sweetly saith—
 "The Father's mercies never come too late;
 Gird thee with patient strength, and trusting faith,
 And firm endurance—wait."

Angel! behold, I wait,
 Wearing the thorny crown through all life's hours—
 Wait, till Thy hand shall ope the eternal gate,
 And change the thorns to flowers!

LIFTED OVER.

BY HELEN HUNT.

A S tender mothers, guiding baby steps,
 When places come at which the tiny feet
 Would trip, lift up the little ones in arms
 Of love, and set them down beyond the harm,
 So did our Father watch the precious boy,
 Led o'er the stones by me, who stumbled oft Myself, but strove to help my darling on;
 He saw the sweet limbs faltering, and saw
 Rough ways before us, where my arms would fail;
 So reached from Heaven, and lifting the dear child,
 Who smiled in leaving me, He put him down
 Beyond all hurt, beyond my sight, and bade
 Him wait for me! Shall I not then be glad?
 And, thanking God, press on to overtake?

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Regeneration. By Edmund H. Sears. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger.

Foregleams and Foreshadows of Immortality. By Edmund H. Sears. New Editions, Revised and greatly Enlarged. Philadelphia: Claxton, Remsen & Haffelfinger. New editions of two thoughtful and earnest books by the author of "The Fourth Gospel; or, The Heart of Christ;" a volume which has recently attracted more attention from advanced Christian thinkers than any issue of the press for a long time. The style of Mr. Sears is peculiarly attractive. He writes with great clearness and beauty of diction, and with a fervor and earnestness that commands the reader's attention. His volume on "Regeneration" is one of the profoundest and most exhaustive treatises on that subject extant. The way in which he unfolds the laws of our inner life in the orderly processes of spiritual development, will be a revelation to most of those who read it for the first time.

Speaking of "Foregleams and Foreshadows of Immortality," a religious cotemporary says:

"It will stand as a lovely classic in sacred literature, and a beautiful inspiration of pure devotional feeling. * * * The best test of merit of a book is when we feel we have been made better by reading it; and while the one before us widens the field of intellectual vision, and makes solid and substantial the bridge from time to eternity, it quickens the conscience in its sense of duty, and softens the heart with a tender and more celestial love."

It was of this volume, on its first appearance some years ago, that Mrs. Browning wrote (to a friend in America from whom she had received a copy): "Few books have pleased me so much as 'Foregleams of Immortality.' It is full of truth and beauty."

Of Mr. Sears' latest book, "The Fourth Gospel, or, The Heart of Christ," which, as we have said, has attracted so much attention from thoughtful Christian readers, the Congregationalist remarks: "It is a book of extraordinary interest, * * * instructive and suggestive in the highest ranges of Christian thought and feeling."

The Church and State says: "As a work of literary art it has great merit; and its clear, rich and vivid style carries in its flow great wealth of thought and learning with cumulative power to the end."

The New York Independent says: "It is a long time since an American treatise on theology has produced any marked effect upon religious thought. * * * But the book of Dr. Edmund H. Sears, entitled 'The Heart of Christ,' is destined, we believe, to exert a powerful influence upon the opinions of thinking men in all branches of the church."

The Christian Union has this comment on the book: "Those who hold to a real tripersonal Trinity, will not accept all the results of Dr. Sears. But all who believe in the supreme Divinity of Jesus Christ, in the regeneration of fallen man by the divine influence, and in the inspiration and authority of the Gospels and other New Testament writings, will regard his work as one of peculiar power and value. In spirit it is heavenly and full of vital energy; in style it is beautiful and finished. * * * No one, of any denomination, can read it without feeling its quickening power, confirming his faith in the Gospel, and leading him into higher fellowship with the Son of God."

We have made these quotations in order to give such of our readers as are not familiar with the writings of Dr. Sears an idea of their character, and the impression they are making on the religious thought of the country.

The Garden of Eden. By George Yeager, A.M. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. There is a large and increasing number of good Christian men and women who cannot find in a large part of Old Testament Scripture anything spiritual or helpful to the soul seeking conjunction with God. They find its literal sense often contradictory; often opposed to reason and science; often of doubtful morality. It is no uncommon thing to hear devoted church people say: "I have given up reading portions of the Old Testament. I cannot reconcile them with reason and humanity. They trouble me; and so I let them alone."

And yet, if Paul be right, "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; that the man of God may be perfected, thoroughly furnished in all good works." So it has become a question whether to ignore parts of the Word of God, or seek to explore them—as the man of science explores God's book of nature—for hidden and deeper meanings.

Swedenborg declares that all Scripture has two distinct senses—a natural and a spiritual sense; that the two senses hold to each other an exact symbolical relation, and that it is by virtue of the spiritual or divine sense that the Bible is the Word of God.

This little book, which consists of a series of conversations between a mother and her children, is an effort to explain what is signified in the inner sense, by "The Garden of Eden," and the four rivers that went out therefrom. The writer seems deeply imbued with a spirit of reverence for divine things, and no one whose mind is open to spiritual influences can fail to read his book with interest and profit, even though he may not be able to accept all that he sets forth. We give the opening sentences, to show the drift of thought and exposition.

"Mother, where was Eden?" asked Alice Harland.

"In the heart, my dear."

"I thought it was a beautiful garden, with trees and flowers, and birds, and gentle lambs, and rivers. But how can the heart hold all these?"

"It may be very large; our Heavenly Father can make it so."

"But how can Eden be in the heart?"

"Eden, my dear, means love—God's love in the heart."

"And what are the trees, and rivers, and animals?"

"These are all emblems or symbols of the thoughts and affections which the Lord plants in the heart when we love Him above all. When we read what the Bible says about a garden, we can tell what kind of people our first parents were."

"How? How can we tell?"

"By the things that were in the garden."

The Miracles of Faith. A Sketch of the Life of Beate Paulus. By Mary Weltbrecht, with an Introduction by Rev. Charles S. Robinson, D.D., of New York. New York: Dodd & Mead. This is the brief memoir of a poor, trustful pastor's wife, who lived on the borders of the Black Forest, Germany, and who believed literally in God's promise to answer prayer. The narrative is full of interest and instruction. "There never will be," says Mr. Robinson in his introduction to this little book, "a deeper mystery in this world than that involved in the simplest and first exercise of prayer. How the eternal God can seem to leave anything whatsoever contingent on the requests of his creatures, passes philosophy. And that He goes so far in His offer as to say plainly ASK and WILL, is full of unutterable meaning. Now if one may gird up his faith, and rest assured that any petition he puts up is surely going to be answered, there seems little left to be desired for him."

Little left surely. But let him who asks remember that further saying of our Lord: "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss."

Little Hodge. By the author of "Ginx's Baby." New York: Dodd & Mead. This is a witty, a satirical and a pathetic book. It shows up the unfortunate state of the English poor, and at the same time incidentally points out the inconsistency and absurdities of the poor laws of England. It points out means by which the condition of the English laborer can be improved. Prominent among these means he indicates colonization of the surplus population. The one blemish of the book is an American, which is introduced in its pages, and which is more like the conventional stage Yankee than like real life. Mr. Jenkins, the author, ought to have known better than to introduce such a character, as he was not only born in Canada, but has spent a considerable portion of his life in the States.

Wonders of Sculpture. By Louis Viardot. New York: Scribner, Armstrong & Co. A wonderfully entertaining book, which will supply to the reader a general and fundamental knowledge of the art of sculpture from its infancy. It reviews the evidences of the art remaining to us in ruins dating back to pre-historic times, and gives a brief yet comprehensive review of its progress down to the present day. The book is illustrated by numerous engravings.

Kentucky's Love; or, Roughing it Around Paris. By Edward King, author of "My Paris." Boston: Lee & Shepard. A book which, with a certain brilliancy and originality of style, weaves into a graphic description of the siege of Paris, a personal romance. Its oddities may prove an attraction to some readers, though we are inclined to view them rather as drawbacks to its interest.

Potter's Complete Bible Encyclopædia. Edited by Rev. William Blackwood, D.D., LL.D., author of "Blackwood's Comprehensive Aids to the Study of the Holy Bible," etc. Philadelphia: John E. Potter & Co. We have received the first four numbers of this new work. It is eminently satisfactory in appearance, and this satisfaction is increased rather than diminished by examination. This Encyclopædia is intended to include everything usually found in a Bible dictionary, and will also embrace all available information on historical and ecclesiastical points touched upon in the Bible. The articles appear in alphabetical order. While they will be full in information and faithful in statement, they will avoid all expression of personal or sectarian opinions and prejudices. By this means the work will be adapted to the use of all classes of readers. It will be a book containing an inexhaustible fund of information for the family; and will also be an invaluable text-book for the student and the literary worker. This Encyclopædia has been prepared with great care and with unlimited expense. Its publishers tell us that "nearly three thousand first-class engravings are in course of preparation, illustrative of manners and customs, rites and ceremonies, architecture, furniture and decoration of churches and temples, antiquities monumental and other remains, useful and fine arts, cities and towns, mountains, hills and valleys, rivers, lakes and seas, landscapes, etc. Many of the geographical and topographical illustrations are from photographs, while those of sculpture, paintings, and similar subjects, are mainly from the originals."

This Encyclopædia is to be issued in semi-monthly parts, at fifty cents each.

The Great Events of History, from the Creation of Man till the Present Time. By Wm. Francis Collier, LL.D., Trinity College, Dublin. Edited by an Experienced American Teacher. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co. This book gives briefly and concisely the salient points in the world's history—points which should be remembered by every one, but which, when crowded in among matters of less importance, are often overlooked, or soon forgotten. The book is intended specially to be used as a text-book in schools, but will be found a valuable addition in a library of reference, or as a source of information to the general reader.

Manual of Land Surveying, with Tables. By David Murray, A.M., Ph.D., Professor of Mathematics in Rutgers College. New York: J. W. Schermerhorn & Co. This book, the author tells us in his preface, "will be found to be simply a treatise on land surveying, accompanied with such practical directions and tables, as the experience of American surveyors has shown to be most useful. The methods and instruments described are mainly those which prevail in American practice, and which have been found best adapted to the peculiar wants of this country."

The Treasure of the Seas. By Prof. James de Mille. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is the sixth and last volume of the "B. O. W. C." series of story-books for boys, a series which has proved intensely interesting to its youthful readers.

Cross and Crescent; or, Young America in Turkey and Greece. A Story of Travel and Adventure. By William T. Adams (Oliver Optic). Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is the third volume of the second series of "Young America Abroad." It takes the young travellers through Turkey and Greece, giving an outline of the history of each of these countries, describing its form of government, and the manners and customs of its people, its principal cities, and other objects of interest.

The Drawing-Room Stage. By George M. Baker. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This book contains a series of original dramas, comedies and farces, intended for the use of amateur actors, and prepared with special reference to the exigencies and requirements of school exhibitions and the drawing-room stage.

Social Charades and Parlor Operas. By M. T. Cador. Boston: Lee & Shepard. This is a book similar in character to the above, and equally capable of contributing to amusement in social circles.

Beechwood. A Novel. By Rebecca Ruter Springer. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. A story of higher and purer feeling than is usually to be met with, and marked by a tender, religious sentiment. It is the work of a chastened but cheerful spirit, and cannot be read without impressing the mind with a sense of life's nobler duties and privileges.

We find scattered through the volume a number of poems of more than ordinary grace and beauty. Here is one:

"So weary. All the livelong day
I've struggled o'er the toilsome way;
And now, when evening shades steal on,
Weary and sad I stand alone,
With cold hands to my hot brow press'd,
, And sadly cry, 'Is there no rest?'"

"Along the way my feet have trod
There rest, 'neath many a verdant sod,
The forms I've loved, the hands I've press'd,
The lips that I've so oft carress'd;
Whilst I, alas! must still press on,
Nor even by their graves kneel down!"

"Yet, this I know, that far away
There is a clime of beautiful day,
Beyond the toil, beyond the stream,
Beyond life's weary, fleeting dream,
Where—oh, that I may be so blest!—
'He giveth his beloved rest!'"

The True History of Joshua Davidson, Communist. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co. A book out of the common order, and one to set men thinking. The writer, evidently no new hand at literary work, gives us the history of his hero, a poor, uneducated English carpenter, an evident parallel to the history of Christ, substituting events in modern society for those of Gospel history. It is not surprising to those who read this history of Joshua Davidson that he was rejected, cast out and put to death. Yet few who read it will lay aside the book without a deep, if not a painful conviction that the Christianity of to day is very far from being the Christianity that our Lord came to establish among men. But it is a better Christianity than it was a thousand, or a hundred years ago, and grows better every day. There is hope in this. We give in the present number of the HOMES MAGAZINE a chapter from this remarkable book.

The Science of Health. New York: S. R. Wells. This magazine is edited with a great deal of practical wisdom, and furnishes a large amount of information necessary to the preservation of health. Heads of families will find a year's subscription to The Science of Health one of the best investments they can make.

EDITOR'S DEPARTMENT.

THE REFORMATION OF INEBRIATES.

A GOOD AND GREAT WORK INAUGURATED.

THE question of how to deal with men who have become slaves to strong drink is one of the most difficult of our social problems. To class drunkenness with disease, as some have done, is to ignore moral responsibility; is to assume that there are morbid influences at work stronger than the human will, as in the case of typhus or small-pox. Inebriate asylums, based on the assumption that drunkenness is a disease, where patients are to be treated as if in a hospital, may effect a temporary good, but they cannot do, to any hopeful extent, the work of reformation. They isolate a man for a time, and remove him from contact with allurements; but when he goes back into old associations and stands again face to face with temptation, he is little stronger, as to moral and spiritual power, than before. The effects of disease, so called, have been overcome by treatment. He is well again, as a man restored from fever is well. But, when he returns to society, he is like the fever patient going back into a fever district. He has no immunity from attack.

Now, we must have, in the treatment of drunkenness, something more radical than this. We must go deeper than hospital and asylum work. This work reaches no farther than the physical and moral nature, and can, therefore, be only temporary in its influence. We must awaken the spiritual consciousness, and lead a man, too weak to stand in his own strength, when appetite, held simply in abeyance, springs back upon him again, to trust in God as his only hope, if we would effect a permanent reformation. First, we must help him physically. We must take him out of his debasement, his foulness and discomfort, and surround him with the influences of a home. Must get him clothed and in his right mind, and make him feel once more that he has sympathy—is regarded as a man full of the noblest possibilities—and so be stimulated to personal effort. But this is only preliminary work; such as any hospital and asylum may do. The real work of salvation goes far beyond this; it must be wrought in a higher degree of the soul—even that which we call spiritual. The man must be taught that only in heaven-given strength is there any safety. He must go in his weakness and deep sense of degradation to God as the only one who can surely lift him and set his feet in a safe place. Not taught this as from pulpit or platform; but by earnest, self-denying, sympathetic Christian men and women, standing face to face with the poor, repentant brother, and holding him tightly by the hand lest he stumble and fall in his first weak efforts to walk in a better way.

And this is just the work that is now being done in our city by the "FRANKLIN REFORMATORY HOME FOR INEBRIATES," a heaven-inspired institution, not yet a year old, but with accomplished results that are matters of wonder to all who are familiar with its operations. A few earnest men met together less than a year ago, pondering and planning a better way to save their fallen brothers than any yet adopted. They understood the meaning of the word "home," and felt that no human power to save was stronger than that of an attractive home. So they resolved to organize a home for inebriates that should be, as far as possible, a Christian home. They clearly recognized the fact that to have a healthy and orderly mind, there must be a healthy and orderly body; and so their first care was to have in their home every attainable means of physical comfort.

Trusting in God for the means to do the work to which they felt He had called them, and with only the guaranty of a month's rent by a liberal gentleman of our city, they took a house at No. 911 Locust Street, and opened it on the 1st of April last.

"At the first meeting of directors," says the secretary's report, "provision was made for furnishing 'six beds, with necessary clothing, and six chairs,' also a motion was adopted to provide for the appointment of a 'Board of Fifteen Managers,' consisting of ladies, who subsequently met and organized on the afternoon of April 22d. By the first report, dated April 10th, since the opening, twelve persons had received lodgings and meals, four inmates had been admitted, and were under medical treatment. The Home was now fairly under way; faith had inspired, and hope sustained it; small contributions of money, clothing and furniture began to flow in, and when its directors and managers met in council on the first day of May, its success was fully assured. The power and influence of woman in every high and holy work now became apparent; order and cleanliness reigned in every department; substantial yet simple requisites were procured; befitting adornments gladdened the eye, flowers bloomed upon the hearth and in the garden. The nucleus of a library was formed; the attractiveness and cheerfulness of home were established; above all, prayers were offered and praises sung to God, that He might bless and take under His special care and protection 'The Franklin Home' and its inmates."

From that time everything favored the work. Money and furniture were sent as needed, and poor fallen men came for help, and found a home and friends. The result of ten months' work shows that one hundred and three persons were admitted, desiring to reform. Of these, thirty have given evidence of permanent reformation; the status of seventeen is unknown, and there are forty whose reformation is considered doubtful. Of the whole number received, about one-third were free patients. In regard to the treatment of patients, the secretary says:

"When a man's nerves are unstrung; when his raiment is torn; when he is uncombed and unwashed, you might as well talk to a pillar of stone. If you will take him kindly, gently, and treat him with the same consideration that you would one of your own family; if you will give him remedies calculated to brace his nerves; see that he is cleansed and refreshed; put clean raiment upon him, and bring him to his right mind by rest and nourishing food; then talk with and admonish him; he cannot withstand you; his conscience and heart are reached by attending, first, to his physical necessities. This is, in brief, the treatment of the Home. To forge the chains of love and honor still stronger, public religious services are held in the parlor every Sunday evening, conducted by clergymen of different denominations, assisted by the ladies and gentlemen of the board. The 'Godwin Association' is a distinctive feature of the Home; a strong plank of its platform is the pledge of total abstinence. It is composed of all former and present inmates; it is for mutual protection and defence against the common enemy; it has its watchmen on the towers; if a brother falls, they seek him out and try to save again; if he is poor, they pay for him. Under its auspices, a public temperance meeting is held every Tuesday evening, at which some of the managers are always present. The exercises consist of speeches, essays, recitations and music, of a character suited to the most refined taste. The programme is arranged and participated in by the members."

In February, a large meeting was held at the Academy of Music, for the purpose of bringing this important charity before the public. The statistics, after months' effort, surprised every one. A prominent clergyman, who addressed the meeting, declared that there was not a single church, of the four hundred in our city, that could, in its peculiar work, show results like this.

And now, this great and successful charity asks for larger means, and sends forth an appeal to all who have at heart the salvation of poor fallen humanity. The board of directors have recently purchased the buildings known as the "Newsboys' Home," on very favorable terms, which will enable them to extend and systematize their labors. To place the Franklin Home upon a permanent basis, the sum of $30,000 is required, and we do not believe the appeal made by the board will be in vain, or that this enterprise will be permitted to languish when its record and workings are fully known.

We give below a list of the board of directors, in order that the public may know under what auspices this work is being conducted:

BOARD OF DIRECTORS.

There are, in our country, from six to seven thousand temperance organizations. A small contribution from each of these would give to our "Home" the means of doing a vast amount of good. Will not our Temperance papers bring this matter to their notice? Here is good, solid, legitimate work, in the hands of earnest, practical men and women, who know no such word as fail. We are pleased to learn that a number of societies in this city have contributed liberally. Let their good example be followed.

A PRACTICAL TEST OF WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE.

A GREAT deal has been said on both sides of this question; and its advocates and opponents have waged a war of words for years—the advocates steadily gaining some ground with the people. Three years ago the matter came to a practical test in Wyoming Territory. A law was passed giving women the right of suffrage, and the right to hold office in the Territory, in all respects the same as other electors. Under this law women have been elected and appointed to various offices, and have acted as jurors and justices of the peace.

Now what has been the practical working of this new order of things? A letter recently addressed to J. W. KINGMAN, "Associate Justice United States Supreme Court, Wyoming Territory," by the Woman's Suffrage Association of Pennsylvania, has brought a very explicit answer, and one that will take a great many people by surprise. We had intended only making a few extracts from this remarkable letter; but it is so interesting in its statements, from beginning to end, that we give nearly the whole of it. Judge Kingman says, speaking of the new law and its effects:

"I think there is no one who will deny that it has had a marked influence in elevating our elections, and making them quiet and orderly; and in enabling the courts to punish classes of crime where convictions could not be obtained without their aid.

"For instance—when the Territory was first organized, almost every one carried a loaded revolver on his person; and, as a matter of course, altercations generally resulted in using them. I do not remember a single instance where a jury of men has convicted either party for shooting at each other, even in a crowded room, if no one was killed; or for killing any one, if the victim had been armed. But, with two or three women on the jury, they have never failed to follow the instructions of the court.

"Again, the courts have been nearly powerless, with only men for jurors, in enforcing the laws against drunkenness, gambling, houses of ill-fame, and debauchery in any of its forms. Neither grand nor petit juries could be relied on; but a few women on either panel changed the face of things at once; and from that day this kind of vice has trembled before the law and hidden itself from sight, where formerly it stalked abroad with shameless front and brazen confidence in protection from punishment.

"There are, comparatively, so few women here, and those are so generally kept at home by domestic duties, that the courts have been unable to obtain as many of them for jurors as was desirable. But those who have served have uniformly acquitted themselves with great credit. Not a single verdict of guilty or criminal, has been set aside where women have composed a part of the jury. This has not been the case, by any means, when they have not been present. They have given better attention than the men have to the progress of the trials; have remembered the evidence better; have paid more heed to the charges of the court; have been less influenced by business relations, and outside considerations; and have exhibited a keener conscientiousness in the honest discharge of responsibility. And I have heard of no instance where they have incurred any odium, or ill-will, or want of respect, from having served as jurors. On the contrary, I am quite sure that in every instance they have been more highly respected and more generally appreciated in consequence of it.

"There is one other influence that has grown out of the presence of women in the court-room, both as jurors and as bailiffs, that has been most apparent and welcome—it is the quiet order and decorum, the decent and respectful behavior, the gentlemanly bearing that has always been observed in their presence. The spectators come there better dressed, chew less tobacco and spit less, sit more quietly in their seats, walk more carefully on the floor, talk and whisper less; and, in all respects, the court-room assumes a more dignified and business-like air, and better progress is made in disposing of the matter in hand.

"Certainly, the whole effect on our courts and on our community, resulting from the participation of women in the administration of the laws, has been most beneficial and satisfactory; and it seems to me peculiarly proper that those who suffer most from the commission of crime and the evils of vice, should take part in its suppression and punishment.

"There is another matter in which we have been greatly benefited by this law; and that is, the change it has wrought on election days, and its influence at the polls. Formerly, our elections were scenes of drunken revel and noise; of fighting and riot. But when the women came to vote, they were always treated with the attention and respect everywhere shown to women in the United States. If there was a crowd around the polls, they always gave way when a woman approached, and were silent and orderly while she deposited her vote and went away. If men became intoxicated, they did not remain there where the women would see them. No noisy discussions would arise around the polls, because invariably, when a woman came up, all such conversation would cease. The fact has been that very few people gathered at the polls, and noise and fighting, riot and drunkenness have been entirely unknown there. If men drank too much, as they sometimes did, they remained in the drinking-shops, each political party by itself, and consequently avoided the quarrels and collisions that so often occur, while the people went to the polls and voted as quietly as they go to church. This of itself has been a gain in our community of no small moment.

"At first there was quite a number of women who refused to vote, but at every election that number has grown less, until now very few, if any, fail to exercise the privilege. Many refuse to vote as their husbands do, but I have not heard of any domestic discord or trouble growing out of such a course.

"In conclusion, I wish to say, as broadly and as unqualifiedly as I can express it, that while I have seen a great many advantages and much public good grow out of this change in our laws, I have seen none of the evils or disadvantages so generally apprehended and so warmly denounced by the opponents of the measure."

WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE AND FOUND WANTING.

ALL the signs of the times indicate the coming of a new order of things. The rapidity with which faithless public men, largely trusted by the people, are being brought to judgment, and their guilt made clear as noonday, is something marvellous. Rings and combinations organized for no other end than to aggregate power for the more certain work of plunder, are broken up at a single ponderous stroke of some courageous citizen who drags their iniquity to the light. Buried wrongs are dug up, and their hideous carcasses shown to the aroused and indignant people. Men long trusted, and regarded by the nation as representatives of the highest integrity, are found to be weakly venal, or deliberately corrupt. Everywhere good and true men are feeling a sense of relief. They see the dawning of a better day; the advent of a new era, when public virtue shall be something more than a name.

Such an era is surely advancing upon us. Evil and corruption are not stronger than goodness and virtue, but essentially weaker. Steadily the people are rising to a higher sense of right. The coming generation will take their places, as the receding ones retire; and the shame and disgrace of those trusted public men who have been weighed in the balance and found wanting, will stand out as warnings to all in whom the people confide.

And the people themselves will be more careful in their selection of those to whom great interests are to be intrusted. The old school of corrupt politicians—all of whom have a price—will be set aside, and their places be given to men of known integrity. How long we are yet to be in their hands cannot be told; but their power diminishes every day, and the time is not far distant when the people will thrust them aside—and cast off their names as evil.

MID-DAY LECTURES.

TWENTY-FIVE mid-day lectures on representative historical characters were given in our city during the past winter by Rev. John Lord. When the announcement of these lectures was made, few believed that they would be successful, as the audiences would have to be made up chiefly of women. The result has been very gratifying. Without a single exception, the lectures were fully attended, and the experiment has shown that we have in our great cities, besides the mass of mere pleasure-loving and fashion-devoted women, a large number devoted to higher and nobler things. A similar course was given by Mr. Lord in New York, and with the same gratifying result.

We trust that this is but the beginning of a new era of intellectual culture for our ladies. The success of Mr. Lord's experiment will doubtless bring other lecturers into the field. But they must be something different from the common lecture tribe, or they cannot hope for success. The cultured women who crowded to hear Mr. Lord's brilliant and scholarly lectures will not be caught by their chaff.

THE FUTURE OF SCIENCE.

THE church has been slow to accept the conclusions of science, because these conclusions were not in harmony with revelation as understood by the church. Almost every new truth announced by science has awakened fear and disquietude. Instead of being hailed with pleasure as a victory over error, it has, in too many cases, been resisted long after the evidence in its favor has been made conclusive. "The motion of our planet around the sun," says Lyell, "the shape of the earth, the existence of the antipodes, the vast antiquity of the globe, the distinct assemblages of species of animals and plants by which it was successively inhabited, and lastly, the antiquity and barbarism of primeval man—all these generalizations, when first announced, have been a source of anxiety and unhappiness."

The future of science, as indicated by facts steadily coming to light, give room to conclude that in the book of nature will be found records more than ever out of harmony with Genesis, if taken in its literal sense. But no anxiety should be felt on this account. The Word and the Works of God must be in harmony. Genesis, if it be the Word of God—as we believe it to be—cannot, and does not, when rightly understood, contradict the "testimony of the rocks."

Let the Church, then, take Science by the hand and give her a hearty welcome. She comes also to tell of God and his wonderful works. She is no enemy of religion; no handmaid of skepticism or infidelity. The Book she is trying to interpret is the record God has made of His wisdom and goodness in the outer world of nature. The Bible is another and higher record. It treats of man's spiritual creation; not of a physical earth and material heavens. In its true signification it never contradicts science. Its divine power is on its spiritual side—in its holy inner meanings. And when the Church, abandoning its vain efforts to harmonize its literal sense with the facts of science, gives herself to the higher work of spiritual interpretation, she will enter a new era of Christian life and progress. She will be no longer afraid of science, but, giving her welcome as a servant of the living God, both will magnify His name together.

DON'T LET YOUR LIFE BE A FAILURE.

FEW sadder sentences fall from the lips than this: "My life has been a failure." And the saddest part is, that the failure can rarely if ever be retrieved, because the conviction, to most people, comes too late.—Comes in the feebleness of old age, when the brain is weak, and habit strong; comes after strength for true work and self-discipline is gone. Says Rev. W. H. Murry:

"Society is full of failures that need never have been made; full of men who have never succeeded; full of women who in the first half of their days did nothing but eat and sleep and sipper, and in the last half have done nothing but perpetuate their follies and weaknesses. The world is full, I say, of such people; full of men, in every trade and profession, who do not amount to anything; and I do not speak irreverently, and I trust not without due charity without making due allowance for the inevitable in life, when I say that God and thoughtful men are weary of their presence. Every boy ought to improve on his father; every girl grow into a nobler, gentler, more self-denying womanhood than the mother. No reproduction of former types will give the world the perfect type. I know not where the Millennium is, as measured by distance of time; but I do know, and so do you, that it is a great way off as measured by human growth and expansion. We have no such men and women yet, no age has ever had any, as shall stand on the earth in that age of peace that will not come until men are worthy of it."

Young men!—young women! Don't let your lives be failures. Make the best of what God has given you. Let your gratitude to Him for life and its noble endowments, be expected in a full devotion of will, and thought, and strength, to whatever work He brings in His wise providence to your hands. And remember, that it is only good and useful work that He provides. Shun evil work—work that harms your neighbor in any way, as you would shun the deadliest thing. No true success ever comes from evil work. It may bring a harvest of golden apples, and purple grapes; but the apples will be like those of Sodom, full of bitter ashes, and the grapes sour.

"CAST ADRIFT."

THIS is the title of a new book by the author of "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP," now in the press of J. M. Stoddard & Co., of this city, and to be issued at an early day. "CAST ADRIFT," like the "Man-Trap," is another sorrowful revelation; a lesson and a warning for the people. Dealing with intemperance only as an incident of his theme, the author, in his romance of real life, draws aside the veil that hides the victims of this and other terrible vices, after they have fallen to the lower depths of degradation, where the vilest and most abandoned of society herd together in our city slums more like beasts than men and women, and tells the story of sorrow, suffering, crime and human debasement as it really is in Christian America, with all the earnestness and power that in him lies; yet, with a guardedness of detail and description that must leave the book without objection, even from the most scrupulous.

It will be the same in size and price as "Three Years in a Man-Trap," and be sold only by agents.

HOMESTEADS are sacrificed every day, says the Chicago Tribune to hard drink, but probably for the first time in the history of the liquor traffic it furnishes a homestead to the family of one of its victims. The unique justice has been obtained by a woman of Iowa, who has recovered a homestead worth $1,000 from the dealer who sold her husband the rum that caused his death.

THE SLEEPING BABE.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

SLEEP on, my baby, sleep;
Thy mother's shadow o'er thy head shall hover,
A loving mother-watch to silent keep,
Till thy sweet sleep is over.

VOL. XLI.—21.

How beautiful art thou!
The blue-veined lids are on the blue eyes pressing,
While a soft rosy flush tints cheek and brow,
Under the sun's caressing.

Thy ripe lips stand apart,
And the light measured breath upheaves thy bosom.
How beautiful! how beautiful thou art!
My babe! my bud! my blossom!

Thy mother bends above,
Waiting with mother-longing for thy waking;
Waiting to see a look of answering love
From opening eyelids breaking.

Yearning to clasp thy hand,
To feel the tender touch of baby fingers.
Only a mother's heart can understand
How this touch thrills and lingers.

Longing to gather thee
Close to her breast, and feel thy smooth cheek pressing Against her own, while small arms wander free
With cruel, sweet caressing.

But not such peace as this is,
Even to feel warm lips upon my breast,
Can I disturb—nor for reward of kisses;—
So sleep and take thy rest.

Then sleep, sweet baby, sleep;
Thy mother's shadow o'er thy head shall hover,
And mother-eyes shall loving vigils keep
Till thy sweet sleep is over.

THE STRAITS OF MAGELLAN.

BY E. CHARDON.

IT almost seems as though there might be found a justification of the Darwinian theory of the descent of man, when one turns his attention to the savage races of mankind. Or, if we hesitate to believe that man has actually descended from apes, it yet seems as though there were regular gradations from the brute to the human family with scarcely a lacking step.

The Digger Indians of California are described as being exceedingly low in the scale of humanity; but the stories of travellers in Africa lead us to believe that some tribes of negroes are still lower. Yet, lowest of all, we must regard the people who live at the southern extremity of the American continent—the Fuegian Indians. The Indian of the North and the negro build themselves huts—rude enough, of course, but still dwelling-places after a fashion. They even practice agriculture in a rude way. The inhabitant of Terra del Fuego builds his house by sticking a few branches in the ground in the form of a semicircle, and then drawing their tops together into a sort of hood. It is not high enough to stand up in, nor large enough for any purpose save to squat or lie in. The fire is built before the open point of this hut. These huts are all the same. Generation after generation the dwelling-places of these savages—if they can be called dwelling-places—have been built like this, without improvement or variation, as regularly as the bird builds her nest. They are not so good as some habitations built by beasts and birds. For instance, there is a monkey in Africa which builds itself, in a tree, a house with a floor and a roof, infinitely superior to the Fuegian hut.

The little clothing which the Fuegian wears consists of a few scanty skins depending from the shoulder. Idea of agriculture he seems to have none; but depends upon mussels and other shell-fish to keep him from starvation.

Yet the climate does not justify these fragile and unprotecting huts, or this scanty clothing. According to Darwin's own idea, the necessities of their being, ought to have developed their inventive faculties sufficiently to find means to protect themselves against the rigors of their climate. Terra del Fuego lies between 50° and 60° south latitude, and is a land of disagreeable and uncertain weather. The wind is keen and almost unrelenting, and not at all tempered to those shorn lambs of humanity.

They display one human trait, however—a love for tobacco. But even this can hardly be set down as an evidence of superiority over the brute creation, for we all know that horses relish tobacco, and I have just read that a monkey in the Zoological Gardens at London has learned to smoke, and seems to enjoy the practice.

Mrs. Agassiz, who has recently made a voyage through the Straits of Magellan, gives, in an article in the Atlantic Monthly, the following description of a visit their party had from a company of Fuegian Indians:

"Toward the middle of the day we all strayed in, one by one, from our wanderings, and assembled around or within the tent for lunch. All luxuries and superfluities had long dropped off from our larder—mussels roasted on the shell, salt pork broiled on a stick and hard-tack formed our frugal meal; but, such as it was, we were called upon to share it with a numerous company. A boat rounded the point of the beach, and as it approached we saw that it was full of Indians—men, women and children. The men landed (they were five or six in number) and came toward us. I had wished to have a near view of the Fuegians, but, I confess, that when my desire was gratified, my first feeling was one of utter repulsion and disgust. I have seen many Indians, both in North and South America, the wild Sioux of the West, and various tribes of the Amazons, but I had never seen any so coarse and repulsive as these; they had not even the physical strength and manliness of the savage to atone for brutality of expression. Almost naked (for the short, loose skins tied around the neck, and hanging from the shoulders, could hardly be called clothing), with swollen bodies, thin limbs, and stooping forms, with a childish yet cunning leer on their faces, they crouched over our fire, spreading their hands toward its genial warmth, and all shouting at once, 'Tabac, tabac!' and 'Galleta!'—biscuit. We had no tobacco with us, but we gave them the remains of our hard-bread and pork, which they seemed glad to have. Then the one who appeared, from the deference paid him by the rest, to be chief, sat down on a stone and sang in a singular kind of monotone. The words were evidently addressed to us, and seemed, from the gestures and expression, to be an improvisation concerning the strangers. There was something curious in the character of this Fuegian song. It was rather recitation than singing, but was certainly divided into something like strophes or stanzas; for, although there was no distinct air or melody, the strains were brought to a close at regular short intervals, and ended always exactly in the same way and on the same notes with a rising inflection of the voice. When he finished, we were silent with a sort of surprise and expectancy; his blank, disappointed expression reminded us to applaud, and then he laughed with pleasure, imitating the clapping in an awkward way, and began to sing again. I do not know how long this scene might have lasted, for the are water defiles between sunken chains of mountains. Along the shore the mountain-sides are wooded, and abound with beautiful and luxurious vegetation. Here the fuchsia grows in the native soil, and is seen as thick and as abundant as the laurel in our Atlantic States. Other exquisite flowers are also found. Higher up are dense and sombre forests, and above these are the regions of perpetual snow and ice.

Bays, inlets and small sheltered harbors break the coast-lines, and afford vessels protection from the storms which continually sweep through these water-filled mountain passes. If a ship is met or overtaken by one of those sudden and violent storms which are characteristic of the region, she has but to steer for one of these harbors, and remain in comparative man seemed to have no thought of stopping, and the flow of words was uninterrupted, but the Hassler came in sight, her recall gun was fired, and we hastened down to the beach-landing."

Mrs. Agassiz gave the women "some showy beads and bright calico;" "though," she adds, "I should doubt their knowing what to do with the latter."

Turning from the people to the scenery of the Straits of Magellan, we find much to interest us. For the eastern half of the straits the shore is open and low, and the straits wide and easily navigable. But about midway between the Atlantic and the Pacific the scenery changes and becomes bold and abrupt in character. Mountains rise sharply from the water, and present their cleft summits against the sky. The strait is subdivided into many narrow passes, which quiet and safety, while her crew can watch the dreadful war of the elements but a few yards away. Sometimes a sailing vessel thus finding shelter will remain weather-bound for weeks, or even months; for, as fast as it will venture out, seeking to reach the next harbor, it will be driven back by sudden squalls. The "Williwaws" constitute another peculiarity of these straits. The air may be perfectly quiet without premonition of a storm, and a vessel may be at anchor in the bay, or proceeding peacefully on her way. All in a moment she will be seized with a sudden gust of wind and shaken from masthead to keel with almost inconceivable violence. Then all is quiet again, and the air as calm as though no "Williwaw" had agitated it.

The outlines of the mountains about Magellan

Straits, and the geological signs of the country indicate glacial action. Mr. Agassiz has decided that the phenomena betray a general movement of ice, at some remote period, from the south northward. The glacial movement is still going on down the mountain sides.

The Straits of Magellan are difficult for the mariner to thread unless he is well acquainted with all their characteristics. The passages are so numerous, some of them so tortuous and narrow, the mountains are so abrupt, and they tower up out of the water in such unexpected places, that a vessel might easily get lost. Then it is a region of mist, which sometimes maybe obscures all but the nearest objects, altering the whole apparent face of the landscape; or, still worse, settles down close to the water, and the bewildered pilot might, under its cover, run his vessel upon the rocky shore, while, so deep is the water in many places, the line at the vessel's stern would fail to find soundings.

A VISIT TO FRIENDS' MEETING.

WERE you ever at Friends' Meeting? No? Yes? Well, it doesn't matter. In either case you will enjoy the following account given by somebody, we don't know who, of a visit, one pleasant Sunday, to Friends' Meeting in Baltimore. It is as good as a story.

"Thee has never been to Friends' Meeting? Then thee must go over to Baltimore and go with me next First Day. Perhaps Friend Mary Ames will speak, and then thee will have a treat."

So said Friend Anne Bascome, as she took off her plain bonnet, and smoothed her plain handkerchief, and composed her plain but sweet countenance.

"But, my dear friend," said I, "I should be obliged to go in the world's costume ruffles, paniers and all. Shall I be allowed to enter the sanctuary in that profane style, or must I don some Quaker bonnet and gown of most immaculate gray?"

"Don't thee say Quaker, my friend," said Anne Bascome, settling herself in the depths of a luxuriant velvet easy-chair—and I notice Friends are partial to soft cushions—"it is a term of reproach among my people. Thee need have no fear if thee goes with me. And besides, many degenerate sons and daughters of Friends have adopted worldly fashions, though they still hold to their birthright."

"Then it is settled; I'll go with thee, Friend Anne, to Baltimore Friends' meeting, and I hope it will do me good."

"It is to be hoped it may do thee no harm," said Friend Anne, quietly.

Who does not like a Friend? Dear, sweet, gray birds, with their faultless, unruffled plumage, dealing so gently with the young, bearing their testimony among the world-hardened and unbelieving.

Saturday night saw me in Baltimore; Sunday morning, or First Day, saw me on my way to the meeting-house in Lombard Street, dressed in a becoming drab walking suit made by the most fashionable dressmaker in Washington, and plain, in spite of its elaborate trimming in satin, ruffles and folds.

"Thee does not look very unlike a Friend thyself," said Anne Bascome, just before I put my bonnet on. That, with its bunch of daisies and bright ribbons, dispelled the illusion.

Friends' meeting-house in Lombard Street, sets back from the curb some twenty feet or more. A high, primitive fence, from which three gates open, is the first intimation of the place. We were early, so we sent the carriage home and stood in the shade of some grand old trees, for awhile.

An evil genius soon presented itself in the shape of a fluttering, beribboned girl, a rainbow of color from head to heels. She seized me by the hand on the strength of a slight acquaintance at some watering-place, and shocked Friend Anne beyond measure, by darting at my veil and kissing me in the street.

"What are you standing here for?" she asked.

"I am going to Friends' Meeting."

"Oh, the Quakers!" exclaimed Fly-a-way, in her loudest tones. "I dote on Quakers, and I'm dying to go to Quaker meeting. Do take me in with you."

"I am here by the courtesy of my friend Anne," I said, very much ashamed; "and"—

"Thy friend is very welcome," said Anne; and I knew that her speech was a mortification of the flesh, for anything more worldly, more gorgeous in its get up, from the three-storied feather-fluttering hat, to the great rosettes on her small feet, I am bound to say the good Friend never saw, inside or outside of a meeting house.

"Thanks! how kind you are!" said the Butterfly, and then went on to entertain me with a description of the last ball she had attended, for which I could have boxed her ears with a right good will, for she varied it with queries of "Had I seen Tom, lately; or Harry, or the old colonel, and when I was going to be Mrs. —? and wouldn't I invite her to the wedding?"

Now I am only seventeen, and have had but few serious thoughts of marriage in all my busy life. There's a six-years' bridge, at present, between me and that important state, and I must confess I winced under Miss Anne's astonished stare; while, it being Sunday, and the creature utterly unimpressible, and standing in the peaceful shadow of Friends' meeting-house, I did not utter the sharp words that were fighting for an outlet under my placid bodice.

"Merely on us!" cried Butterfly, "the gates are opened." How I longed to ask her if she thought she could behave herself. I doubted her capacity for silence. I knew she would twirl her parasol, play with her ring, dangle her watch-chain and make her boots creak, but trusting to a friendly Providence, I followed Anne up the aisle, where, to my distress, she took a seat under the ministers' gallery and facing the whole audience.

"I like this," whispered Butterfly, setting all her dangles to fluttering. Of course she did. To be seen was her end of life; to be admired her only aim.

It being some time before service, I felt at liberty to use my eyes, and did so when I could without being annoyed by Butterfly.

What a strange, quiet, unchurchly place it seemed! A large, cheerful, but rather bare interior, divided down what we should call the middle aisle by a partition which could be raised or lowered at pleasure. A gallery ran all around the house, but there was no organ loft, no choir, no pulpit. Four plebeian-looking black stoves stood in different places, so that Friends' meeting-house must be abundantly comfortable in winter.

Friend Anne explained that the women Friends sat on one side and the men Friends on the other; that on occasion of business sessions by either sex, the partition was pulled down to the tops of the pews, and they were effectually separated; that the seats on a raised platform behind us were for Friend ministers, and she supposed there would be several present that morning.

"Isn't it comical?" queried Butterfly, already beginning to flutter her wings.

"I don't see anything funny," I replied, with an expression of countenance that I flatter myself frightened her into silence, for she was quiet full thirty seconds afterward.

By my side sat my comfortable friend; opposite a very slim, thin, delicate Quaker, rigid and pale, and on Butterfly's left an ample, motherly dame. Presently, more Friends began to drop in, sweet and cool, and all so fair and modest under their capacious silk bonnets! I cannot tell how many Rachels, and Nancys, and Marys I was introduced to. One by one they entered, one by one came the world's people, or modified Friends with pretty, gray walking-suits, and neat but not showy bonnets. One by one came in the men on the other side, and dropped into their seats, with their broad brims on, and there they sat under the shadow of their hats.

It was all so strange, as gradually meeting filled up! Several little folks sat round in pretty white dresses and one fold of ribbon over their plain straw hats, and they were quite as demure as their elders.

The bells stopped tolling without; the summer sunbeams flickered through branches and were sifted on the floor and over the congregation; the sweet west wind came in and toyed gently with spotless kerchiefs and pretty ribbons.

One face, pure and beautiful as a rosebud, under quillings of blue ribbon and white lace, quite fascinated me. Evidently she used the plain language, and I afterward learned that she was the daughter of Friend Mary Ames, one of the lights of that order.

Gradually the silence grew oppressive. Twenty minutes passed, twenty-five, thirty, and as yet the Spirit had not given token. The myriad faces blended into one, queerly, under a monstrous Quaker bonnet. A little child dropped a fan; it made me jump. Somebody sneezed. I never heard anything quite so terrific as that sneeze. I was getting light-headed. Astonished at Butterfly's silence, I looked at her; she was asleep; her three stories of hat toppled alarmingly. It was a relief to pinch her.

Five minutes more; that silence must be broken. The more I tried to think good thoughts, the more I couldn't. Grotesque images alarmed me. I saw all the comical illustrations I had looked at for months, and almost determined never to look at another. First I studied noses—it was very wicked of me—and then I wondered what everybody could be thinking of. Could they banish all worldly thoughts? I wished I could. The silence seemed like an avalanche about to smother me, when lo, a soft voice fell on my ear:

"Perfect love casteth out fear;" and the spell was broken.

Sweet Mary Ames, with thy saintly thoughts, dispelling silence and sadness, how refreshing were thy words! After that three Friends spoke, two brothers and one sister; then suddenly there was a rushing sound. The whole congregation roused itself and got up, and "Quaker meeting" was over.

"Did you ever see anything so stupid?" asked Butterfly, as we gained the street. "I lost some splendid singing; don't want anything to do with Quaker meeting again. Come and see me—good-bye."

I hope I shall never meet her again. As to the Friends, though their worship is peculiar, God bless them.

ICELAND.

BY ELLEN BERTHA BRADLEY.

THE traveller, approaching Iceland, is struck by the brilliancy of the light, the keen, bracing air, the steep, rugged coast, and, above all, by the magnificent bay of Faxa Fiord, in which his ship casts anchor. The entrance is fifty miles in width, guarded on the one hand by a ridge of pumice, on the other by a snow-clad peak five thousand feet in height, while around the intervening semicircle stand an hundred noble mountains. Between their base and the waters of the bay lies a dirty, greenish slope, dotted with houses of a mouldy green, looking as if recently fished up from the bottom of the sea. They are little more than wooden sheds, one-story high; but here and there is a gable-end of more pretension, marking the residence of some important person, while at each extremity of the little town is a group of turf huts, the homes of the poorest class. All around is a desolate stretch of lava. This is Reykjavik, the capital of Iceland, and the first settlement made upon the island. But, whatever the place may lack in external attractions, the people soon make up by the warmth of their welcome. Visitors are rare, and like most Icelanders, they are hospitable almost to a fault.

They are staunch Protestants, of the Lutheran persuasion, and live together in a beautiful patriarchal simplicity. They have neither prison, gallows, soldiers, nor police—for crime, theft, drunkenness and cruelty are unknown.

Iceland is not without its share of the romance which accompanies the discovery and settlement of every new country.

A thousand years ago, so runs the tale, a band of hardy Norsemen set sail in search of a new land toward the setting sun. They had no compass to round, as if uncertain what course to take, but ended by flying home, thus showing that they were about midway between the shores. The third, on being released a few days later, started immediately forward, and following the course which she had taken, they triumphantly made the southeasterly point of the island. But they were only adventurers on a voyage of discovery. Another century passed before colonists came to build their houses upon the icy shore.

Harold Haarfager, a Scandinavian king, of the time of the English Alfred, having conquered and dethroned the kings of the neighboring tribes, meddled with the rights of the landholders in so offensive a manner, that a company of them freighted a galley with their families and household goods, determined to seek new homes in the land which, rumor said, lay somewhere to the northwest.

When they came in sight of the island, the leader threw overboard the sacred pillars of his old home, that the gods might decide upon the site of his new. The waves carried them no one knew whither, and after three years' search they were found in a sheltered bay, on the western side of the island. Here the little company settled, founded the town of Reykjavik, and organized themselves into a republic, which for three hundred years maintained its independence.

direct them, nor did they know where the desired land lay. But they carried three consecrated ravens, trusting to the sagacity of these birds to guide them to a haven. Nor were they disappointed. When the first one was let loose, it started directly homeward, and they knew that in that direction still lay the nearest land. The second circled round and

Having ridden for thirty miles along the bridle-path from Reykjavik—roads are unknown in Iceland—the traveller comes to an abrupt pause on the brink of a precipice a hundred feet high, which separates the barren plateau on which he stands from a lovely, sunlit plain, ten miles wide, and walled on the other side by a similar rampart, at the foot of the mountains. This plain is the famous Thingwalla, or meeting place of the Thing, or Congress, the governing body of the republic.

This whole region is of volcanic origin, and by some unevenness in the cooling of the surface, or by a terrific internal convulsion, this plain—if plain it can be called—was torn from the surrounding mountains, sunk to its present level, and rent and shivered by a thousand fissures. Near the centre is an irregular, oval space, two hundred feet long and fifty broad, surrounded by a chasm so wide and deep as to be utterly impassable, except at one end, where a narrow causeway connects it with the mainland. This was the spot appointed by the Icelandic constitution for the meeting of the Things; and while feudal despotism was the only form of government known in Europe, here sat a free parliament, discussing the affairs of the tiny nation, armed men guarding the entrance, that their deliberations might not be disturbed. To this day three hummocks, at the upper end of the little plateau, mark the spot where chiefs and judges sat in state.

The time of the independence of the republic was one of remarkable literary and political vigor; and when, through the conspiracy of her chieftains, she was made a dependency of the Norwegian crown; her surrender of her liberties was couched in terms, the "haughtiness of which would have better suited an offer of allegiance from an equal power than a declaration of submission to a conqueror."

But, released from the obligations and necessity of self-government, the spirit of the people sank rapidly, and has never recovered its former level. At the union of the three Scandinavian monarchies, they passively allowed their allegiance to be transferred to the Danish crown, to which they have ever since remained subject. The adoption of the Lutheran religion seemed for a time to rouse something of their old literary activity. A printing-press was introduced in 1530, and since that time many original works of merit have been produced, and Shakspeare, Milton and Pope have been translated into the Icelandic tongue.

Iceland is more interesting physically than historically, for its geysers are a never-failing marvel, and its volcanoes are among the most celebrated in the world. The famous eruption of Mt. Hecla, in 1766, commenced by the appearance of a column of black sand slowly rising, and accompanied by subterranean thunders. Then a coronet of flame played around the crater, and masses of rock were thrown out. One stone six feet in circumference was flung twenty miles. For a circuit of a hundred and fifty miles the earth was covered with sand four inches deep, and white paper could not be distinguished from black. Fishermen could not put to sea for the darkness, and the people of the Orkney Islands were terrified by what they thought showers of black snow. The lava ran five miles, and a few days later a vast column of water broke through the pillar of cinders and rose to a height of several hundred feet.

But, violent as this eruption was, it was far exceeded by that of Skapta Jokul, in 1783. From this volcano a torrent of lava issued, which filled the basin of a great lake, and then divided into two streams, one fifty miles long and from twelve to fifteen wide in the broadest parts, the other forty miles long, and were confined between hills from five to six hundred feet deep. A thick cloud of cinders hung over the island for a year. According to the best estimates, nine thousand persons and two hundred thousand cattle perished during this eruption.

The ground around the geysers is honeycombed with holes. Not a blade of grass grows upon the hot, inflamed surface of red clay. The Great Geyser has a smooth, silicious basin seventy-two feet in diameter and four feet deep, with a hole in the bottom like a stationary wash-bowl. This is brimful of simmering water, from which rises a high column of vapor. The geyser is often inactive, and the traveller may have to wait many days before seeing more than this. An eruption is announced by loud underground noises. The centre of the pool becomes violently agitated. A dome of water rises, bursts, and falls. Then a sheaf of shining, liquid columns, wreathed with vapor, springs into the air, by a succession of bounds, flinging its silvery crests against the sky. How long it lasts, depends upon the violence of the eruption. The water gradually loses its ascending force, falters, droops, and falls, and is immediately sucked back into the subterranean chamber whence it came. The eruption is over—the traveller mounts his shaggy pony, and wends his way back over the mountains to Reykjavik.

CRUEL NURSERY LESSONS.

WE have sometimes wondered, says Mrs. Stowe, to see a helpless kitten or puppy given up to be tortured in a nursery, without even an attempt to explain to the children the pain they are inflicting, and the duties they owe to the helpless. Thus, what might form the most beautiful trait in the child's character is changed to a deformity. Instead of learning from the kitten a generous consideration for weakness and helplessness, the little one receives in the nursery the lesson of brutal tyranny.

No parent ought to allow a child the possession of any living creature with whose comfort and welfare they do not charge themselves. Children are not naturally cruel; they are only ignorant and inconsiderate. They have no conception of the pain they often inflict, even by their loving caresses. A boy, too, has in him a sort of wild, uncultured love of domination and sense of power, which are no sins, but may be made the foundations of great virtues, if he be early taught that his strength and power of control are given him for the protection of weakness, and not for the oppression of it. A boy can use the same faculties in defending and helping poor animals that he can in oppressing them; and the pets of the nursery are valuable for teaching that very lesson.

THE more a man denies himself, the more he shall obtain from God.

THE COMING SCHOOLMASTER.

BY LOUISE V. BOYD.

THE schoolmaster of the past, and by the past we mean those not good old times when our grandparents were school boys and school girls, was almost without an exception a foreigner, often an Irishman.

He was a stout believer in corporeal punishment and made up in the severity of his discipline what he lacked in the knowledge of human nature, or the science of governing. If learned and refined he was yet an overbearing tyrant, if illiterate and vulgar, which sometimes happened, he was a monster. In all cases we might say of him, in the language of Wordsworth,

"Full twenty times was Peter feared
For once that Peter was respected."

But the rod of his power is broken, and over his grave, moistened by but few tears, the shadow of forgetfulness is deepening year by year.

The schoolmaster of to-day is not known by that appellation, but is called the professor. I have attended his examinations and exhibitions and have discovered him to be a fossil, or a ghost from the shadowy past, groping among the mists and shadows of darker ages, and eternally harping upon the greatness of Greece and the splendors of Rome.

He confines himself to his text-books, and when he would edify or entertain his classes with more than his wonted sprightliness he delivers a lengthy dissertation on the imperishability of the sayings of the seven sages of Greece, those celebrated maxims justly deemed worthy of the places assigned them as mottoes in the Delphian Temple.

Hear them, oh, you wide-awake, alive, American boys—listen while your heart beats quicker as though you heard the ring of clarions and voices of trumpets: "Know thyself" (Solon); "Consider the end," (Chilo); "Know thy opportunity," (Pittacus); "Most men are bad," (Bias); "Nothing is impossible to industry," (Periander); "Avoid excess," (Cleobutus); "Suretyship is the precursor of ruin," (Thales). Ah, boys, these have lost their original flavor.

I admit that this wisdom of a past age is still wisdom, but have these old Greeks a pre-emptive right to all our reverence? Does the schoolmaster, that is the professor, of to-day, expect to lead the young American up the steep of the highest usefulness by the faint glimmer of the burned-out lamps of Greece, to the dying echoes of her heathen utterances? Vain expectation—useless expenditure of effort; the boys of to-day are marching ahead of the schoolmaster.

But let us come now to the coming schoolmaster. Aye, gladly, for he will know that we have utterances from men of our own land worthy to be pondered over and acted upon till they pervade the whole structure of society. The coming schoolmaster has in his boyhood been thoroughly instructed in—that is to say received a smattering of—the lore of ancient Greece, but he has asked himself, where was the Greek whose spirit ever caught the faintest gleam of the grand truth first uttered by Thomas Jefferson, "All men are born equal!" He will know that in "Give me liberty or give me death!" Patrick Henry even transcended the severe simplicity of the classic ages.

He will declare the saying of Benjamin Franklin, "There never was a good war nor a bad peace," is more than worthy of a place in the Delphian Temple, aye, worthy to be a motto in the temple of Christianity. He will apostrophize thus: "Oh, shades of the immortal thinkers of Greece! the mind of your most godlike philosopher never soared to such a height as this reached by William H. Seward when he proclaimed, 'There is a higher law than the Constitution.'"

He will show how in the stern simplicity of his pure patriotism, Henry Clay could say: "I would rather be right than president." He will tell how the rough, outspoken backwoodsman, David Crockett, gave us the true metal, though the coin was too hastily struck to be perfect in its finish, when he said: "Be sure you're right, then go ahead!"

The emphasis and pluck of this phrase could never have been uttered in any land but our own, being an outgrowth of the circumstances of the New World.

Nor will he neglect the unforgotten sentence of poor, half-romantic, half-vagabond Sam Patch: "Some things can be done as well as others," which homely phrase, teaching of the feasibility of all things, is the fitting watchword for the inventor and adventurer who but breathes his native air on this western continent.

And the coming schoolmaster having given these seven wise sayings of American sages for the instruction and admiration of American youth, will proceed to give one more by way of good measure, and it will be this plain, but grand aphorism from the lips of the martyr, John Brown, "It's a mighty big thing for a man to do all he can."

Then will the coming boys begin to feel for what glorious destiny they are born, then will they sing "Yankee Doodle" with fresh joyousness, and with a sublime contempt of what nations less free, and ages more stupid may think, or might have thought of it.

And now, at the close of this paper, let me say what I see I have not said, which is, that girls will, of course, be in the schools along with the boys—ah, yes, and now I think of it, let me tell you the coming schoolmaster won't be a master at all, but a school-mistress.

THE CAPERCAILLIE.

ALTHOUGH once a common inhabitant of the highland districts of Great Britain, the Capercaillie has now been almost wholly extinct for names: Cock of the Woods, Mountain Cock, Auerhahn and Capercaillie.

It is now most frequently found in the northern parts of Europe, Norway and Sweden being some years, a straggling specimen being occasionally seen in Scotland, and shot "for the benefit of science." This bird is also known by the following very favorite homes. From those countries it is largely imported into England by the game-dealers.

The Capercaillie is celebrated not only for its great size and excellency of its flesh, but for its singular habits just previous to and during the breeding season. Mr. Lloyd has given so excellent an account of these curious proceedings, that they must be told in his own words:

"At this period, and often when the ground is still deeply covered with snow, the cock stations himself on a pine and commences his love song, or play as it is termed in Sweden, to attract the hens about him. This is usually from the first dawn of day to sunrise, or from a little after sunset until it is quite dark. The time, however, more or less depends upon the mildness of the weather and the advanced state of the season.

"During his 'play,' the neck of the Capercaillie is stretched out, his tail is raised and spread like a fan, his wings droop, his feathers are ruffled up, and, in short, he much resembles an angry turkey-cock. He begins his play with a call something resembling 'Peller! peller! peller!' This sound he repeats at first at some little intervals; but as he proceeds, they increase in rapidity, until at last, and after perhaps the lapse of a minute or so, he makes a sort of gulp in his throat, and finishes with sucking in, as it were, his breath.

"During the continuance of this latter process, which only lasts a few seconds, the head of the Capercaillie is thrown up, his eyes are partially closed, and his whole appearance would denote that he is worked up into an agony of passion. At this time his faculties are much absorbed, and it is not difficult to approach him. * * * The play of the Capercaillie is not loud, and should there be any wind stirring in the trees at the time, it cannot be heard at any considerable distance. Indeed, during the calmest and most favorable weather, it is not audible at more than two or three hundred paces.

"On hearing the call of the cock, the hens, whose cry in some degree resembles the croak of the raven, or rather perhaps the sounds, 'Gock! gock! gock!' assemble from all parts of the surrounding forest. The male bird now descends from the eminence on which he was perched to the ground, where he and his female friends join company.

"The Capercaillie does not play indiscriminately over the forest, but he has certain stations (Tjaderlek, which perhaps may be rendered his playing-grounds). These, however, are often of some little extent. Here, unless very much persecuted, the song of these birds may be heard in the spring for years together. The Capercaillie does not, during his play, confine himself to any particular tree, for, on the contrary, it is seldom he is to be met with exactly on the same spot for two days in succession.

"On these lek, several Capercaillie may occasionally be heard playing at the same time. Mr. Grieff, in his quaint way, observes, 'It then goes gloriously.' So long, however, as the old male birds are alive, they will not, it is said, permit the young ones, or those of the preceding season, to play. Should the old birds, however, be killed, the young ones in the course of a day or two, usually open their pipes. Combats, as it may be supposed, not unfrequently take place on these occasions; though I do not recollect having heard of more than two of these birds being engaged at the same time.

"Though altogether contrary to law, it is now that the greatest slaughter is committed among the Capercaillie, for any lump of a fellow who is able to draw a trigger may, with a little instruction, manage to knock them down. As the plan, however, of shooting these noble birds during their play is sometimes curious, I shall do my best to describe it.

"It first being ascertained where the lek is situated, the sportsman proceeds to the spot and listens in profound silence until he hears the call of the cock. So long, however, as the bird only repeats his commencing sound, he must, if he be at all near to him, remain stationary; but the instant the Capercaillie comes to the wind-up, the gulp, etc., during which, as I have just now said, its faculties of both seeing and hearing are in a degree absorbed, then he may advance a little. This note, however, lasts so short a time, that the sportsman is seldom able to take more than three or four steps before it ceases; for the instant that is the case, he must come to a halt, and if in an exposed situation remain fixed like a statue. This is absolutely necessary; for during his play, except during the gulp, etc., the Capercaillie is exceedingly watchful, and easily takes the alarm. If all remain quiet, however, the bird usually goes on again immediately with his first strain, and when he once more comes to the final note the sportsman advances as before.

"To become a proficient at this sport requires a good deal of practice. In the first place, a person must know how to take advantage of the ground when advancing upon the Capercaillie; for if in full daylight, this is hardly practicable in exposed situations; and in the next, that he may not move forward excepting upon the note which is so fatal to that bird. This is likely enough to happen if it be an old cock that has been previously exposed to shots, for he often runs on with, 'Peller! peller! peller!' until one supposes that he is just coming to the gulp, when he suddenly makes a stop. If, therefore, a person were then incautiously to advance, he would, in all probability, instantly take to flight."

The nest of the Capercaillie is made upon the ground, and contains eight or ten eggs; when hatched, the young are fed upon insects, more especially ants and their pupæ. The adult bird feeds mostly on vegetable substances, such as juniper, cranberry and bilberries, and the leaves and buds of several trees.

The color of the adult male bird is chestnut-brown, covered with a number of black lines irregularly dispersed, the breast is black with a gloss of green, and the abdomen is simply black, as are the lengthened feathers of the throat and tail. The female is easily known by the bars of red and black which traverse the head and neck, and the reddish yellow barred with black of the under surface. In size, the Capercaillie is nearly equal to a turkey.

GOING WITH THE ANGELS.

BY KATE SUTHERLAND.

OUT of two homes, standing side by side, two babies went to Heaven, leaving two mothers' hearts aching and desolate—but not desolate alike. To one, peace and resignation came with sorrow; to the other, a hopeless and rebellious unrest. Light streamed into the soul of one through many opening windows; the other sat in rayless darkness. To one came visions of angels bearing in tender love a baby to Heaven; while the other looked down into a grave, and saw nothing but a lifeless effigy.

Nurse crossed the room, and stood for a few moments looking down upon the child. Mr. Carlton came also, and leaned above his wife and babe.

"Going with the angels," said the nurse, softly and reverently, as she dropped upon her knees.

How still it was! A new atmosphere was beginning to fill the room—an atmosphere not perceptible to any outward sense, but touching and tranquilizing the soul. It had in it the fragrance of peace. Angels were present. They had come to receive this blossom of earth, and take it to bloom in Heaven.

God can come very near to those who love Him

It was just as a June sun was pressing his evening kiss upon the mountain tops that the angels came for one of these babies. There had been only a faint hope in the mother's heart since morning; but love clings to hope, faint though it be, while ever the pulses throb. And so Mrs. Carlton had not quite given him up. But, as the shadows of closing day made their first impression on her senses, there came a change in the face of her darling that her heart told her was death.

"Oh, nurse!" she exclaimed, lifting her eyes from the baby, which for more than an hour she had been holding close to her bosom.

and trust in Him. He can make the pillow of suffering as soft as down; and the shadow of death a veil of light. So He came near to those on whom He was, in His infinite love, about laying a burden of sorrow, and they felt His divine presence, and leaned upon Him, sorrowful, but peaceful, knowing that it was well. And when they gave Him back the most precious of all gifts they had ever received at His hands, if tears wet their cheeks, and sobs rent their bosoms, they were yet able to say: "It is well. Our Father knows best. And as for baby, he has gone with the angels."

Such comfort God gives to all who look to Him and trust Him as one too wise to err and too loving to be unkind.

Just as tender and comforting would His ministration of sorrow have been in that other home, from which His angels had borne upward another baby, if He could have found a way into the hearts of its afflicted ones. Just as tenderly did He love them, though they were wanderers from His fold; but they were afar off in the wilderness, and could not hear

His voice, though He never ceased calling after them and trying to bring them back.

How sad is that sorrow for the little ones which cannot lift itself above the grave; which veils itself in sackcloth and ashes, refusing to be comforted; which will not look upward to the heights whither the Good Shepherd has borne the lambs, nor hear His voice calling them to ascend from the herbless valleys to the green pastures above.

AUNT ESTHER ON CIDER-DRINKING.

BY MAJASA.

"HAVE a glass of cider, Aunt Esther? It's just hard enough to be good."

"No, thank you, Jonathan, I never drink cider no more."

"So, you've gone and joined the Good Templars, out West, have you?"

"I never j'ined no secret society, not that I've anything agin 'em. I feel like sayin', 'God bless every one as stands up for Temp'rance!' but I do go agin cider-drinkin'. I don't b'l'ive its right."

"Well, Aunt Esther," replied the old gentleman, as, after taking a generous draught of the beverage in question, he placed the brown pitcher on the mantelpiece, and sat down in the chimney-corner, opposite his guest; "I've enjoyed your visit mightily—talking of old times has most made Polly and me young once more; and I thought you'd hardly changed a bit since you went away, forty years ago; but you're ahead of us in this cider business. Is it some new-fangled notion you heard out West?"

"No new idea. The Scripture says 'wine is a mocker, strong drink is ragin'.'"

"Yes, I know; but cider isn't 'strong drink.'"

"Are you right certain of that, Jonathan?" and the old lady's eyes flashed as if she felt sure of having the strongest side of the argument. "What is 'strong drink'?"

"I suppose it's anything that intoxicates—but cider is nothing but apple-juice."

"Sweet cider, you mean?"

"Yes, nothing but apple-juice, harmless as them pippins," and he pointed to a basket of beautiful fruit on the table.

"And how long does it stay sweet?"

"Oh, I don't know exactly—it depends on the weather—only a few days, I reckon."

"Do folks generally drink it, and call it good," she asked with the same light in her eyes, "when it's sweet?"

"I reckon not."

"You said that cider"—and the old lady laid down the long blue stocking she was knitting, and pointed to the pitcher on the mantelpiece—"you said that cider was just hard enough to be good. What makes it good, Jonathan?"

"Well," and the old gentleman hitched his chair uneasily; "well, I suppose 'tis 'cause it's worked a spell. You know, when cider first comes from the mill it's too flat."

"Worked a spell," and the blue ball rolled away unnoticed; "you mean it's good 'cause it's got spirits in it do you?"

"Well, I reckon so." A vigorous turning and punching of the big back-log sent the sparks flying up the chimney, and interrupted the conversation at this point.

"If it's got spirits in it, won't it intoxicate?" continued his eager questioner.

"Now, Jonathan, don't you remember the time when the cider froze before you put it in the cellar, and you made out to get a little in a tin cup and set it on the stove to warm; then, when you went to haul fodder, you was so drunk you rolled off of the load backwards, and the horses run home. I was awfully scared for fear you had a fit," and Polly related the affair with the air of a woman who has gained the upper hand of her liege lord for once, although the good woman was not at all averse to the contents of the pitcher herself, and like some others who have not seen the bitter end, thought getting a little upset with cider rather amusing than disgraceful.

"If cider makes folks drunk, it's strong drink, isn't it?" triumphantly exclaimed Aunt Esther, as she saw the fortifications of his fortress falling to the ground under her well-directed artillery.

"Well, I reckon—well, I never—really—I never thought of it that way before. Here's your ball, Aunt Esther," and the old gentleman covered his confusion by picking up the ball and handing it to her with the gallantry of youth.

"You know," continued the old lady, placidly resuming her knitting, now that her point was gained, "when we first moved out West the country was new and wild, and neighbors awful scarce. After several years of failin', there was some years of mighty big harvests. The wheat was powerful big. Why, Dolly, would you b'l'ieve, 'twas as high as your head."

"Law me, did you ever hear the like, Jonathan?"

"'Twas new parary land," explained the old lady. "I was a-goin' on to tell about harvestin'. Harvest hands come off of the railroad; they was so scarce, and the harvests so big, they had things their own way. Folks'll put up with lots rather than lose the crop. John—he's an easy man, you know—was willin' to stand 'most anything as was reasonable, and some that wasn't reasonable; but one thing, he declared up and down, he wouldn't do, not if we lost every grain of wheat, and had to leave the farm. He wouldn't turnish liquor for the hands in the harvest-field. The neighbors all said he'd lose his crop, for men wouldn't work without whisky. You know John's brother, poor Sam," and the voice grew low and tender, "drank so hard, and at last shot himself—'twas awful, I can hardly bare to talk about it yet, and it was nigh on to thirty years ago—his grave is on a hill right in sight of our house." The knitting-needles went on vigorously, as if their clicking could drown terrible memories.

"Did John get his wheat harvested?" asked the old gentleman, after a few moment's silence.

"He called the men around him, told 'em the dreadful story and what caused it, as he pointed to the gravestone on the hill. 'Twas the most affectin' Temprance lectur' I ever heard," said Aunt Esther, laying down her knitting, and wiping her eyes. "Then he promised the men good, strong coffee, meat, biscuit, pies and cakes should be sent out in the field in the middle of every forenoon and afternoon—but not a drop of whisky. If he couldn't find men willin' to work on them terms, his wheat might spoil?"

"True pluck. I told you, Polly, John was the very man to go West, get rich, and drive everything before him."

"Did the men work?" eagerly inquired Polly, anxious to hear the end of the matter.

"Not a single one refused," replied Aunt Esther. "The neighbors were surprised. The next year some of 'em tried John's plan, and now whisky is hardly ever found in a harvest-field in our county."

"John was right. No wonder everything has prospered so with him," said the old gentleman, approvingly.

"And he had the right kind of a wife to help him," responded Polly, gazing admiringly at her visitor.

Aunt Esther smiled and blushed like a girl of sixteen. Success is sweet, and the respect of friends a recompense for many trials. Only those who have experienced the hardships of pioneer life know what such success costs, and how hard it is sometimes to stand firm for the truth and right when all the surrounding influences are on the side of wrong; or, at least, favor compromise on the plea of necessity.

But the story was not finished. Let us listen, as did the companions of Aunt Esther, to her remaining sketch:

"As soon as John was able he bought trees for an orchard. I helped him set 'em out. The first crop of apples we gathered in a bushel basket, put the baby on top, and carried 'em in so proud like. In a few years we had wagon-loads, and the neighbors, too. Illinois raises mighty fine fruit, and lots of it. Then there began to be cider-mills all 'round, and folks drank cider instead of water. I didn't think but what 'twas all right for quite a spell. An old farmer from Indiany bought a farm next us, and moved there; he was stiddy, and a hard-workin' man, an elder in the church; but his two oldest boys, about grown, was wild and rough; they kept gettin' drunk and makin' a fuss in the neighborhood. One day I was over there a-visitin'. By and by we heard a noise and a big laugh out on the back stoop. A bar'l of cider had worked so that the stopper flew out and the cider spattered clear up to the eaves.

"Most hard enough to hold up an iron wedge," said one of the boys, as we went in to dinner.

"Never mind," said the old man; 'there's another bar'l down-cellar, and purty soon we'll have some more.'

"Well, I stayed mighty nigh all day, and they kept a-drinkin' and a-drinkin' on what was left of that hard cider—the old man, the old woman, all of 'em, clean down to the two little boys, only three and five years old. The next day was Sunday, and them big boys was off on another spree. Folks was mighty sorry for their poor old father and mother; but I sot in church and kept a-thinkin' and a-thinkin' if them cider bar'ls at home hadn't give 'em a start on the down'ard road. Somehow the sermons didn't do me much good that day—though Uncle David said the preacher give us some powerful doctrine.

"The next week one of the neighbor's little boys got drunk on cider, and fell out of a hay-mow and was most killed. That saved me—a little boy, only seven years old, drunk most all day. If he liked spirits when he was little like that, wouldn't the appetite grow on him till he grew up, and got to be a drunkard and had the delerious tremens like poor Sam. That night I kept wakin' up and seein' Sam in his coffin, only sometimes 'twould be my Johnny, and sometimes Freddie. The next mornin', first thing after breakfast, when the men was gone off to work in the field, I went out and tipped over the bar'l of cider that was standin' under a big tree in the yard. After while I went out to the barn to get some corn-cobs, and forgot to fasten the gate good, and the hogs got in the yard and rooted up the grass all 'round where the cider was spilt, and made an awful muss. But I was busy thinkin', and never noticed 'em at all.

"When John came to dinner, he turned out the hogs, and says he: 'Esther, I'm dreadful sorry the grass is spoiled so, and your nice beds of pinks. I set 'em out agen, and I guess they'll grow. I'll make some other kind of a fastenin' for that gate.'

"I didn't say nothin'. I thought more of my boys than my posies; but Mike and Pat scolded like everything 'cause the cider was gone, and John promised to get some more the next week. That was Saturday. Sunday I told John how the cider got spilt, and told him all I'd been thinkin' of, and asked him if he wanted to bring up his boys to be drunkards. He said he'd never thought of it that way before, but seemed to him I was right. Then he said: 'I promised Mike and Pat I'd get 'em some more cider. What'll I do about it?'

"Says I: 'A bad promise is better broken than kept. Give 'em somethin' else, or pay 'em a little more till their time's out—it's only next month—and don't ever furnish cider agen for your hands. Don't you remember about the harvestin' and the whisky?"

"I never thought I was leadin' 'em on to drink.' And then he leaned out the window and looked at the gravestone on the hill, and says he: 'Esther, I'll never furnish cider to drink agen, and I'll go against the drinkin' of it as long as my name's John Sinclair.'"

"I didn't think I was doin' wrong, or bein' a a stumblin'-block to the young members; but suppose we give up the cider, Polly," exclaimed the old gentleman, who was deeply moved by Aunt Esther's earnest words.

"Yes, Jonathan, we'll make vinegar of what's left," replied Polly, rubbing her eyes and spectacles in a suspicious manner.

"And you know, Polly, some of them college chaps got some cider here the other night. I heard to-day they had a spree, and carried on so, they've had 'em up before the faculty. The boys will never get any more cider at Deacon Sargent's."

A DAY LOST.

BY I—L—.

I WAS sewing away one morning, for dear life, as the saying is, intending to make a good day of it, and put my work ahead, when Hetty, my little daughter, five years old, gave a pull at my elbow, and said: "Mamma."

"Well, dear, what is wanted?" I did not look aside from my work, into her sweet little face, nor speak in as loving tones as usual, for the interruption was not wholly agreeable.

"Can't I have my wax doll, mamma?"

Now this wax doll was a treasured present from grandmother, highly prized and carefully treated by Hetty; and after being tenderly nursed by her, dressed and undressed, on rare occasions, laid away under lock and key in one of my bureau drawers.

"Not to day," was my answer.

"Why not to-day, mamma?"

Sure enough, why not to-day? That was just the question. Was it because Hetty might injure the doll? No, that was not the reason; for she was a careful little girl. The true reason was, I did not wish to leave my work and lose five minutes time in going up-stairs to the bureau. Just this, and no more. But, what reply was made to Hetty? A very unreasonable and unsatisfactory one; and such as no mother should ever make.

"Because you can't have Dolly to-day."

Because—How many short-comings and sins of omission are covered by this convenient, vaguely meaning, little word.

"I won't hurt her, mother, I'll be oh! so careful. Do, mother, let me have Dolly."

"Didn't I say that you couldn't have Dolly?"

I knit my brows and spoke with some severity. Having said no, I must be firm. Right or wrong, I must be consistent; that is, have my own will in the case. And as I was the stronger of the two, of course my will decided the question between us.

Poor Hetty! She knew something of my hard decision of character, and retired from the contest. As I turned my eyes from her face to my work, I carried in my mind the image of her grieving lips, and tear-filled eyes. Was I rebuked? Yes. Did I repent? Yes. And go for the doll at once? No. I was busy at my work and could not spare a minute.

Sewing seams was of more consequence than sowing seeds of happiness in the heart of my child. And then, had I not said that Dolly was not to make her appearance to-day? Was I to break my word? No. I must be a consistent mother, if I expected to govern my children aright.

It was very still in the room for the next ten minutes. Only a sob or two broke the silence, at first, as Hetty choked down her disappointment. She had crept into the great arm-chair, and was sitting there idle and silent. After a while I turned partly around, and glanced toward her stealthily. Her brow was contracted, her lips pursed out slightly, and over her whole face was a shade of unhappiness.

"Why don't you get your china doll?" said I, rather coldly.

"I don't want my china doll," she answered.

"Oh, very well, just as you please, my little lady," I returned; and took no more notice of her for ten minutes longer—all the while working away as intently as if our next meal depended on the result of my labor. I was sorry that I had not taken the time to get Hetty's wax doll; but, as I had said no, I concluded that it was best to let no remain in force.

Presently she slipped down from the arm-chair, and went quietly from the room. I paused in my work, and listened to the light patter of her feet as she went up-stairs.

A faint sigh, born of a passing regret, came up from my heart. "It would have been better if I had given her the doll," said I, to myself. "But it is too late now."

So I bent to my sewing again, and made the little needle fly with increased velocity.

"I wonder where that child is, and what she is doing?"

Nearly half an hour had passed since Hetty left the room. I paused in my work as I asked myself this question, and listened. But I could hear no sound of her. I would have laid down my sewing and gone in search of her, only—what? I felt as if I could not spare the time!

"Hetty!"

There was no reply.

"Hetty! Where are you?"

My voice was raised to a louder key; but no response came. So I bent to my work once more.

But this uncertainty as to where the child had gone, and what she was doing, could not very long be borne. The time came when I dropped everything, and started, in some concern of mind, from the room. I looked into my own chamber, but she was not there. I called, but got no answer. Then I ran up to the third story, and pushed the door of one of the rooms open hastily. In the middle of the bed sat my little truant, busily at work, with a pair of scissors, on an elegant lace cape which had cost me fifteen dollars.

With a quick exclamation and an excited manner, I sprang toward the little destructive, who, frightened at my tone and appearance, suddenly threw up her hands, and I saw the sharp points of the scissors she held enter her cheek just below the eye. A scream followed, as the blood ran over her face. What a sickening sense of pain and fear fell suddenly upon my heart. For some moments I was half paralysed with terror and bewilderment. Then catching up my little darling, I made an effort to compose myself, and responded to the sober call of duty. I carried her down-stairs, and though almost fainting at the sight of her blood, held back my agitation with a strong hand, and proceeded to wash the red stains from her face, and find out the extent of her injury.

The wound, happily, was not of a serious nature; but the imminent danger of losing her eye that she had escaped, made me shudder whenever the thought passed through my mind, and so affected me that I grew weak and nervous, and on attempting, after soothing her to sleep, to resume my work, found that my strength was gone.

And so, in my over eagerness to "make a good day of it," I had compassed the loss of a day.

After trying, with an unsteady hand, to make my needle do its work, I threw down my sewing in despair, and went over to the chamber where I had laid Hetty to sleep. The dark red scar, just on the orbital verge, rebuked me as strongly as if it had been a living voice. Dear child! How could I have so forgotten the needs of her opening mind? How could I have so failed to realize that, while I was absorbed in my own employments, she must have something to do?

For several minutes I stood bending over her. Then going to the drawer in which her wax doll was laid, I unlocked it, and taking out the beautiful effigy, placed it on the pillow beside her. How sweet the two faces looked; the living and the inanimate. I gazed at them until my eyes were blinded by tears; and then went back to the sitting-room, where I made another effort to resume my work. My hand had grown a little steadier, but the heart was gone. For a very short time I endeavored to force myself to keep on with my appointed task; but, mind and body both dissented so strongly that the garments I had hoped to complete were finally laid aside, not to be touched again until to-morrow.

As I was doing this, a sigh for my lost day passed sadly from my lips. At this moment I heard Hetty's feet and voice; she had awakened, and finding Dolly by her side, had forgotten all the past, and was as happy as a child could be.

"Dear, dear, sweet Dolly!" she was singing as blithely as if grief had never laid a finger upon her heart.

"Oh, mamma!" she exclaimed, as she entered the sitting-room, "you are so good to give me Dolly to play with," and she came dancing to me, with her dewy lips put up to mine for a kiss.

There was no rebuke on those precious lips,—Oh, no. That kiss was love's own best expression; and yet it stung me with remorse.

Hetty's trial was over, her grief forgotten. But, on my bosom was laid the burden of regret, and I could not throw it off. Her state of disturbance had passed like the morning cloud and the early dew; but mine kept pulsing on and shadowing the hours that might have passed in cheerful work.

I counted that day lost, except for the lesson it taught me; for, when I laid my aching head upon its pillow at night, I could not look back upon any useful thing accomplished. There had been fruitless efforts to do many things; but my restless state kept me flitting and changing, and my half-formed purposes wrought out no sure results.

HAT-BANDS.

HATS were originally made of some soft material, probably of cloth or leather, and in order to make them fit the head, a cord was fastened round them, so as to form a sort of contraction. This is illustrated on p. 524 of "Fairholt's Costume in England," in the figure of the head of an Anglo-Saxon woman, wearing a hood bound on with a head-band; and on p. 530 are figures of several hats worn during the fourteenth century, which were bound to the head by rolls of cloth; and all the early hats seem provided with some sort of band. We may trace the remnants of this cord or band in the present hat-band. A similar survival may be observed in the strings of the Scotch cap, and even in the mitre of the bishop.

It is probable that the hat-band would long ago have disappeared had it not been made use of for the purpose of hiding the seam joining the crown to the brim. If this explanation of the retention of the hat-band is the true one, we have here a part originally of use for one purpose applied to a new one, and so changing its function.

The duties of the hat-band have been taken in modern hats by two running strings fastened to the lining, and these again have in their turn become obsolete, for they are now generally represented by a small piece of string, by means of which it is no longer possible to make the hat fit the head more closely.

FOUL PLAY.

THE WOLF AND THE LAMB.

FROM "CAST ADRIFT," BY THE AUTHOR OF "THREE YEARS IN A MAN-TRAP."

(We give a chapter from T. S. Arthur's new book, "CAST ADRIFT," just published by J. M. Stoddart & Co., of this city.)

FOR an hour Mrs. Bray waited the reappearance of Pinky Swett, but the girl did not come back.

At the end of this time a package which had been left at the door was brought to her room. It came from Mrs. Dinneford, and contained two hundred dollars. A note that accompanied the package read as follows:

"Forgive my little fault of temper. It is your interest to be my friend. The woman must not, on any account, be suffered to come near me."

Of course there was no signature. Mrs. Bray's countenance was radiant as she fingered the money.

"Good luck for me, but bad for the baby," she said, in a low, pleased murmur, talking to herself. "Poor baby! I must see better to its comfort. It deserves to be looked after. I wonder why Pinky doesn't come?"

Mrs. Bray listened, but no sound of feet from the stairs or entries, no opening or shutting of doors, broke the silence that reigned through the house.

"Pinky's getting too low down—drinks too much; can't count on her any more." Mrs. Bray went on talking to herself. "No rest; no quiet; never satisfied; forever knocking round, and forever getting the worst of it. She was a real nice girl once, and I always liked her. But she doesn't take any care of herself."

As Pinky went out, an hour before, she met a fresh-looking girl, not over seventeen, and evidently from the country. She was standing on the pavement, not far from the house in which Mrs. Bray lived, and had a travelling bag in her hand. Her perplexed face and uncertain manner attracted Pinky's attention.

"Are you looking for anybody?" she asked.

"I'm trying to find a Mrs. Bray," the girl answered. "I'm a stranger from the country."

"Oh, you are?" said Pinky, drawing her veil more tightly, so that her disfigured face could not be seen.

"Yes; I'm from L——."

"Indeed? I used to know some people there."

"Then you've been in L——?" said the girl, with a pleased, trustful manner, as of one who had met a friend at the right time.

"Yes, I've visited there."

"Indeed? Who did you know in L——?"

"Are you acquainted with the Cartwrights?"

"I know of them. They are among our first people," returned the girl.

"I spent a week in their family a few years ago, and had a very pleasant time," said Pinky.

"Oh, I'm glad to know that," remarked the girl. "I'm a stranger here; and if I can't find Mrs. Bray I don't see what I am to do. A lady from here who was staying at the hotel gave me a letter to Mrs. Bray. I was living at the hotel, but I didn't like it; it was too public. I told the lady that I wanted to learn a trade or get into a store, and she said the city was just the place for me, and that she would give me a letter to a particular friend, who would, on her recommendation, interest herself for me. It's somewhere along here that she lived, I'm sure;" and she took a letter from her pocket and examined the direction.

The girl was fresh and young and pretty, and had an artless, confiding manner. It was plain she knew little of the world, and nothing of its evils and dangers.

"Let me see;" and Pinky reached out her hand for the letter. She put it under her veil, and read:

"MRS. FANNY BRAY,
"No. 631 ——— Street,
"—————"

"By the hand of Miss Flora Bond."

"Flora Bond," said Pinky, in a kind, familiar tone.

"Yes, that is my name," replied the girl; "isn't this ——— Street?"

"Yes; and there is the number you are looking for."

"Oh, thank you! I'm so glad to find the place. I was beginning to feel scared."

"I will ring the bell for you," said Pinky, going to the door of No. 631. A servant answered the summons.

"Is Mrs. Bray at home?" inquired Pinky.

"I don't know," replied the servant, looking annoyed. "Her rooms are in the third story;" and she held the door wide open for them to enter. As they passed into the hall Pinky said to her companion: "Just wait here a moment, and I will run up-stairs and see if she is in."

The girl stood in the hall until Pinky came back.

"Not at home, I'm sorry to say."

"Oh, dear! that's bad; what shall I do?" and the girl looked distressed.

"She'll be back soon, no doubt," said Pinky, in a light, assuring voice. "I'll go around with you a little and see things."

The girl looked down at her travelling-bag.

"Oh, that's nothing; I'll help you to carry it;" and Pinky took it from her hand.

"Couldn't we leave it here?" asked Flora.

"It might not be safe; servants are not always to be trusted, and Mrs. Bray's rooms are locked; we can easily carry it between us. I'm strong—got good country blood in my veins. You see I'm from the country as well as you; right glad we met. Don't know what you would have done."

And she drew the girl out, talking familiarly, as they went.

VOL. XII.—22.

"Haven't had your dinner yet?"

"No; just arrived in the cars, and came right here."

"You must have something to eat, then. I know a nice place; often get dinner there when I'm out."

The girl did not feel wholly at ease. She had not yet been able to get sight of Pinky's closely-veiled features, and there was something in her voice that made her feel uncomfortable.

"I don't care for any dinner," she said; "I'm not hungry."

"Well, I am, then; so come. Do you like oysters?"

"Yea."

"Cook them splendidly. Best place in the city. And you'd like to get into a store or learn a trade?"

"Yea."

"What trade did you think of?"

"None in particular."

"How would you like to get into a book-bindery? I know two or three girls in binderies, and they can make from five to ten dollars a week. It's the nicest, cleanest work I know of."

"Oh, do you?" returned Flora, with newly-awakened interest.

"Yea; we'll talk it all over while we're eating dinner. This way."

And Pinky turned the corner of a small street that led away from the more crowded thoroughfare along which they had been passing.

"It's a quiet and retired place, where only the nicest kind of people go," she added. "Many working-girls and girls in stores get their dinners there. We'll meet some of them, no doubt; and if any that I know should happen in, we might hear of a good place. Just the thing, isn't it? I'm right glad I met you."

They had gone halfway down the square, when Pinky stopped before the shop of a confectioner. In the window was a display of cakes, pies and candies, and a sign with the words, "LADIES' RESTAURANT."

"This is the place," she said, and opening the door, passed in, the young stranger following.

A sign of caution, unseen by Flora, was made to a girl who stood behind the counter. Then Pinky turned, saying: "How will you have your oysters? stewed, fried, broiled or roasted?"

"I'm not particular—any way," replied Flora.

"I liked them fried. Will you have them the same way?"

Flora nodded assent.

"Let them be fried, then. Come, we'll go up-stairs. Anybody there?"

"Two or three only."

"Any girls from the bindery?"

"Yea; I think so."

"Oh, I'm glad of that! Want to see some of them. Come, Miss Bond."

And Pinky, after a whispered word to the attendant, led the way to a room up-stairs in which were a number of small tables. At one of these were two girls eating, at another a girl sitting by herself, and at another a young man and a girl. As Pinky and her companion entered, the inmates of the room stared at them familiarly, and then winked and leered at each other. Flora did not observe this, but she felt a sudden oppression and fear. They sat down at a table not far from one of the windows. Flora looked for the veil to be removed, so that she might see the face of her new friend. But Pinky kept it closely down.

In about ten minutes the oysters were served. Accompanying them were two glasses of some kind of liquor. Floating on one of these was a small bit of cork. Pinky took this and handed the other to her companion, saying: "Only a weak sangaree. It will refresh you after your fatigue; and I always like something with oysters, it helps to make them lay lighter on the stomach."

Meantime, one of the girls had crossed over and spoken to Pinky. After a word or two, the latter said: "Don't you work in a bindery, Miss Peter?"

"Yes," was answered, without hesitation.

"I thought so. Let me introduce you to my friend, Miss Flora Bond. She's from the country, and wants to get into some good establishment. She talked about a store, but I think a bindery is better."

"A great deal better," was replied by Miss Peter. "I've tried them both, and wouldn't go back to a store again on any account. If I can serve your friend, I shall be most happy."

"Thank you!" returned Flora; "you are very kind."

"Not at all; I'm always glad when I can be of service to any one. You think you'd like to go into a bindery?"

"Yes. I've come to the city to get employment, and haven't much choice."

"There's no place like the city," remarked the other. "I'd die in the country—nothing going on. But you won't stagnate here. When did you arrive?"

"To-day."

"Have you friends here?"

"No. I brought a letter of introduction to a lady who resides in the city."

"What's her name?"

"Mrs. Bray."

Miss Peter turned her head so that Flora could not see her face. It was plain from its expression that she knew Mrs. Bray.

"Have you seen her yet?" she asked.

"No. She was out when I called. I'm going back in a little while."

The girl sat down, and went on talking while the others were eating. Pinky had emptied her glass of sangaree before she was half through with her oysters, and kept urging Flora to drink.

"Don't be afraid of it, dear," she said, in a kind, persuasive way; "there's hardly a thimbleful of wine in the whole glass. It will soothe your nerves, and make you feel ever so much better."

There was something in the taste of the sangaree that Flora did not like—a flavor that was not of wine. But urged repeatedly by her companion, whose empty glass gave her encouragement and confidence, she sipped and drank until she had taken the whole of it. By this time she was beginning to have a sense of fullness and confusion in the head, and to feel oppressed and uncomfortable. Her appetite suddenly left her, and she laid down her knife and fork and leaned her head upon her hand.

"What's the matter?" asked Pinky.

"Nothing," answered the girl; "only my head feels a little strangely. It will pass off in a moment."

"Riding in the cars, maybe," said Pinky. "I always feel bad after being in the cars; it kind of stirs me up."

Flora sat very quietly at the table, still resting her head upon her hands. Pinky and the girl who had joined them exchanged looks of intelligence. The former had drawn her veil partly aside, yet concealing as much as possible the bruises on her face.

"My! but you're battered!" exclaimed Miss Peter, in a whisper that was unheard by Flora.

Pinky only answered by a grimace. Then she said to Flora, with well-affected concern: "I'm afraid you are ill, dear? How do you feel?"

"I don't know," answered the poor girl, in a voice that betrayed great anxiety, if not alarm. "It came over me all at once. I'm afraid that wine was too strong; I am not used to taking anything."

"Oh, dear no! it wasn't that. I drank a glass, and don't feel it any more than if it had been water."

"Let's go," said Flora, starting up. "Mrs. Bray must be home by this time."

"All right, if you feel well enough," returned Pinky, rising at the same time.

"Oh, dear! how my head swims!" exclaimed Flora, putting both hands to her temples. She stood for a few moments in an uncertain attitude, then reached out in a blind, eager way.

Pinky drew quickly to her side, and put one arm about her waist.

"Come," she said, "the air is too close for you here;" and with the assistance of the girl who had joined them, she steadied Flora down-stairs.

"Doctored a little too high;" whispered Miss Peter, with her mouth close to Pinky's ear.

"All right," Pinky whispered back; "they know how to do it."

At the foot of the stairs Pinky said: "You take her out through the yard, while I pay for the oysters. I'll be with you in a moment."

Poor Flora was already too much confused by the drugged liquor she had taken to know what they were doing with her.

Hastily paying for the oysters and liquor, Pinky was on hand in a few moments. From the back door of the house they entered a small yard, and passed from this through a gate into a narrow private alley shut in on each side by a high fence. This alley ran for a considerable distance, and had many gates opening into it from yards, hovels and rear buildings, all of the most forlorn and wretched character. It terminated in a small street.

Along this alley Pinky and the girl she had met at the restaurant supported Flora, who was fast losing strength and consciousness. When halfway down, they held a brief consultation.

"It won't do," said Pinky, "to take her through to — Street. She's too far gone, and the police will be down on us and carry her off."

"Norah's got some place in there," said the other, pointing to an old wooden building close by.

"I'm out with Norah," replied Pinky, "and don't mean to have anything more to do with her."

"Where's your room?"

"That isn't the go. Don't want her there. Pat Maley's cellar is just over yonder. We can get in from the alley."

"Pat's too greedy a devil. There wouldn't be anything left of her when he got through. No, no, Pinky; I'll have nothing to do with it if she's to go into Pat Maley's cellar."

"Not much to choose between 'em," answered Pinky. "But it won't do to parley here. We must get her in somewhere."

And she pushed open a gate as she spoke. It swung back on one hinge and struck the fence with a bang, disclosing a yard that beggared description in its disorder and filth. In the back part of this yard was a one-and-a-half-story frame building, without windows, looking more like an old chicken-house or pig-stye than a place for human beings to live in. The loft over the first story was reached by a ladder on the outside. Above and below the hovel was laid off in kind of stalls or bunks furnished with straw. There were about twenty of these. It was a ten-cent lodging-house, filled nightly. If this wretched hut or stye—call it what you will—had been torn down, it would not have brought ten dollars as kindling-wood. Yet its owner, a gentleman (?) living handsomely up town, received for it the annual rent of two hundred and fifty dollars. Subletted at an average of two dollars a night, it gave an income of nearly seven hundred dollars a year. It was known as the "Hawk's Nest," and no bird of prey ever had a fouler nest than this.

As the gate banged on the fence a coarse, evil-looking man, wearing a dirty Scotch cap and a red shirt, pushed his head up from the cellar of the house that fronted on the street.

"What's wanted?" he asked, in a kind of growl, his upper lip twitching and drawing up at one side in a nervous way, letting his teeth appear.

"We want to get this girl in for a little while," said Pinky. "We'll take her away when she comes round. Is anybody in there?" and she pointed to the hovel.

The man shook his head.

"How much?" asked Pinky.

"Ten cents apiece," and he held out his hand.

Pinky gave him thirty cents. He took a key from his pocket, and opened the door that led into the lower room. The stench that came out as the door swung back was dreadful. But poor Flora Bond was by this time so relaxed in every muscle, and so dead to outward things, that it was impossible to get her any farther. So they bore her into this horrible den, and laid her down in one of the stalls on a bed of loose straw. Inside, there was nothing but these stalls and straw—not a table or chair, or any article of furniture. They filled up nearly the entire room, leaving only a narrow passage between them. The only means of ventilation was by the door.

As soon as Pinky and her companion in this terrible wickedness were alone with their victim, they searched her pocket for the key of her travelling-bag. On finding it, Pinky was going to open it, when the other said: "Never mind about that; we can examine her baggage in a safer place. Let's go for the movables."

And saying this, she fell quickly to work on the person of Flora, slipping out the ear-rings first, then removing her breast-pin and finger-rings, while Pinky unbuttoned the new gaiter boots, and drew off both boots and stockings, leaving upon the damp straw the small, bare feet, pink and soft almost as a baby's.

It did not take these harpies five minutes to possess themselves of everything but the poor girl's dress and undergarments. Cloth oversack, pocket-book, collar, linen cuffs, hat, shoes and stockings—all these were taken.

"Hallow!" cried the keeper of this foul den as the two girls hurried out with the travelling-bag and a large bundle sooner than he had expected; and he came quickly forth from the cellar in which he lived like a cruel spider and tried to intercept them, but they glided through the gate and were out of his reach before he could get near. He could follow them only with obscene invectives and horrible oaths. Well he knew what had been done—that there had been a robbery in the "Hawk's Nest," and he not in to share the booty.

Growling like a savage dog, this wretch, in whom every instinct of humanity had long since died—this human beast, who looked on innocence and helplessness as a wolf looks upon a lamb—strode across the yard and entered the den. Lying in one of the stalls upon the foul, damp straw he found Flora Bond. Cruel beast that he was, even he felt himself held back as by an invisible hand, as he looked at the pure face of the insensible girl. Barely had his eyes rested on a countenance so full of innocence. But the wolf has no pity for the lamb, nor the hawk for the dove. The instinct of his nature quickly asserted itself.

Avarice first. From the face his eyes turned to see what had been left by the two girls. An angry imprecation fell from his lips when he saw how little remained for him. But when he lifted Flora's head and unbound her hair, a gleam of pleasure came into his foul face. It was a full suit of rich chestnut brown, nearly three feet long, and fell in thick masses over her breast and shoulders. He caught it up eagerly, drew it through his great ugly hands, and gloated over it with something of a miser's pleasure as he counts his gold. Then taking a pair of scissors from his pocket, he ran them over the girl's head with the quickness and skill of a barber, cutting close down, that he might not lose even the sixteenth part of an inch of her rich tresses. An Indian scalping his victim could not have shown more eagerness. An Indian's wild pleasure was in his face as he lifted the heavy mass of brown hair and held it above his head. It was not a trophy—not a sign of conquest and triumph over an enemy—but simply plunder, and had a market value of fifteen or twenty dollars.

The dress was next examined; it was new, but not of a costly material. Removing this, the man went out with his portion of the spoils, and locked the door, leaving the half-clothed, unconscious girl lying on the damp, filthy straw, that swarmed with vermin. It was cold as well as damp, and the chill of a bleak November day began creeping into her warm blood. But the stupefying draught had been well compounded, and held her senses locked.

Of what followed we cannot write, and we shiver as we draw a veil over scenes that should make the heart of all Christendom ache—scenes that are repeated in thousands of instances year by year in our large cities, and no hand is stretched forth to succor and no arm to save. Under the very eyes of the courts and the churches things worse than we have described—worse than the reader can imagine—are done every day. The foul dens into which crime goes freely, and into which innocence is betrayed, are known to the police, and the evil work that is done is ever before them. From one victim to another their keepers pass unquestioned, and plunder, debauch, ruin and murder with an impunity frightful to contemplate. As was said by a distinguished author, speaking of a kindred social enormity, "There is not a country throughout the earth on which a state of things like this would not bring a curse. There is no religion upon earth that it would not deny; there is no people on earth that it would not put to shame."

And we are Christians!

No. Of what followed we cannot write. Those who were near the "Hawk's Nest" heard that evening, soon after nightfall, the single wild, prolonged cry of a woman. It was so full of terror and despair that even the hardened ears that heard it felt a sudden pain. But they were used to such things in that region, and no one took the trouble to learn what it meant. Even the policeman moving on his beat stood listening for only a moment, and then passed on.

Next day, in the local columns of a city paper, appeared the following:

"FOUL PLAY.—About eleven o'clock last night the body of a beautiful young girl, who could not have been over seventeen years of age, was discovered lying on the pavement in — street. No one knew how she came there. She was quite dead when found. There was nothing by which she could be identified. All her clothes but a single undergarment had been removed, and her hair cut off close to her head. There were marks of brutal violence on her person. The body was placed in charge of the coroner, who will investigate the matter."

On the day after, this paragraph appeared:

"SUSPICION OF FOUL PLAY.—The coroner's inquest elicited nothing in regard to the young girl mentioned yesterday as having been found dead and stripped of her clothing in — street. No one was able to identify her. A foul deed at which the heart shudders has been done; but the wretches by whom it was committed have been able to cover their tracks."

And that was the last of it. The whole nation gives a shudder of fear at the announcement of an Indian massacre and outrage. But in all our large cities are savages more cruel and brutal in their instincts than the Comanches, and they torture and outrage and murder a hundred poor victims for every one that is exposed to Indian brutality, and there comes no succor. Is it from ignorance of the fact? No, no, no! There is not a judge on the bench, not a lawyer at the bar, not a legislator at the State capital, not a mayor or police-officer, not a minister who preaches the Gospel of Christ, who came to seek and save, not an intelligent citizen, but knows of all this.

What then? Who is responsible? The whole nation arouses itself at news of an Indian assault upon some defenceless frontier settlement, and the general government sends troops to succor and to punish. But who takes note of the worse than Indian massacres going on daily and nightly in the heart of our great cities? Who hunts down and punishes the human wolves in our midst whose mouths are red with the blood of innocence? Their deeds of cruelty outnumber every year a hundred—nay, a thousand-fold the deeds of our red savages. Their haunts are known, and their work is known. They lie in wait for the unwary, they gather in the price of human souls, none hindering, at our very church-doors. Is no one responsible for all this? Is there no help? Is evil stronger than good, hell stronger than Heaven? Have the churches nothing to do in this matter? Christ came to seek and to save that which was lost—came to the lowliest, the poorest and the vilest, to those over whom devils had gained power, and cast out the devils. Are those who call themselves by His name diligent in the work to which He put His blessed hands? Millions of dollars go yearly into magnificent churches, but how little to the work of saving and succoring the weak, the helpless, the betrayed, the outcast and the dying, who lie uncared for at the mercy of human fiends, and often so near to the temples of God that their agonized appeals for help are drowned by the organ and choir!

REAL sorrow is almost as difficult to discover as real poverty. An instinctive delicacy hides the rage of the one and the wounds of the other.

THE DEACON'S HOUSEHOLD.

BY PIPSESIWAY POTTS.

No. V.

I AM vexed with girls saying: "Oh, it's good enough for everyday!" A girl will set the table for dinner, and as she throws the dirty cloth on in a careless, untidy way, stained with coffee and eggs and fruit juices, she will say: "It's good enough for everyday—nobody here but our own folks!"

As she puts on the cream-pitcher, minus a handle, or the sugar-bowl, with a broken lid, she thinks, "Oh, there'll be nobody here this time!"

She waits on the table without having brushed her hair, or put on a fresh collar; with, maybe, a button or two off her dress—but she thinks, "Heh, only our own folks!"

Oh, my dear girl, don't do it! How can your parents admire you, or your brothers and sisters feel proud of you, and what a low estimate of womankind you are giving them to carry out into the world with them. When you do this, you do not respect yourself. You feel as mean as you look. Don't allow yourself to have "company manners"—be neat and lady-like all the time—use good language, and encourage your family in doing the same.

Some girls always have to run and hide, or "fix up," whenever they hear a rap at the door. How common, when there is a rap, to hear girls say, "Oh, you go—see how awful I do appear!"

"Oh, no, you; my head's not seen a comb to-day!" "Oh, look at this old rag of a dress! I can't go—so, there, now!"

This is a bad state of affairs.

Farmers' wives and daughters have said to me, "I can't go looking neat about my work. I have to milk and bake and churn and feed pigs; how can I? If you were in my place, you'd see."

I've been over every inch of ground you tell of, and I only know of one kind of work in which a woman may appear like a fright, and really, in that case, she is excusable—that is, picking geese. Dence take the geese! I say—member in good standing in the regular Baptist Church, as I am—I do say it!

I wish a Yankee would invent a machine into which a goose could be thrust, and come out picked as bare as my hand, with its tail cut off behind its ears!

I knew of a young man once who saw his betrothed picking geese, and the sight affected him so that his love all evaporated—he hadn't a grain left.

To a woman who says she can't see how a farmer's wife or daughter can be tidily dressed while employed with all sorts of work, we say: Calico is cheap, and plain, neat dresses easily made; have plenty of them, then. You can have two or three large, white aprons with ties, half a dozen collars made to pin on in a trice, and you can take time enough to brush your hair smoothly early in the morning, when you wash. If you are churning and working butter, put your sleeves up—the best plan is to roll them back, as you turn back a wide cuff, if only shoved up they will slip down every two minutes.

If carrying off buttermilk, or the milk after skimming, be careful and not fill your pails too full to carry without stopping.

If your dress is long, and you are working in the cellar or spring-house, pin it back in front and catch it up behind, and let your wide apron cover all.

If your breastpin and ear-drops are not too elaborate, or too valuable, wear them about your work.

Just look as pretty as you please, and as sweet as you can—never mind what the old croakers say. Jewelry is not out of place for everyday wear. But, girls, don't let this suggestion of mine make you loiter before the glass.

Don't you see that this is all easily done, and you are looking neat while at work? Clean dress, and wide apron, and collar, and smooth hair, and jewelry—and, if your arms are bare, I'm sure they are pretty. You would need no change at all if your pastor or friend or a book agent were to call. So, girls, teach yourselves the habit of neatness; don't be so slovenly that you will have to run and hide when any person comes.

At this season of the year, when people use salt fish, many are not aware that there is a right and a wrong way of freshening fish. Those who have seen the process of evaporating salt at the salt-works, know that the salt falls to the bottom. Just so it is in the crock where your mackerel or white fish lies soaking. If it lies with the skin-side down, the salt will fall to the skin and there remain; when, if placed with the flesh-side down, the salt falls to the bottom of the crock, and the fish comes out freshened, as it should be. In the other case, it is nearly as salty as when first put in the water.

Use fish and fowl and wild meat and mutton and beef in preference to fat pork at this season, if you can get it.

Avoid fat meat, rich cakes, pies, puddings, and live simply and naturally. Use your canned fruit now, with baked apples, tomatoes, pickles in moderation, buttermilk cheese with cream over it, custards, and all these things that people don't eat in the winter. Use green vegetables, but eat all kinds of food in moderation—leave the table feeling a little hungry. Any man or woman who overeats is not a whit better than the man who overdrinks, and tumbles into the ditch—drunk. Both are simply intemperance.

No one would guess what was the last job of work

I did. Why making a cushion for father and me to sit on when we ride to Baptist meeting! We have always sat on a comfort or a blanket, but after I saw the cushion that Sister Hartman made I thought we must have one like it. I will tell you how they are made. She took all the little fragments and ravelings and odds and ends left after making her last web of carpet, shook them well, out in the wind, dropping from one basket to another, so as to get out every bit of dust, threw out every hem, and seam, and thick place, and then spread them evenly on a piece of coffee sacking that was put in the frames, the same as a quilt. Cover with gay calico, or patchwork, or black cloth, and quilt it, or catch it in places the same as a comfort. Ours is as nice a cushion as goes to that church.

A mattress for a lounge can be made this way, or square or long cushions for old easy chairs, or one to lay in the bottom of the baby's crib. Care should be taken to spread the rags evenly and lightly.

While I worked at this, Ida made a mat to lie beside by writing-desk. She took sacking, covered it with calico, and then sewed bright bits of flannel and merino and opera cloth all over it. It is very neat. Lily is making one to put beside the deacon's bed, and granny is making her own. There is such a fellow feeling among us that we like to work at the same kind of employment.

One of the nicest desserts that I know of for a cosey tea table is to take sound sweet apples, bake them slowly till soft, set them away till cold, then peel the skin off neatly and slice them as you would peaches. Serve with rich cream and white sugar.

This is but little inferior to a dish of fresh peaches and cream.

With your boiled dinners don't forget to have grated horseradish and vinegar. Don't scrape, but use a grater. One of our boarders once brought me this recipe from his good old mother. I never tried it, but I know it is good.

For horseradish sauce, grate a heaping tablespoonful very fine, put it in your sauce tureen with a teaspoonful of made mustard, a teaspoonful of salt, two tablespoonfuls of good vinegar and four tablespoonfuls of rich cream.

Girls, I want you to turn over a new leaf—that's so. If I didn't love every blessed girl of you, I would not insist on it.

How many of you cut into the work that must be done, and get it all out of the way by the time the dinner dishes are washed, and are then ready to put on cool, clean dresses and sit down and sew and rest and read?

Now I don't want a nose to turn up, or any one to begin to whine out, "Oh, it takes so long to get through with our work! If you only knew, Pipey, how it goes!"

I do know every inch of the ground, child, for I've worked the best years of my life slavishly, from the early dawn till bedtime, without taking off the harness or slacking my pace at all. I did not work systematically, and did a good deal of unnecessary work.

Have a day set to wash; sort the washing the night before, putting the white clothes to soak in warm water, if convenient, in which you have dissolved a bit of chloride of lime, or put spirits of ammonia, or spirits of turpentine—a spoonful to a quart of soap—get to washing early, and have it done before noon. Iron Tuesday morning.

While ironing, and you have a hot fire, it is a good time to bake a custard, or a pudding, or to stew a few handfuls of dried fruit, ready for supper.

If stewing peaches, plums, apples or berries, and you want a change, add a handful of prunes, raisins, English currants, or something to change the flavor. Don't stir your fruit while it is cooking, just shake the stew-pan so as not to break the fruit. Set it away to cool; sprinkle white sugar over it when brought to the table.

By good management you can generally get your jobs of work all out of the way by one o'clock; then wash, and fix your hair, and dress up pretty, and sit down and read and sew. You must take time to read, to store your mind and to be intelligent.

I wonder how many women there are who took the trouble to inform themselves what the Credit Mobilier was, or who knew what the Louisiana imbroiglio meant? And yet every woman of us should know—so intelligently, too, that we could talk about it. Yes, it is our business, too. I heard what you muttered in your far-off homes. If we cannot understand these topics that loom up so suddenly in the financial and political world, we should not hesitate to go to the most obliging man in our neighborhood and say: "I don't know what this means; I wish you would simplify it more than the papers do, so I can understand it; talk it as though I were a little child." After you know, be sure and tell it to your brothers and sisters; make them comprehend it. Never feel ashamed to confess your ignorance or to ask others to enlighten you. Many a big brother is not posted on public questions and affairs, and he is ashamed when among men who talk on these themes and he finds himself left out and unnoticed.

Don't let this be so, girls; do all you can to develop their minds, to enlarge their capacities for understanding, to make them grow up the full stature of a noble and intellectual manhood.

If they may not develop into men of intellect, they may make practical men of sterling good sense, and that is far better than a great mind ill-balanced, fickle, visionary.

Remember, just as far as possible, in that which is good, and noble, and elevating, to lead your brothers and sisters along with you. If you find a choice poem, read it aloud to them, it will make it ten times better to you; point out the beautiful places, the finest thoughts, and draw their attention to the poet's manner of expression.

Don't allow them to indulge in unjust suspicions of others; teach them not to gossip, not to be the first to tell an evil tale, or even to mention it to another.

I do believe our brothers will be just what we sisters make them.

What a fearful responsibility rests upon us!

I think light lawns or prints or white jaconets make such pretty wrappers for women to wear in the warm afternoons, even elderly women as well as girls. Because a woman is old it is no excuse for wearing sober browns, and dead grays, when light, airy lawns are so much cooler. If you are a real old lady, and think a white lawn with brown or purple dots in it is too gay, you can tone it down with a black silk apron, or a black velvet bow to fasten your collar. That will give it the matronly air of respectability or discretion or propriety, or whatever you think it lacks. Yes, by all means let the mothers and grandmothers dress cool and summery.

One of the prettiest wrappers I ever saw, Ida made out of a white barred jaconet dress that was made the old-fashioned way with a very full skirt. It is cut to half fit the figure, sloping behind and at the sides, but loose in front. She trimmed it down the front and around the bottom with a two-inch wide bias strip of buff chambray, tied it with a ribbon of the same color round the waist, and had the collar fastened with a bow of buff ribbon.

Where the skirt had to be pieced it came in the waist, and was so matched that the seams fell in the bars and didn't show.

I know there are some days in which the work cannot all be done by noon, but they are only occasional ones. Women should take better care of themselves and try and preserve their good looks and their elasticity of spirits, and not sink into premature old age.

I feel very sorry for women who have not time to read. I know those who have little children can hardly find a quiet hour, unless it be at night, and then it is not good for weary eyes to read much by lamplight.

When these three children were small I had little time to read except when I was churning. I always felt so glad when the whole family were abed; I would bring out the rocking-chair, trim the lamp, draw up the footstool, open the fresh, new Tribune and other late papers, and my happiness was complete.

But I was tired, and should have been in bed, and the penalty of nature's violated laws was paid by long weeks spent away from my dear ones in a strange city, under the care of a distinguished oculist. That was very hard and cost me many bitter tears.

When reading and the eyes begin to itch, or require frequent rubbing, or the print blurs and the lines all run together, that instant desist and go out into the cool air. If persisted in the result may prove fatal.

An old schoolmate of mine, a beautiful brown-eyed, happy girl, lost one eye entirely, and rendered the other defective by copying a braiding pattern—holding it up against a pane in the window.

She said when relating it: "I was very tired that afternoon, and a little out of humor and was determined to get it copied before night. It was an intricate pattern and hard to follow. My eyes itched so that I had to rub them every minute—that only vexed me the more, and I doggedly resolved that nothing should hinder me."

It was a fearful price she paid—her marvellous beauty was turned into repulsiveness which the brown goggles only enhanced.

Oh, our eyes are so precious that we cannot be too careful of them!

I have told you how handy it was to have putty on hand all the time.

I put some glass in the windows yesterday in a few minutes and did it quite as well as a man would have done it.

I said to Rube: "How do you soften putty that has been mixed up a good while?"

"Can't be done at all, unless you pound it all up fine and put oil with it and mix it over again."

Now I didn't half believe that, and as soon as he went out I opened the tin can in which I kept the putty, wrapped up as when I bought it, broke off a piece held it in hot water, worked it awhile, heated it again, and it was soon as soft as when first mixed.

After I had put in the glass I took the remaining putty, mended a leak in a pan, a hole in the foot-tub, and went about making myself generally useful.

I dread people who have hobbies worse than those who have contagious diseases.

There's old Byron Fisher and his wife, who live over on the Ridge, now they think that an ointment they call "Newton's grease," will cure everything, no matter what it is.

Why, I heard old Brother Fisher say once, right in covenant meeting, that he owed his life to Newton's grease and the Lord!

I went over there the other evening to get some pink-roots, and they asked me how my catarrh was. I told them it was about the same, sometimes very bad, then again I hardly felt it; that I experienced the most trouble from my asthma. Even then I was wheezing like a dilapidated old bellows, from my walk up hill.

"You can be cured of both, and it won't cost you mor'n a quarter," said he, sitting down, leaning back and sticking his feet up on a line with our faces.

Positively, I would have given our last year's files of the Baptist Banner to have seen the hind legs of his chair slip and let him down suddenly, the low-bred old backslider!

"All you have to do," said he, "is to take about three spoonfuls of Newton's grease, melt it, and snuff it up your nose as hot as you can bear it. For the sake of gettin' well, you could stand it pretty hot, you know; and for the asthma I would advise you to rub it on well all over your breast and throat, and up under your ears, and take about a table-spoonful inwardly three times a day."

That riled me, and I up and said: "Brother Fisher, do you suppose I have no feelings at all? I'd hug my catarrh, and rejoice and gloat over my asthma, and feel rich in their possession, before I'd treat my sensitive mortal frame with such indignity! I, a woman in good standing in the church? Never!"

"I don't insist on it," said he; "it's none of my business; but here it is before you, life and health and strength, or a poor patched-up, old frame, not able to stand anything—a wheezing around this way!"

I smiled, and turned the subject, though I felt as if my eyes snapped fire.

Sister Fisher sat combing her hair; it was long and even, and I couldn't help admiring it. I said, "Your hair is very beautiful for a woman of your age. I don't see how you keep it looking so bright and glossy."

She laughed, a little embarrassed sniff, and said she took good care of it.

"Well, tell the whole truth," said he, looking as though I were his victim; "she never dyes her hair, just uses Newton's grease pretty freely; that answers the same as a dye, with none of its bad effects, and perfumes it agreeably, besides," and he looked at my thin, scraggy hair.

Just as we came out of the garden with the pink-roots, Dick and Chub came home from school.

"Our Chub was sick in school, to-day," said Dick.

"What 'peared to be the matter?" said old Byron, brightening up with the prospect of a case.

"Oh, jus' sick, and didn't want to play, or nothin'."

The father laid his hand roughly on the child's forehead, and turned his head back, bringing the little wan, pinched faced up into full view, and said, "Oh, it's wor-rums, I know by the white about his mouth—nothing but wor-rums; come in, son, I'll cure you in no time."

The child put up his lip pitifully, and clung to the mother's skirts.

"Come right along; none 'o your sniffin', or I'll 'tend to you in a way that'll quicken yer paces," said old Blue Beard.

"Oh, I don't want to take any more o' Newton's grease. I don't want to father; oh—oh!"

"Yes, you will, too! Chubbuck! come here this minute, or I'll whale you like a sack!" said the inhuman father.

I hurried away. As I closed the gate, it creaked on its rude wooden hinges with a doleful squall. I couldn't help it, really; I hailed out, "Brother Fisher; ho! Brother Fisher! your gate needs a dose of Newton's grease!"

Oh, but the old fellow did cast a vengeful, black glance at me! He looked as if—had he not been a member of Pottsville church—he would have told me with infinite relish, to go to some place not half so comfortable as home.

It is strange to what extremes some people do go with their particular whims.

This morning father said, "I dreamed last night that I was sleeping with the boys—one on each side of me."

"What boys?" I said.

"Oh, my oldest brothers," he replied, and his eyes were as bright and full of joy as though his dream had been a reality.

His brothers! boys!—both were dead, and both elderly men when they died; but in dreams they were little boys again. He had been carried back, gently and kindly and tenderly—sixty years.

The dream still seemed touched with reality, and under its influence he fell into talking about old times—of his birthplace, Montpelier; of the old farm in Essex Co., N. Y.; of the view of Lake Champlain, and of the long, wearisome journey to Ohio. But most, he dwelt on that theme, the boys. He laughed, and said, "I'll never forget what my Brother Clark said an hour or two after we had left Essex County, and started on our Ohioward journey. Clark was four or five years old, and had left a very dear little playmate of about his own age. He was sitting on his mother's lap, in the forepart of the wagon, and after they had ridden a few miles, the little fellow sighed, looked up into his mother's face, and said, 'I wonder if I'd know Lan Dowlan if I'd see him now!'"

Every day does this truth unfold itself to me plainer than ever: how very tenderly do the aged father and mother hold in the bonds of the most sacred affection their grown children! I am pained and amazed when I think of it. I cannot laugh, and am touched most tenderly with the story of the old mother buying a hat for her boy.

After she had bought a lot of things, she said, "Oh, I want a hat for Bub!" The clerk brought out some little boys' hats; they were too small. He brought others, but they were not large enough. At last the stock of boys' hats were exhausted, as was the patience of the clerk, and he said, in a waspish way, "Is your boy's head the usual size?" She assured him it was. No hat could be found to suit, and at last he said, "Why, we have all sizes and all kinds of hats; what is the age of your son?" "He is a little past thirty," was the meek reply of the loving mother.

To the fond mother, he, the rough, bronzed, bearded man, was "Bub, my boy!"

How beautiful is such a love shined in the heart of a dear old mother! What agony for parents to feel that their children have grown away from them, that they don't need them, that they slight their commands and look upon them quite as they do upon others.

In making pies of rhubarb, don't forget to add a handful of raisins. If you stew the rhubarb first, and let it stand till cold it will not require as much sugar to sweeten it.

Cranberries should always be cooked, whether for pies, tarts or sauce; for, by boiling the sugar in, you have a fine jelly when cold, that would have been a thin juice if sweetened after being removed from the fire.

When a recipe reads "one cup of butter," quite one half of that can be good, sweet lard. Sweet white lard, if salted, is quite as good as butter for many kinds of common cake; it is even considered better by some, as it makes the cake more moist.

Molasses can be used instead of sugar, by being boiled and set away for that purpose.

I never could make that exceedingly nice kind of pie-crust, like some women do, it seems such a fussy way that I cannot have patience.

This is my way of making it, and I shouldn't wonder if it was good, for I often hear the girls say: "Oh, don't our Pipeey's pies taste good! I don't like other folks' pies half as well as I do ours."

I told you somewhere in this article not to eat pies, but I know you will do it, and, if you must, I'd rather you'd eat good ones.

In making pies, always mix your crust with pure cold water, rubbing just as little lard into the flour as will do. Make the undercrust only short enough to cut easily, it is more healthy than when made rich and short—and the undercrusts of pies are bad enough at best.

For the topcrust take the remainder of your dough on the pie-board, roll very thin, spread all over with a little lard or butter, then sprinkle on a good bit of flour, all over evenly, so much that you cannot see the butter or lard at all.

Then begin at one side, roll up tightly, let it lie a few minutes, then cut crosswise of the roll pieces large enough for an uppercrust, tip each piece upon the end, sprinkle well with flour, roll out to a desirable thickness, and cover your pie.

When baked, this crust will be white and flaky, and will break when cut as though very short. A nice-looking crust is made which is both economical and wholesome.

In rolling puff paste, always roll from you. In making any kind of juicy pies, have the oven hot by time the pies are made, else the lower crust will be sodden.

In baking bread, pies and cakes, if they are likely to burn or bake too fast, you must lay a piece of brown paper on them. To tell if a loaf or a cake is done, thrust a broom-splint down through the thickest place; if it comes out perfectly clean and smooth, it is done.

I did want to tell you how to wear your hair a pretty way, but this is not the place to tell it.

ALICE AND PHOEBE CARY, AND THEIR FRIENDS.

BY VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.

MRS. MARY CLEMMER AMES has done her sex an inestimable service in her touching Memorial of Alice and Phoebe Cary.

The brothers of the dead sisters were peculiarly happy in their choice of a biographer. Mrs. Ames's relations with the two had been those of the closest possible intimacy. She was for long periods an inmate of their household. She had seen them under all the hard, disenchanting lights of everyday life. She knew these two women of whom she writes with such tender consecration of love and memory, as few women, except those nearest of kin, can know each other; had seen them amid all their domestic perplexities and anxieties and burdens. She had beheld both sides of the pattern—and every life has two—and knew amid what cares, and dreariness, and heartaches the workers wrought, with patient toil combining the shades and fashioning the web.

Hence the pictures of the lives of these two women and artists have all a kind of pre-Raphaelite minuteness and fidelity of touch.

"Every man's life," says some author, "is so largely made up of common-place things, resembles so much in its outward circumstances the lines about him, that it is impossible he should seem heroic or grand to those who are in daily intimacy with him."

This rule, so true in the main, seems to have met with an exception in the case of the Cary sisters.

No garish daylight, no familiarity and "commonness" of habit and living, has darkened the ideal which Mrs. Ames sees in these two women. Of course it might have been there all the same, and other eyes not had the power to discern it.

No doubt plenty of men and women knew Alice and Phoebe Cary who never saw, in their lives and characters, precisely what Mrs. Ames has shown us in this memorial; yet that does not prove that all did not exist there which her fine sympathetic intuition discovered.

Some critic says that she has made heroines of these two women. If she has, she has proved them heroic.

The whole book is evidently a work of love. It almost seems as you read, that you can hear the warm, throbbing heart of the woman, if you only put your ear to the pages and listen. And they who inspired this ideal affection, and held it amid all the toil and struggle and dreary "commonness" of such lives as yours and mine, must have been worthy of it.

Mrs. Ames's love is courageous. She is not content, as too many biographers are, with showing her characters on the stage merely, with the lights and music, the crowds and the applause.

Her picture of the two sisters after the long day's work was over, coming together in the soft twilight, and reading to each other in their musical, halfdeprecating tones the poems they had written since the morning, is as tender and beautiful as it is unique in literary history; but the writer takes us with her friends to the market, into the kitchen, through the bustle and perplexity of the annual "dressmaking," seats us at the breakfast-table. And if she shows us how Alice and Phoebe Cary carried themselves in their pleasant parlors, among a circle of the most gifted men and women of the land, she shows us also how they behaved to their employees and servants. They could bear that fine touchstone of true manhood or ladyhood, they respected the individuality of their inferiors as much as they did their own.

Alice and Phoebe Cary were still young women when they came from their Western home on the Ohio bottoms, to raise their roof-tree in New York. What courage and faith it required to undertake that! The more I think of it the more I am impressed with the indomitable bravery and energy of these sisters; especially the elder one, for Alice seems to have been the prime mover in this enterprise.

Many a strong man might have shrunk from the burden which this delicate, shrinking woman took upon her frail shoulders. Of course, those people who imagine that an author "writes as a bird sings," and "coins ducats" with every line, will see nothing wonderful in the purpose and success of these women; but to others who know something of the usual awards of literary labor, and what it meant to "feed a family from an inkstand," as Jerrold Douglas wittily says, there will be something morally heroic in the purpose of these sisters.

They were not romantic dreamers, these young Western women, who came to build their nest somewhere in the heart of the great, noisy Babel of New York; coming alone, too, for they had few friends at that time, and their whole capital lay in a pen, that tiniest of the world's weapons, and its mightiest.

The history of their childhood and youth is almost as harrowing as that of the triumvirate of gifted sisters, of whom Charlotte Bronte was the eldest.

To think of such a soul as Alice Cary living for so many years a life of such bare, grim poverty and grinding toil; with her inborn idealism; her yearning for culture and recognition; her writing her songs after the day's heavy drudgery was done, "by a saucer of lard, with a bit of rag for wick, when a candle was depied her!"

The history of authors, "sickening," as Longfellow says it is, has few more pathetic pictures than this one of the young poetess, in that lonely, brown homestead, which her own songs and her sister's were yet to make immortal.

But, at last, the music that was in her so deep and strong made its way into utterance in such a sweet, full tide, that the world stood still and listened, and before the voice grew silent Alice Cary stood at the head of American poetesses.

Mrs. Ames may well say that "the fine feminine gold of Alice Cary's nature was set in a will of iron." Otherwise, she never could have conquered the place in the world, and did the work there which she did. Yet, an ineffable sadness clings to this book. Her life was certainly a success. She had genius, fame, money, devoted friends. She was the leader of a choice literary circle in the greatest American city, and yet what a sweet, sad, weary face looks out upon us from all the pages of this biography until we follow it to its still sleep, beneath the grassy slope at Greenwood.

For all that, Alice Cary's was a grand, heroic life. It gives no uncertain wound, as it strikes into the clangor and trumpeting of the world's great battle, with its strong, heroic note. It was her pen which bought the pleasant home on Twentieth street, and kept all its machinery in admirable working order, and made the rooms bright with art and ornament; and made them, also, a centre of attraction to men and women of the most varied culture and gifts, until, perhaps, the greatest of them wrote, "It was the sunniest drawing-room to be found between the King's Bridge and the Battery."

And overhead, in her own pleasant room, which ran the depth of the house, Alice Cary sat day after day, year in and year out, behind the drawn blinds, busy with the pen, which was the fountain head of the family resources. Of course, she wrote too much for her fame, as everybody must who writes for money. Yet, what sweet songs bloomed perpetually out of the singer's heart! How they shook the air all over the land, and fell upon tired, aching souls, as light falls with healing and warmth and gladness.

The singer must have woven her own heart and life into the strain. It is a wonder that either held out so long with that perpetual strain upon them. She literally wore herself into the grave. The noise and clamor of the great city went on day after day, and far into the heart of the night, underneath those windows, where the quiet woman sat, with her sweet, sad face, and her marvellous eyes, whose beauty and radiance seemed something lost out of Heaven and wove her songs.

The springs came with their voices of birds, and rolled their billowy grasses and leaves all over the land; and the summers, with all their glories of light and blossoms for the country, and their hot, stifling days and nights for the great city, followed by autumns, with the splendors of their sunsets and the nectar of their morning airs; and the winter, darkened down at last with its winds and snows—and through all, she, who sang with felicitous sweetness of each, sat there writing poem after poem for the Atlantic and the Ledger, Harper's Magazine, and the Independent, and the poems would fall like the fresh singing of larks into human hearts, and into all the pain and sadness and denial of human lives, and help them to bear and work; but Alice Cary would never rise up and go out to all the sweet invitations of the great, glad nature which scattered its largess of leaves and blossoms over the hills and meadows, for the tired heart and the fainting feet, until at last both grew still.

"I take more interest," she wrote, "in life; in all that concerns it, and in human beings every year that I live. If I fail of bringing something worthy to pass, I don't mean that it shall be for lack of energy or industry."

So the masterful will welded into the delicate feminine nature, held her on her way and to her work, until that, at last, fell from her stiffening fingers.

"She had settled so deeply into one groove of life and labor," says Mrs. Ames, "there seemed to be no mortal power that could wrest her out of it. She needed sunshine; she needed fresher, purer air; she needed change and rest; she needed a will wiser and more potent than her own to convince her of the inexorable laws of human life, and then compel her to their obedience."

So her lyrics grew and blossomed and floated broadcast like May petals all over the land. The critics shook their heads and said she wrote too much, and so she did. She was forced to it by hard necessity. "Her name was seen in print too often. This is one of the heaviest penalties which genius incurs in earning its living by a pen."

But, after all, the "common people" listened gladly. The lyrics of that fair, pale woman, seated behind the city blinds, floated up like summer winds laden with meadow clover, into lonely attics where weary women sat bending over their toil, into rough cabins and log-houses out on our frontiers, they nestled, like doves under the eaves, in the souls of care-worn men and women, and wherever they went they sang of hope and faith and courage, and in one way or another the refrain always fell: "I will be glad that I live and must die."

I never—and this will be a lifelong regret—met Alice Cary but once.

I stood, years ago, one summer morning at the door of the house on Twentieth Street, fortified with a letter of introduction to one or both of the sisters.

I was shown into the pleasant parlor, and its mistress came to meet me. I have forgotten almost everything but the face of Alice Cary as it shone on me for the first and last time. Such a fine, sweet, sad face as it was, with such a depth of tender radiance in those dark, mournful eyes. They were the windows through which you looked into the woman's soul. No words, at least none of mine, can describe their splendid beauty. It made you at once sad and glad to gaze into them.

Nothing could exceed the quiet cordiality of her manner. I felt at home with her in a moment, and we talked almost like old friends, though that was our first meeting, and proved to be our last.

Such a sincere, simple, earnest soul as I found that morning! She said she did her writing early in the day, and one would have fancied, by the way she alluded to this "writing," that it was a very small feature, and occupied a very small place in her life; yet we all know what a painstaking, earnest worker she was. But it was not in that finely-organized, tender nature to make her own affairs salient in the talk.

There was something half queenly in her quiet, gracious dignity. No doubt the circumstances of her life and some melancholy vein in her own temperament had given a slight touch of morbidness to her whole character.

Her earlier poems are pitched too often in a morbid minor key, but through all what a brave, cheerful, helpful strain flows and sings.

And Alice Cary's lyrics were the "rhythmic echo" of her own soul.

There was an old French rule that no man should go from the monarch's presence with a sad heart, and so it seems to me that nobody could have left that tender, helpful presence without having its burdens, no matter how hardly they pressed, somewhat lightened.

We parted, I remember, with some half-formed plans of meeting again before the summer was over, and other summers brightened and faded, but their swift, flowing tide never drifted us together again; and so I never stood at the door of the house on Twentieth Street, over whose threshold so many of the world's famous men and women passed so often.

It was somewhere in the last May or June of Alice Cary's life that I met two of her most valued friends at a small dinner company: Horace Greeley and the poet, John G. Whittier. It had been, so his relatives informed me, a work of years and had required a good deal of diplomacy to beguile the Quaker poet from the shades of his quiet New England home to Brooklyn, where he had at last come on a brief visit.

Once there, however, he seemed quite at home with that thin, strong, keen face of his, and his simple, earnest manner. I remember how his poems rung their clear, sweet chimes through my thoughts, as I sat looking at the poet, and listening to his stories of the old days, when he stood with his handful of friends in the anti-slavery vanguard, and there were shouting mobs, and men and women fleeing for their lives, and persecutions and terrors. How like a dream it all seemed, and yet we could count on the fingers of one hand the decades within which it all happened!

How the poet's eyes blazed under their beetling brows as the old scenes came up and fired his soul!

Among his stories I remember one which went far back into the very dawn of our colonies, and was so full of tragic gloom and shifting lights of humor that I wondered if the whole would not blossom out sometime in some delicious old ballad, singing and sparkling with the very voices of winds and brooks and leaves through one's thoughts.

Whittier may have come upon the story in some musty old colonial record. At all events one could see, as he related the tale, that it had greatly impressed his imagination, and you will perceive what a rich quarry it afforded to his genius, though, so far as I know, the poet has never worked it.

A couple of friendless, hunted Quaker women had been brought before the colonial authorities on a charge of witchcraft.

None of the marks with which it was believed the devil always signed and sealed the compact between himself and his emissaries in the Black Art, were found, on investigation, on the persons of the accused.

But the colonial bench gravely delivered its opinion as not at all convinced the devil was not aware these women could serve his purpose better as Quakers than witches, and they were accordingly banished, in due form, from the settlements; and after enduring incredible hardships and exposure in the wilderness, they were received and hospitably entertained by the Indians.

This was the story which Whittier told—and these men were our forefathers!

It happened that Horace Greeley sat next me at the table that night, having come directly from the house on Twentieth street, where he had been admitted to Alice Cary's sick-room. The visit had made a powerful impression on him, and he seemed hardly willing to talk of anything else, though this was our first interview.

I seem to hear now the slow feminine tones of the man, so singularly at variance with his heavy, ponderous frame and gait, as he said, half to himself, half to me, in a voice balanced between amazement and regret: "Why, Alice Cary is really broken down! I never could have conceived that illness would so shatter a nervous system, as it seems to have done in her case. The least emotion overcomes her. There was Phoebe and the rest of the household running at her slightest wish, waiting upon every movement with a breathless devotion that is really amazing. There is my wife now, she has been an invalid for many years, and yet her nervous system, the forces of her will, are not at all in the broken-down condition of Miss Cary's. Her case really seems to me hopeless."

So the king of journalists went on. I remember looking at him and thinking how impossible it seemed for him, with that ponderous physique and those iron nerves, to comprehend what pain was; to have the faintest notion of the rack, and strain, and anguish which the delicate organization of the woman had undergone before they had borne down the masterful will and splendid energies of Alice Cary.

Afterward, the talk led Horace Greeley to speak of himself, and he told us something of his work, and what it had been during those first years when he was establishing the Tribune. What a very Titan he had been when he took that pen of his! It did not seem possible that any merely human powers could have borne the long strain, and done the labor of those years.

I never saw Horace Greeley again. Yet what a little while it seems since I sat there and listened to his talk! Only three summers ago; and now all those of whom he spoke are gone into the unknown. Alice Cary and Phoebe, and the long-invalid wife, and last, and in some sense saddest of all, the speaker himself, with the great brain and the large, slow physique, that seemed good that night for a score of years of endurance and work.

Alice Cary went first of the four, as we all know, on a day lying right in the heart of February, with thick snows outside, and the earth underneath them had not felt the first thrill and touch of the spring that was coming.

"Waking," says Mrs. Ames—and I wonder if sweeter words were ever said of dying—"waking into the better land out of a slumber in this."

"The wittiest woman in America is dead. There are others who say many brilliant things, but I doubt if there is another so spontaneously and pointedly witty, in the sense that Sidney Smith was witty, as Phoebe Cary."

This is what Mrs. Ames says of the younger of the poetesses.

The characters of the two sisters seem to have been drawn on totally different backgrounds. I never met Phoebe Cary, but I do not see the faintest hint of family likeness in the two faces which accompany this memorial.

Yet in their fine sense of honor, their high conscientiousness, their simplicity, honesty, courage, there was a marked resemblance between the two women. "From the prevailing 'littlenesses' which Margaret Fuller says are the curse of women," both the sisters seem to have been "almost entirely free."

Yet with all that bright, flashing wit which put the most accomplished and gifted men who gathered under her roof on their mettle, Phoebe Cary seems to have been one of the humblest, most loving, tender, timid souls alive. She wrote far less, and had far less imaginative power, than her sister; yet the inspiration was there, and "rose to flood-tide at intervals."

We all know her exquisite parodies. Kate Ketcham, for instance, and that one on Longfellow's beautiful Lyric.

Mrs. Ames tells us she inherited the nature of both father and mother, and that this dual character pervaded even her poems.

"Through one nature she was the most literal of human beings. Never did there live such a disenchanter. Hold up to her in her literal, everyday mood your most precious dream, and in an instant, by a single rapier of a sentence, she would thrust it through, and strip it of the last vestige of glamour, and you would see nothing before you but a cold staring fact, ridiculous or dismal."

Yet with all this practical side her imagination could soar, and sing, and glorify whatever it touched.

She seems to have been one of those natures whose best powers ripen slowly. Essentially feminine as she was, her life was perhaps too much "an appendage of her gifted sister."

The indomitable energy, the resolute will of Alice Cary, carried her through everything. It was this which forced her out from the lonely cottage on the Ohio bottoms, and brought her into the thick of the world's great fight, where she lived, and toiled, and died.

It was different with Phoebe. With all her trenchant wit, her keen, lightning-like irony, she was still a dependent, child-like soul.

Alice, as I have said, literally worked herself to death. And there is something unutterably pathetic in her clinging to life; "not because she had any lack of faith in the other and higher, but because it seemed to her that she had not exhausted the possibilities, the fulness and sweetness of this."

With all the deep sadness and solitude of her soul, with all the weights of toil and care under which, at last, she succumbed, with all the pain and anguish which filled her days and nights, Alice Cary could still say at the last: "Oh, if God could only let me live ten years longer, it seems as if I wouldn't ask for any more time!"

It seems difficult to make up one's mind why Phoebe Cary should have died. Doubtless that sedentary life, the high, unwholesome temperatures to which both sisters accustomed themselves, and that long, tireless devotion to the beloved invalid, had sapped the vital energies of Phoebe Cary's life.

When she was left in the world without Alice, the motive power seems to have failed. It is very touching to find how she strove to bear up under it all, and to lead her daily life just as she would have done had Alice been by.

But soul and body seem to have failed in the struggle. A slow decline seized her; when the summer heats grew, and July had ripened into its last hours, Phoebe Cary followed her sister, only seven teen months behind; and the two, who read in the golden twilights their lyrics to each other, now read them to sweeter music in a home which no pain can darken. "But," says Mrs. Ames, in concluding the story, "the house on Twentieth street is left desolate forever."

That thought hurts! When one thinks of all the loneliness and aches there are in the world; of all help and healing, the light and gladness men and women found under that roof; and that its lights are gone out forever, and that nobody can ever exactly take the place of Alice and Phoebe Cary in the hearts of these men and women. Why, as I said, the thought must hurt!

But, as the sisters went to the soft quiet of the graves at Greenwood—the one amid the spinning of winter snows, the other amid the billowy waving of summer grasses. So we shall all follow them in a little while.

Nothing can hurt them any more. And, shortly—it's pleasant to think that—nothing can hurt us any more. And, for the rest, there are the lines they left behind them; and the world is better because they lived.

The brothers, Mrs. Ames tells us, are still living "on and near the old farm homestead, strong, healthy, robust men.

"What if the old customs had still been in vogue, which, less than a century ago, condemned the education of woman as quite unnecessary for her sphere and work; and while these brothers had their chance with primer and pencil, Alice and Phoebe Cary, in accordance with the notions of those 'good old times,' had never been taught to read and write?"

CHAPTER IV.

COLLECTIVE WISDOM.

IT might be amusing, but it would scarcely be profitable, to detail all the domestic difficulties which Fergus Laurie had to meet before his party came off. Fergus said that the Harveys had a full, bright flower-stand, and he could not understand why they should not have the same. Now, the Harvey's flowers were always supplied by Mrs. Webber, who kept her old skill and luck with them, and fostered a few pennyworth of seeds into plants worth half-a guinea. However, the Lauries bought six flowers in pots, at a shilling each. They had only been transplanted on the morning of the purchase. Robina deluged them with water, and set them out in the sun and wind. Then she forgot all about them for three days, in fact, till Fergus lifted them in again to adorn the room. They held their heads up fairly, poor things, for the evening of the party, and after that died as quickly as they possibly could.

It was the same with everything. Also, Fergus found that money was not only needed for the few "extras" which he had sanguinely calculated as within an easy expenditure of two or three pounds at most. Money was also needed for the sudden supply of things which should have always been kept replaced and repaired. The tea-service, of a pattern which could once have been easily and cheaply matched, had been allowed to dwindle down to the veriest minimum of cups and saucers. It was now found to be as unique as if of the rarest porcelain. Robina wasted a whole day, and ever so many omnibus fares, going hither and thither vainly trying to match it. Fergus was so angry at this revelation of shiftlessness that Robina felt there was nothing for her but to obey without protest when he summoned her to accompany him to buy a new service, though it was a dreadfully wet evening, and she knew she had neglected to have her boots mended. Next day she was laid up with a cold, consequently the new service was not washed or arranged till the afternoon before the visitors came, when the charwoman did it in a great hurry, with considerable results of breakage.

However, everything was ready at last. During the last few hours, Robina made what she considered to be superhuman efforts, with marvellous results. In the morning all arrangements were chaos, by the afternoon they were just what they should be, but by such a strain upon Robina's temper, that when her brother came in and suggested some trivial change, her endurance gave way utterly, and she rated him soundly, and inconsequently—the two essentials of a fine scolding—till she was interrupted by a double knock.

George Harvey and his wife were the first arrivals. Mrs. Harvey and Millicent came next. David Maxwell and Mrs. Maxwell were the last. Mrs. Maxwell was invited because she was "a professional gentleman's" wife, and Mrs. Laurie and Robina thought that her presence would show that Christian was not their only opportunity of genteel society. Mrs. Maxwell, in her turn, having in reality no place to keep, was very particular "to keep her place," and her way of doing it was to cause tea to wait for her fully half an hour.

Mrs. Laurie and Robina intended to be very polite to Mrs. Harvey and Millicent. They said to each other: "We must pay them a good deal of attention, poor things."

They had made up their minds to pity them, because they were self-dependent, and Mrs. Laurie and Robina had their own private opinion that it was such hard lines to earn one's own living, that nobody would do it who could get any one else to do it for them. Mrs. Laurie used a sympathizing tone whenever she happened to name George to his mother—for surely Mrs. Harvey must have "felt" his marriage. Mrs. Harvey caught the tone, but innocently wondered what it could mean, and only hoped that Mrs. Laurie did not think George looked delicate.

Milly was very glad to see David Maxwell again. Indeed she was too glad, for her pleasure was as frank as it could have been had he been a girl! All unsophisticated as he was, David's heart taught him the difference between the gay, cheery greeting which he got, and the deferent reserve with which Milly received Fergus Laurie's welcome.

"Of course, she must prefer him," he quietly settled it within himself. "What could she see in me, and what does she know of me, and what can she ever know? Now, Fergus is so clever, and is able to show himself her friend. It is only to be expected."

It was strength and not weakness which helped David straight to this conclusion. For what was happening was really quite natural, and also quite right in its way, and it is not courage but infantine perversity which kicks against pricks that cannot be removed. But David himself did not know his own strength. He thought that he was constituted not to feel things as hotly as some people. He supposed that he was not "high-spirited"—like Fergus for instance—and forgot how that which is called "poorness of spirit" is the very chivalry of Heaven!

"How do the pictures get on?" Fergus inquired of Milly when the tea was fairly served and the little party had settled down in something like composure.

"I have nearly done them," Milly answered brightly; "that is to say, I have done their hardest part, but they will take some time yet, for I must take care to make the vegetation what it would be in such a place, time and season."

"Ah," said Fergus, with that peculiar critical voice which Milly was already learning to hear with respect. "Mind you don't let your details run away with you. Don't smother your ideal. Treat it largely."

What a wonderful young man for a mere clerk! Who was to remember that he had an art-loving master, and that artists and art-critics gossiped sometimes in the counting-house? Not that this need depreciate his talents. They were very real. Power to adapt and to apply is a great talent, and one without which all others are useless. Yet it, too, must have talents to work upon, and when it has not them within, but must grasp them from without, it often has a peculiar vanity of desiring to merge its own individuality in theirs. The quick to learn are prone to think that they taught themselves, and many a "self-made man" seems to forget even that he himself did not put his own brains into his own head.

But George Harvey was not so likely as his other hearers to let these dogmas pass unquestioned.

"I do not see that truth in a detail need destroy truth in the whole," he said. "God individualized every moss which He spread as an unnoticed carpet over the world. And however careful a grass is drawn, it will not be its finish, but its want of finish, which will give it undue importance in a picture. In proportion to its degree of finish it will fall into its proper place in art, as in nature."

"Yes, truly," Fergus responded. He had not followed George's argument beyond its first proposition, because he had been thinking what he should retort in his turn. "What I mean is, that we do not want the bare truth, but something more than the truth. For instance, there is a truth in the dry correctness of botany-book delineations, but that is not all the truth about flowers that grow in dew and sunshine. Nay, it is not the truth at all, for the very self-displaying attitudes in which the flowers must be posed for botanical purposes is a lie."

"Granted," George answered, readily, "but I maintain this, that an artist who would give flowers their proper human interest, who would make a heart's-ease, Bunyan's "herb heart's-ease," or a lily to outshine Solomon in all his glory, had best know about these flowers all that the botany-book can teach. Who could accept an emblem of cheerfulness and content with less petals than it ought to have, and the wrong sort of leaf?"

"Those who did not know," said Fergus, lightly, "and that would be most people!"

"And what, when they grew wiser?" George asked, seriously. "When they learned to mistrust and condemn the symbol, would they grow in trust and love for the thing symbolized? Wherever a feeling is to be reproduced there should never be a jar or a failure in fact."

"Nor in fiction either," added Christian, half playfully; "I mean when anybody is writing a story he should not be so carried away by his heroics as to change his hero's name, or age, once or twice, and forget all about dates and times and seasons. It is done sometimes, though, and it destroys all my interest. I can't sympathize with a Harry whose name is occasionally Dick, and who keeps Christmas within a month of midsummer. I know such a being never shed a tear or felt a pang. In fact, I can't believe in him."

"No, and that destroys one's pleasure," observed David, "one likes to believe."

"Do you?" Fergus asked, half scornfully. "Then, I suppose, your highest praise is to say a book is 'just like life.' I want something more than that."

"A good deal depends upon what one thinks 'life' to be," said Christian, in an undertone.

"Oh, I do think books would be dull, if they were exactly real," said Robina Laurie. "One likes one's heroes and heroines to be something better than the common people around one—more beautiful and braver, more forgiving and more interesting altogether."

"But don't you think that is real, after all?" Milly interposed. "Don't you think it is only our own fault for not seeing it? It seems to need less insight to admire a shadow than a substance. Haven't you known people delighted with the picture of a place, in which they never noticed any particular beauty? I think that is like most of us with stories and real life."

"There is a great deal in that," said Fergus, meditatively.

"Is it not dreary work to separate the ideal from the real?" she went on eagerly. "Are they not the same? Is not the ideal simply the best view of a thing, and is not the best likely to be the truest? Would you not take a man's character from his friend rather than his foe?"

"I am entirely with you," Fergus observed, emphatically, with a quick response in the hazel eyes that looked so grave and keen.

"Well," suddenly put in Mrs. Maxwell, "I am sure it is generally those who know most about people who think least of them. I'm sure I don't think much of anybody I know."

The acid tone, even more than the bitter words, damped everybody for a moment, and made David's heart ache and sink.

Mrs. Harvey spoke first. Her words seemed to ignore the sour interruption, and yet they bore subtle rebuke for it and healing for any whom it might have wounded.

"The nearest may be wrong in judgment or in praise as well as the farthest off," she said. And then she gave a kindly illustration. "Don't you remember a certain poor old neighbor of ours, George, who would look at one out of two blackened eyes, and say that nobody need wish a better and kinder husband than her man, take him for all in all?"

"But who shall say she was not right?" answered Milly, with flashing vivacity. "Perhaps he was really good and kind, although circumstances and temptations of many sorts made him appear otherwise sometimes. Perhaps when God made him, He meant him to be specially kind and good, and the eyes of love could see that meaning still, like writing under a smear!"

"I think God means us all to be kind and good; but if He designs it specially for some, and yet they fail in it, I think they are the worst of all, and least deserve charitable interpretations." Christian made this observation in an undertone, and only David Maxwell heard it.

"I am with you entirely, Miss Harvey," said Fergus.

"Only be quite sure, Milly, that your faith in another is not mere stubborn sticking to your own opinion," observed George. "But, more seriously, are you not stating a truth which, while whole in itself, is only half of another and greater truth? Did not we hear you say a minute ago that it seems to need less insight to admire a shadow than a substance, and that many people would value the picture of a spot which they would not walk half a mile to see? May not that be also true in your metaphysics? When people are often so undeniably short-sighted on the lower levels, must they always gain correctness of vision on the higher ones? Is it not possible that there, too, the semblance may command more attention than the substance? Is it not so in our commonest experience—is not the man who simply does, what under circumstances is easiest and pleasantest for himself and others, constantly called gentle and kind-hearted, whilst he who does what is right at the expense of an unspoken inward struggle and some temporary inconvenience to others, is pronounced hard and unfeeling? Nor is the judgment readily reversed, even when time destroys the one man's work and establishes the other's. The one is only pitied, but though the other may be praised, it is with a grudge. No, Milly, though I am ready to grant your propositions so far as to say that if we could get a perfectly wise and good man, his idealizations would possibly come nearest God's truth, I am not prepared to trust all ideals. A telescope shows us more of the truth of the firmament than the naked eye. But what if the telescope itself be defective?"

Milly shook her head gently. She was not an easily convinced person, which was not at all against Milly, since it at least proved that she was not made of that stony ground, where if seeds take root quickly they are as quickly dried up. Not that she did not at once see and acknowledge the force of her brother's arguments, only while they appeared to her to dash something good and grand in her own, she would not wholly accept them.

"Then is a friend's love and faith to go for nothing?" she said, wistfully.

"Oh, surely not," said Christian, warmly. "But don't you think they may have quite a different value? Don't you think they may be God's sign of a relationship between souls, upon which He ordinarily chooses to work spiritual good and blessing, just as He generally blesses our outer life by our physical ties? I don't think we ever do good to any one unless we love them and believe in them."

"But we ought to love everybody," put in Robina Laurie.

"Those who don't trouble themselves about the practice, are always very strong on the theory," observed Fergus, half-aside, to Milly.

"Certainly, we should love all in the sense of wishing and trying to do them good, or to be good to them," said Christian. "But, with some, I believe our very wish and endeavor to do them good will cause us to place them under other influences than our own. I once had a certain child in my Sabbath-class. I had myself secured her attendance, and whenever it flagged I hunted her up. I tried to give her even more attention than I gave the others, because she seemed to need it more. But there always was a barrier between us. That child's eyes were no sooner fixed on my face than my thoughts seemed to freeze on my lips, no matter how warm they lay in my heart. It distressed me dreadfully; for I made every effort in my power, and was still baffled by a mysterious law, that lay beyond it. Suddenly a fellow-teacher said to me, 'What an interesting child your little pale pupil is! It ought to be quite a help to you to have such a face in your class.' And I had grace given me to be frank, and answer, 'If you feel so, you will do her the good that I shall never do her. Take her into your class. And it was so arranged, and I saw the child's face gradually brighten, and her soul come forward, until even I could recognize its lovable features. I know she never liked me while she was in my class, and was always glad to run off without any good-bye. But afterwards she always came to kiss me every Sunday afternoon. And if she could come to my class now, I am sure we should get on capitally together. The ice between us is thawed, though we could never melt it by ourselves. And in this way I am sure that there are many circumstances, when the best that our love can do, is to stand aside and make way for the appointed love that can do more."

"Yes, that is true," said David; "and if love cannot so stand aside, it is not love, but selfishness. But it is hard sometimes," he added, with a checked sigh.

"Yes," responded Christian, "its present 'is not joyous, but grievous,' and yet it is the only way to joy. If love could be content to grasp what it could for itself, regardless of its object, it would not get what it really wanted, but only a very poor substitute. While, if it invests itself entirely in its object, God Himself secures it a rate of interest which shall suffice its needs, and keeps its principal safe in that bank of His, which transmutes poor stock of earthly affections and hopes into rich store of everlasting treasure."

"How do you know that?" Fergus asked, in his abrupt way. "Don't you think now that you may be putting faith in your sweet fancies?"

Christian answered gently, "WHO spake, saying, 'There is no man that hath left house, or parents, or brethren, or wife, or children, for the Kingdom of God's sake, who shall not receive manifold more in this present time, and in the world to come, life everlasting?'"

"And how many have proved it true?" said Mrs. Harvey.

"Ah, but that speaks of surrender for 'the Kingdom of God's sake,'" Fergus replied, rather triumphantly.

"And what is the Kingdom of God?" Christian asked, "and while we are in the flesh how are we put in any relationship to it? Is not the Kingdom of God, like His chosen, something in this world, though not of it? Is it not that law of equity and harmony which underlies everything? Is it not the duty which every circumstance holds for somebody? I believe every action, nay, even every spiritual motion of each of us, is either a stone contributed or taken from that 'building of God not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.'"

There was a pause, but Milly, who had been wanting to speak for some time, broke it.

"Is not what Christian says almost exactly what I said, after all?" she asked. "I said that I thought the ideal was God's truth, and is it not likely to be so, if, as she says, it is one of the most powerful instruments of good?"

"I think I can see a vital difference between your propositions," George answered. "You give the value of the ideal to the idealized. Christian keeps it for the idealizer. You make it a mental insight. Christian considers it a moral influence. You maintain that in some mysterious way a man really fulfils the highest ideal of himself, however he appears to fail. Christian, on the other hand, asserts that the ideal may be far above his head, not the measure of his soul at all, but the measure of the soul which creates it, but that it is his best help upward, and that its very height gives it the more strength to help him as far as he can possibly go."

"Yes," said Mrs. Harvey, "I have once or twice seen that a mother's faith in the superior industry and ability of scapegrace sons, has shamed and encouraged them, till it has finally made them just passable members of society."

"Well, I don't know," observed Mrs. Maxwell, "I've heard it said, 'Expect nothing, and then you'll not be disappointed.' I think there's a deal of truth in that!"

"I'm sure it wouldn't matter much what I thought of Fergus," said Mrs. Laurie. "He'd take his own ways, and be what he chooses, anyhow."

"Well, I can see a great deal of truth in your idea," Millicent observed to Christian, "but I still think there's a little truth in mine."

"Don't you know, Milly," her brother went on, in further explanation, "that many people have to give up their ideal at last—that somehow, however much they try, they can no longer believe that their friend is what they once thought him."

"It may be their own fault," Milly responded, "some anger or enmity in their own hearts may have come like a mist between them and their ideal. When we cannot see the opposite side of the street on a foggy morning, we do not say that it is not there. We know it is only lost in the fog, and wait till it clears."

"Milly is right so far," said Christian.

"But suppose there is no anger or enmity," David suggested, quietly. "Suppose one only loves more than ever, and longs as much as ever to be kind and faithful, and yet can't help not being able to believe any more."

"I can't understand that," said Milly, fiercely, with a biting flash in her dark eyes. "If I had loved and trusted anybody I would do it till I couldn't—couldn't—do it any more, and when I couldn't—I should hate him!"

"I can believe you would," said Fergus Laurie, so quietly that nobody but Milly heard it, amid the storm of disapproval that her hot words called forth.

"That's always the end of thinking too much of people," observed Mrs. Laurie, shifting her knitting-needles; "those that are called 'dears' one day are generally 'devils' the next. I suppose they shake the two up together till it comes even."

"People that have fine ideas have the same feelings as common folks, it seems, and so it all comes to one in the long run," said Mrs. Maxwell, "only it's more shame to them."

"Those who feel so when they think of such a thing beforehand," Christian remarked, "are sometimes the first to be patient and forgiving when the trial really comes."

"But such would be happier if they prayed God to regulate their minds as well as their actions," said Mrs. Harvey, with a gentle rebuking gaze at her daughter. "I think I know Milly's real meaning, and that her words don't exactly give it."

"But people must expect to be understood as they speak," added Robina, in her little clipping, satisfied style. At that moment Millicent did not like Robina Laurie, and thought within herself that her sister Hatty was generally very shrewd in her judgments!

David's gentle words had seemed the spark to Milly's gunpowder. It is often so, nor is it thus unreasonably. The voice of love and patience suggests their long-suffering and agony, and the bitter rejoinder it calls forth is often half-sympathy, half-outraged justice. The tempter has a peculiar temptation for the soul which has a strong sense of justice—he deceives it into a fancy that God's justice is asleep, and must be aroused by some shrieking vengeance on its own part.

But Fergus Laurie's quiet "I can believe you would" rankled in Milly's heart after all the other rebukes, spiteful or kindly, were forgotten. Did he mean that he could understand the feeling? or did he mean that he could understand it as consistent with her character?

"I dare say he thinks me a vixen, only caring to hold my own," said poor Milly, within herself. "Well, well, never mind, perhaps he will know better some day."

When the evening was over, and all the visitors were gone, the three Lauries drew their chairs round the fire, and talked everything over among themselves. And Fergus found his mother's and sister's spattering tattle very wearisome, and presently went away, and sat by himself in his bedroom.

"These Harveys are the right kind of people for me to associate with," he said. "They are all clever, and have beautiful ways of thought. One can quite understand how such would grow in such conversations as we had this evening."

It never struck Fergus that one's thoughts must be the growth of one's life, if they are to be warm and stimulating lights, and not mere fireworks struck off by the friction of brain with brain.

"This is the right life for me to live; hitherto, I have only existed. But, judging from what Robina says of the cost of this evening, intellectual pleasures cost a great deal. We've always lived so up to my salary, that I shall have to take four or five pounds from next quarter's to pay to-night's expenses. And yet I can feel this enjoyment is as necessary to my mind as air or food to my body. I must have it. And, as my present means will not suffice to procure it, I must try something else."

Alas, for the schemes that are concocted, and the ventures that are taken, not because of a comfortable surplus, but because of a gnawing deficit—not in reasonable hope, but in self-willed desperation!

CHAPTER V.

A MESSENGER IN THE NIGHT.

WHEN Mrs. Maxwell and David returned to Blenheim House, they were not admitted very quickly, and when at last Phoebe Winter came to the door, she said not a word, not even in answer to David's cheery words; but followed them into the parlor, and there resumed a position, physical and moral, which she had evidently been holding before. Her master sat, leaning back in the great leather arm-chair, in an attitude at once defiant and cowering. The defiance, or rather indifference, was assumed, with all dramatic exaggeration, the cower was very involuntary and subtle. But David could see it.

"Either do it or don't do it, now I've told you the consequences," said Phoebe, in her harshest judicial voice. "I'll not go from my words, you may know I'm not the sort o' woman. A woman that'll starve on here, year after year, and put up with her sauce

(with a significant movement of the head toward Mrs. Maxwell), for an objec' that she has, is not a woman to say one thing an' mean another. You know I don't want to shame your son, an' if it has to be done, it ain't me, it's yourself as does it, an' as it can't be helped it'll be overruled for the best. Maybe, when I didn't do it, when I first could, a good bit more than twenty years ago, now, it were a doing evil that good might come. I didn't think so then. I thought it might be called a showing o' mercy; but it's a dangerous thing to call it showing mercy, when one's an objec' in view. But there's some people that you can't save, whatever you do. If you take 'em from the very gallows-foot, they'll get a rope an' hang themselves. I spared you before most for your boy's sake, and because what was done couldn't be undone; but if I spare you again, it's a helping o' your sins, and it'll get him into it as well; for Phoebe Winter knows what the world is, bitter well, and that there wouldn't be one in a dozen that would think but what he sin't as bad as yourself."

"Now you've done your wild Irish oration, Phoebe," said the surgeon aggravatingly, "perhaps you'll go and draw me half a pint of ale."

"I know I'm your servant, sir," Phoebe returned, "and I do what you tell me, and you can't say I haven't served you faithful, whatever I've done it for; but Phoebe Winter isn't going to stand by and watch while dirty ways is going on, though once she did think it was maybe no harm to hold her tongue, and let bygones be bygones." And Phoebe stalked back to her kitchen to fetch the ale.

"A pretty thing for me to come home and find you being lectured by that woman, Mr. Maxwell," said his wife, in her high-pitched cantankerous tones. "A nice degradation for a respectable married woman! I've always felt there was something behind the scenes, sir. I suppose she knows all about your wicked early life, sir, and the woman that David belongs to. She may know something very pretty about her, I've no doubt, sir, although you've had no more proper feeling than to let her brat live in the same house with your lawful wife, sir." The door flew open, and Phoebe stood blazing on the threshold.

"An' what if I did know her?" she cried. "I won't say she was as good as you is, for them's not the words for either of you; but I will say, you're as bad as she were! There ain't a pin to choose between ye, 'cept that you've lived to have one sin more and be a self-righteous Pharisee! I ain't lived twenty years in this here den of iniquity for nothing. I knows the date when ye first come home as missis, an' I should like to see the date o' the fine marriage certificate that you're so proud on! It were against the grain o' Phoebe Winter to stay in the house wi' the likes o' you, I can tell ye. I've heard say ye may gen'rally know the ways that's right, 'cause they're the hard uns. But I can tell you it were as hard for me to stay as to go; it were a precious sight harder to stay, 'cept for the objec' I had. And as for the 'brat' that affronts ye so much, it's because o' that brat that ye haven't had to go to a prison to see the man that you're so proud to call your husband, though any woman that hadn't evened herself to him, would be ashamed o't. 'Brat,' indeed! Many's the time I'd ha' trembled to be where I was; only thinking that the Lord who'd ha' spared great big cities if they'd had five good people in 'em, would perhaps spare this wicked house for the sake o' the young soul that I b'lieve He's taken up and redeemed to Himself."

"Oh, Phoebe, do be quiet," David entreated.

And Phoebe looked at him, put down the flagon and glass, and withdrew with that high step which all her household moil had never made heavy or shuffling.

"Oh, to think I should have been brought to have to bear this!" said Mrs. Maxwell, with dry sobs. "It's a regular shame, and that it is! I expected everything to be so different. I'm sure I've hardly had better dress or victuals than I could have got myself, and I've not been taken about or spoken to, except like a dog. Lots of girls that have stuck to their work have done better, and yet I've had to give up a good deal, and live like a hermit, and put up with that woman, and with seeing your child, that wasn't mine. It's a regular shame, Mr. Maxwell, and that's what it is, and it shows that you're not a man, sir, to stand by and see me bear it!"

"Hey, what, what, what?" said the surgeon. "What are you talking about now, Poll? What do you know about it. Eh, Poll? Eh, Poll? Hadn't you better hold your tongue?"

David stood sorrowfully looking at the pair. There was nothing remarkable in his father's irritable incoherence. It was but too common. David knew by many a painful experience that it was worse than useless for him to offer a soothing word. Because it was his word, it would be but oil on the fire to Mrs. Maxwell. He might have tried to speak to his father had he been alone. Early influences that had been about the surgeon, and even the cultivation that had necessarily come to him by his profession, had kept one or two spots in his character, which though not soft, were at least not always actively repellant. His son could reason with him sometimes, even though it always proved fruitless. David wished he could be alone with his father just for five minutes that evening. Next morning he was glad to remember that wish.

He did what he knew to be best—left the husband and wife together. Quarrels always died out so. Two people, full of mutual indifference, only enlivened by a little hatred, do not quarrel when they are alone. They are quite aware that nothing either can say will pain the other, when safe from the humiliation of outer eyes and ears.

David went along the stone passage to the kitchen. When he opened the door, he found Phoebe sitting poking over her dim candle darning one of his stockings. There was no trace of the recent storm about her, except that she did not even look up when he entered, but went on darning as if there was nothing in the world but herself and the stocking.

"Phoebe what is all this about? What has made you say such things!" he asked, gently, standing beside her—rather behind her.

Phoebe did not answer. Perhaps she thought she had given her darling a shock about his mother, and that he had come to claim some withdrawing explanation. But David had been wiser than she guessed. A man's knowledge of the world had long since translated the once unintelligible sense of inferiority which had been forced on him by Mrs. Maxwell. Perhaps he had cherished a hope against hope, but it had not sufficient vitality to die hard. Still, he had a natural yearning to know something of the mother whom he had never seen or heard about. If Phoebe knew anything, as he strongly suspected she did, surely she would tell him. He remembered asking her about his mother years and years ago, when he was quite a little child, but the only answer, a curt command that he should never speak about her, had made itself imperatively binding on his sensitive nature. It was almost the only time he could remember Phoebe's speaking sharply to him. And though looking back upon this of late, he had argued himself that Phoebe must be able to give some cogent reasons for such repression, still he would never have re-opened the subject had not others done it for him. Even as it was, the living present, with its possibilities, rose nearest to him, and crowded out the past.

"Phoebe," he said, again, "what is the matter between my father and you? What makes you speak so to him?"

This time Phoebe dropped her stockings, threw her apron over her head, and burst into loud sobs.

"It's hard to know right fra wrong, and I'm only a poor ignorant woman. And it's hard to think you've been doin' wrong when you've put your whole life in it, and to find that it'll be right to do what'll waste years and years o' patience. But I'll do it! I won't go on doing wrong the minute I sees it, and there's none o' us can leave off afore. And come what may, David, I'm glad I've stuck by ye all these years, and ye are a bit the better for't, ain't ye, David?"

"Very much the better, Phoebe," the young man answered, soothingly. "You have been my best friend always."

"An' that's where it is!" she cried passionately. "And yet if I hadn't done what seems wrong, I couldn't ha' bin your best friend without doing of it. It's all in a muddle—there's something that you can't say is certain right or wrong, neither black, white, nor grey, and yet it lies in the way to something else that's certain great glorious good! For why, I ask, ain't I your best friend? Because I think I'm the only one that's tried to lead you to Him that's the Father of the fatherless and the motherless, as you s'most are and allays have been, David. I can't make out why God sets things so."

"But He does not," David argued, gently. "If there's a right thing to be done, and we seem to have to pass through a wrong thing on our way to it, depend upon it, Phoebe, there's another way to it, and a better one, and it's our own fault, and not God's, that we do not find it."

Phoebe spoke more quietly. "It's comfortin' to hear you," she said. "Whatever I taught ye once, ye've made a precious deal more out of it than ever I could. I can bear a'most anything 'cept gettin' mazed and puzzled about the ways o' the Almighty, and kind o' thinkin' that either He can't know or doesn't care. That puts me fair past myself."

"That is because it is not a trouble sent from God, but growing from our own faithlessness," said David; "and I think it generally begins, Phoebe, when we've been letting in wrong feelings of some other kind. We do what God tells us not to do, and then grow unbelieving and impatient because the light of His countenance is withdrawn. We walk in roads which He has told us are dark, and then murmur because we stumble. I do not yet know what has been the matter to-night, Phoebe, and you will not tell me of other things which I feel sure must have happened to trouble you, so that I cannot tell what may have been your provocations; but still, dear old Phoebe, don't forget that the wrath of man never worketh the righteousness of God."

"It's a true word, David," she said, wiping her eyes; "and yet things is so peculiar. There's something I didn't do, years ago, which, maybe, I ought, and yet, if I had done, maybe it would ha been wi' a good bit o' vengeance an' spite. But there's no good sittin' up a' night talking o't, or I'll not be good in the morning, and there'll be words agen. I've heard the master and missus go off quiet enough to their room, and now you go to yours, and get a good sleep. Things mend theirselves while a body's napping."

David needed no second bidding; but slumber did not come so easily. In spite of his strengthening words to Phoebe, he held to his own faith in God much as a poor mariner clings to a rope in the dark, rough midnight sea.

Oh, it seemed so hard to pass from the bright, wholesome atmosphere of the early evening into this murky cloud of mystery and degradation. It was like going from sunshine and breeze into the dark, tainted chill of a charnel-house. What must it be to be like George Harvey, with such a mother and sisters, and such a wife—helped, encouraged, stimulated, comforted, on every hand, just as naturally and simply as a plant is nurtured by showers and sunbeams! The past evening had been as a festive robe to David's spirit; it was the others' every-day wear! And there must be so much of it in the world, and yet none for him who longed for it so much. The doubts which he had allayed in Phoebe returned to torment himself. Why did God create yearnings to leave them unsatisfied? "It must be right, it must be right," he cried in his heart. "But O God, keep hold of me, for I cannot keep hold of thee?" And yet better to be he, believing in the bright and innocent and happy, though shut from them, than Mrs. Maxwell, who concluded that every body's home was like her own, "if one only knew."

He lay wakeful for a long time, but was just in the midst of a troubled dream, when he was awakened by a piercing scream, followed by Mrs. Maxwell's voice, crying, "David! David! Phoebe! Mr. Maxwell is in a fit. He is dying!"

The son was in his father's room in less than a moment. He had sufficient professional knowledge to perceive that the surgeon was in no fit, but in a paroxysm of angeni pectoris, slight touches of which he had suffered once or twice before. But this was no slight touch; and Phoebe no sooner appeared than David hurried her off to fetch some brother medical man, even though it might be the humdrum parish doctor, at whom the sharp surgeon had so often scoffed. Once or twice the anguish abated a little, only to return with renewed force; and when the hastily-summoned doctor turned from his patient's bedside, his face spared David from asking a single question.

The dying man tried to speak once or twice, and failed. It brought the agony upon him like a fate. Oh, the poor opened mouth and hungering eyes! they stamped themselves on David's heart, and he ever afterward remembered his father so. And it was well! for it was a kindlier memory, after all, than any other could have been!

He got a word or two out at last. Oh, if he had only wrestled with his spiritual foes, as he did with the physical agony that he might accomplish this! Only by putting his ear close to his father's mouth could David catch his meaning.

"You will do what is right. Phoebe is a good woman, and—"

No more! The fierce agony was down upon him again, and, as it passed away, life passed with it.

And next day the windows of Blenheim House were blinded, except the kitchen window, which had no blind to draw.

"I suppose my words killed him. I know them sort of diseases come when people are put out." Phoebe vehemently sobbed this out in the presence of her mistress, whose philosophic composure was such as not to render such a statement unfeeling, while Phoebe seemed eager to take a wild revenge upon herself by draining the deepest cup of remorse and humiliation before the very woman who had aggravated her bitterest invectives the night before. "That's where it is," Phoebe went on. "When one begins to think one may have been wrong, and to try to be right, it's just then that one gets punished, and one seems to bring it on one's own head."

Phoebe's rough hand was unconsciously laid upon one of the deepest secrets of divine government.

"Well, let it be a lesson to you," said Mrs. Maxwell, without one thought as to her own share in the excitement of the previous evening; "and, of course, you'll always feel like a murderer, and can't ever expect to prosper. With all his faults, Mr. Maxwell was a good man in his own way, and that's more than you'll ever be with your violent temper."

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

A YOUNG man recently ran away from the galleys of Toulouse. He was strong and vigorous, and soon made his way across the country, and escaped pursuit. He arrived next morning before a cottage in an open field, and stopped to get something to eat, and get refuge while he reposed a little. But he found the inmates of the cottage in the greatest distress. Four little children sat trembling in the corner; their mother sat weeping and tearing her hair, and the father was walking the floor in agony. The galley-slave asked what was the matter, and the father replied that they were that morning to be turned out of doors, because they could not pay their rent.

"You see me driven to despair," said the father; "my wife and my children without food or shelter, and I without means to provide them."

The convict listened to the tale with tears of sympathy, and said, "I will give you the means. I have just escaped from the galleys. Whosoever brings back an escaped prisoner is entitled to a reward of fifty francs. How much does the rent amount to?"

"Forty francs," answered the father.

"Well," said the other, "put a cord round my body. I will follow you to the city, where they will recognize me, and you will get fifty francs for bringing me back."

"No, never!" exclaimed the astonished listener. "My children should starve a thousand times before I would do so base a thing."

The generous man insisted, and declared at last that he would give himself up if the father would not consent to take him. After a long struggle the latter yielded, and, taking his preserver by the arm, led him to the city and to the mayor's office.

Everybody was surprised to see that a little man like the father had been able to capture such a strong young fellow; but the proof was before them.

The fifty francs were paid, and the prisoner sent back to the galleys. But, after he was gone, the father asked a private interview with the mayor, to whom he told the whole story. The mayor was so much affected that he not only added francs to the father's purse, but wrote immediately to the minister of justice, begging the noble young prisoner's release. The minister examined into the affair, and finding it was a comparatively small offence which had condemned the young man to the galleys, and that he had already served out half his term, ordered his release.

THREE KINDS OF MEN IN THE WORLD.—A clever author says there are three kinds of men in the world—"The WILLs, the WON'Ts and the CAN'Ts." The first effect everything, the next oppose everything, and the last fail in everything. "I will" builds our railroads and steamboats; "I won't" don't believe in experiments and nonsense; while "I can't" grows weeds for wheat, and commonly ends his days in the court of bankruptcy.

HETTY HENDERSON'S ERA.

BY ROSELLA RICE.

TWO neighbors, Mrs. Ray and Mrs. Carter, were taking tea with Hetty that afternoon. Now Hetty, though in the main a kind, prudent, good woman, a treasure of a wife and mother, had one bad fault, she was a sloven.

Why sometimes her hair would not be combed for two days at a time, and as to wearing a collar, while about her work, she never thought of such a thing! Sometimes only her toes would be thrust into her run-down, flapping slippers, and if she tore her dress she always pinned up the rent and let it go.

Now every tidy woman knows this is a bad state of things—that if there's a hole in her dress no bigger than a gimlet hole, and she passes a barrel, or a box, a loose end of a hoop, or a jagged nail sticking out, will be sure to catch in that hole and tear it worse. That thing is conceded to be a certainty—no sane woman doubts that.

Hetty's tea-table looked tempting. She occupied the post of honor at one end.

Her face was flushed from the cooking-stove, and the rosy glow would have been exceedingly becoming if her hair had been smooth, and her dress freshly clean, but the dress did not fit well in the waist, and she had no collar on, and her hair hung in little tagged, sneaking slips about her ears and on her neck. Poor Hetty! her punishment was near.

Tea was over, but they still sat at the table conversing.

"Yes—yes, I think it was the winter that young Willsee from St. Albans taught our school," said Mrs. Ray.

"How pleasant the memories of that winter," said Mrs. Carter; "hardly a day passes in which I do not think of the good times we enjoyed together."

"How much older are you, Hetty, than Mrs. Ray?" said Mr. Henderson, looking first at one and then at the other.

"Older! why, husband! I'm five years younger, and three years younger than Susie Carter," said the poor wife, blushing.

"Why, Hetty Henderson! I should have thought from your appearance that you were almost old enough to be their mother, step-mother, at least," said her astonished husband, smiling and looking at the smooth, placid faces and neat appearance of the visitors, and then at the rumpled, creased head and face of poor Hetty.

No wonder; she sat there stooped over, her ill-fitting waist hanging loosely about her, making her back seem as broad as her husband's.

The untimely words only made her face flush still redder yet.

She felt as if she had been stabbed by the hand of a friend.

"Your wife works too hard, and is too loving and careful a mother," said Mrs. Ray, apologetically, although Hetty fancied that she smirked a little, and relished the compliment so freely and honestly given.

"Now I never fuss much over my children, I try to save myself," and she laughed, and her eyes sparkled, and she really did look winsome and pretty, that woman of thirty-three years.

On their way home the two visitors talked of the painful affair.

"It was just good enough for her," said Mrs. Ray; "no woman has any right to go looking like a scarecrow. If I went that way I'd hear from Ray, and in no very measured terms, either. He has no patience with a slovenly woman; he thinks all women are pretty if they have a mind to be so."

"Almost old enough to be our mother; well, she's a tip-top cook, any how," said Mrs. Carter; "I like her good meals, and I know she's cleanly about her work. She don't seem to care much for herself, only for the comfort and happiness of Henderson and the young 'uns. Now, if I were in her place, that fellow 'd hear from me to-night, praising other women and comparing and measuring her beside them in a way that is no compliment to her."

"Oh, he'll never think any more about it; and if she does, it will do her good; it'll be a good lesson for her," was the answer, and the two women parted at the big gate in the edge of the wood-lot, each one feeling a pleasurable touch of pride from the effect of honest Tom Henderson's bit of flattery.

And how did it affect his wife?

In the twilight, as she stood in the milk-house, hurriedly doing up her work, flitting here and there, there was a brightness in her dark-blue eyes, a compression of the lips, and a red spot on each cheek, and she was nodding her head and talking to herself very earnestly.

"Time was," she whispered, "when Henderson couldn't 'a' said that o' me. The dear knows, I did use to almost grow tired of his words of praise. I was his choice of all the girls he ever saw. I've many a time heard 'im say that Cad Weldon, now Mrs. Ray, had a real putty face—no expression in it—and to-day he said I looked old enough almost to be her mother. Aha! Mr. Henderson, we'll see! it's only love and care for you and yours that's made me so forget myself and fall into careless ways. I'm just as good looking to-day as Cad Ray is—if I do say it myself—we'll see!" and the angry little woman's cheeks grew redder and redder, and her eyes almost snapped in their glittering brightness as she turned the safety-valve and began to sing. That was her safety-valve, when her tensioned nerves could stand no more; she sang and was relieved without a flood of tears.

From under the mossy roof of that tidy little spring-house welled out the jubilant words of an old hymn to the inspiring air of Pisgah.

The next morning, after the children started to school and her work was all done up nicely, she washed herself and carefully brushed her hair, and put it up in a pretty way, with a rose and a spray of myrtle at the side of the coil. She had brushed it until it shone with a lustre. Then she put on a neat light-print dress, and a lace collar, fastened with a beautiful gold pin, a gift of her girlhood.

The gold hoops that her mother had worn long ago, of antique pattern, looked beautiful a-near the dark-brown of her hair. She had not touched those gold hoops for years—her children had never even seen them.

When she clothed her feet in neat gaiters, and put on her wedding-ring, and her nearest neighbors would hardly have recognised the careless slattern in the bright-eyed, sweet-faced woman of to-day. The change pleased her—it made her smile involuntarily, and that smile was her charm—always had been, why couldn't she wear it, too, if her heart was full of a joy so new and so rare and beautiful.

The whole woman was completely metamorphosed. The change beautified her, and the little bit of revenge was harmless and—so sweet!

When her husband came home at noon, he stopped in the doorway and stood still an instant, then he whistled a long, w-h-e-w!

She turned around in an innocent way, and—the expression of his eyes was the same as when he was a devoted, admiring lover.

"My wife," he said, and he folded her in his arms, and his face twitched, and he laughed in a pleased, hysterical way.

Her eyes filled with tears, and there was a stifled sob on his bosom, but it was the best sob she'd ever made, it meant a great deal.

"I've been too thoughtless and careless about myself, Tom," she said. "I thought so much of you and the children, that I never cared how I went. I didn't think of myself."

"You are so sweet, little wife, so beautiful," said Tom, holding her off and looking at her, while she blushed and struggled to get away.

The turning of that leaf was a new era in Hetty Henderson's life. She never so neglected herself again, and instead of growing older, it does seem that as the years glide by she grows younger.

When the children came from school that evening, one at a time, they said, "Oh, where have you been, mother?" or, "Where are you going, mother?" and little Rosy, who had never seen the jewelry before, or a collar, or a rose in her mother's hair, said, in a subdued whisper, "What is the matter, mother, you look like the pictures of the pretty ladies in the magazines?" and she felt of her face as though the vision before her might melt, or vanish into air under her touch.

We must confess that we believe that there is a little spice of mischief in it, when early every morning Hetty takes time enough to pin on a white collar, and brush her hair smoothly off her brow, and remove every sign of the careless sloven from her attire.

She knows very well that a neatly-dressed woman has the advantage over one who is not appearing well. This shows itself in the springy step, and the self-assurance that gives her head a queenly poise. So the two lady visitors, who cared more for her good dinners than they did for Hetty herself, taught her a lesson well worth remembering, and her married life will be the better and the pleasanter for it as long as she lives.

NECESSITY OF SLEEP.

HENRY WARD BEECHER says: "There are thousands of busy people who die every year for want of sleep. Sleeplessness becomes a disease, and is the precursor of insanity. We speak of sleep as the image of death, and our waking hours as the image of life. Sleep is not like death, for it is the period in which the waste of the system ceases, or is reduced to its minimum. Sleep repairs the waste which waking hours have made. It rebuilds the system. The night is the repair-shop of the body. Every part of the system is silently overhauled, and all the organs, tissues and substances are replenished. Waking consumes and exhausts, sleep replaces and repairs. A man who would be a good worker must be a good sleeper. A man has as much force in him as he has provided for in sleep. The quality of mental activity depends upon the quality of sleep. Men need, on an average, eight hours of sleep a day. A lymphatic temperament may require nine; a nervous temperament six or seven. A lymphatic man is sluggish, moves and sleeps slowly. But a nervous man acts quickly in everything. He does more in an hour than a sluggish man in two hours; and so in his sleep. Every man must sleep according to his temperament—but eight hours is the average. Whoever, by work, pleasure, sorrow, or any other cause, is regularly diminishing his sleep, is destroying his life. A man may hold out for a time, but the crash will come, and he will die."

WILD OATS.—We too often hear the remark made, in reference to some spirited young man, that "he is sowing his wild oats." This is spoken in palliation. "He will be different by and by"—perhaps all the better Christian in the end for his thorough knowledge of the world. But this illustration is very unfortunate; peculiarly so, because there is such an intimate connection between the sowing and the reaping. We cannot think of such a thing as a seed-time without a harvest. They are most intimately—yes, indissolubly connected in the natural world. Not less are they so in the moral. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for, whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." If men sow barley, they do not expect to reap wheat; nor will oats produce rye. If men sow wild oats, they must reap a harvest accordingly.

THE MISTRESS OF ABBEYLANDS.

AN ENGLISH STORY. (Continued.)

CHAPTER III.

"IS this Charlton Mere, my boy?"

"Yes, marm," said the small youth in corduroys, to the lady who addressed him—a very neat, plainly-dressed lady, wearing a Quakerish gray gown and a long dark water-proof cloak, a prim bonnet and gossamer veil.

"And who lives in that house to the right, you say?"

"The minister," responded the boy, staring at the lady's gooshees.

"Ah," said the lady, with an affable smile. "And is it he who owns the carriage with the two beautiful little ponies?" The boy stared vacantly. "A lady drives them—a lady with a scarlet cloak and white feathers in her hat," continued his interlocutor.

No answer, but the small boy's hands dived deeper into his trousers pockets in the effort to extract some mental assistance from their manifold contents.

"Stupid little wretch," muttered the lady, "who lives in that house down the lane?"

"Mrs. Chivers," said the boy, backing away from further catechising, and leaving the lady alone at the turn of the long tree-hedged lane.

"What does she do with the ponies?" she asked herself. "She comes here to some place or house, I know; but what does she do with the ponies and her remarkable dress?"

The inquirer had been walking through the miserable village of Charlton Mere; she had plodded up and down through slushy lanes and by-ways, all to no purpose; she had discovered no trace of the woman's presence whom she was tracking, and Caroline Penn was unwillingly obliged to confess that Lady Katherine Lindesay had baffled her in this respect also. She was tired, cold, and disappointed, and had almost come to the wise conclusion that she had better go home to Abbeylands and leave Lady Lindesay's affairs alone, when she suddenly caught sight of a tall, well-dressed boy running down the lane toward her, and carrying something in his hands. He gave a startled glance at her, and, springing over a stile, ran across a piece of furzy common, whence he reached the country road, but not before Miss Penn had recognized Tom, her ladyship's groom, or "tiger," and in his hand a purple morocco hand-bag, which she had seen in Lady Katherine's dressing-room only that morning.

"Now, my lady, I have you!" said Miss Penn, deliberately, though her voice shook with excitement.

She walked straight up to the farm-house gate, but she could go no farther; it was locked, and a huge mastiff, lying in a kennel only two yard's distance inside, sprang out with a thundering volley of barks.

At the noise, the farm-house door was hastily opened, and a young man came out.

"What do you want, ma'am?" he asked, civilly, but distantly.

Miss Penn scanned him from head to foot, and her inspection strengthened her malicious assurance. He was an intelligent, good-looking young fellow, of about five-and-twenty, almost gentlemanly in his dress and demeanor, although evidently belonging to what are called "the lower walks of life."

"I want to see Lady Lindesay," said Miss Penn, pushing against the gate as she spoke.

"I don't know any such person," replied the young man, quietly.

"Isn't your name Chivers?" inquired Miss Penn, sharply.

"No, ma'am," said the gentlemanly young man—and there was a gleam of humor in his eyes, which Miss Penn was too confused to notice.

"Nor you don't know anything about Lady Lindesay's groom, who left this house five minutes ago?" retorted Miss Penn. She would have made a bad detective, with all her adroitness. There was want of tact and temper in this question, and its tone was sufficient to place watchful people on their guard.

"I have just said I do not know who Lady Lindesay is," said the young man, looking straight into Caroline's face with quiet determination; "do you wish anything else, ma'am?"

"No, thank you," said Miss Penn, flushing with vexation; "I wanted to see you or Mrs. Chivers on a matter of Lady Lindesay's—at least, the lady who drives the gray ponies—and—"

"I do not know anything about gray ponies, ma'am," interposed the gentlemanly young man; and this time Miss Penn perceived traces of amusement in his face.

"Ah, well," said Caroline, with a frigid, threatening smile, "I must only tell Sir Robert so, and perhaps he may come next time."

The young man bowed, as if such an occurrence would afford him much satisfaction; and, leaning on the gate, he and his mastiff watched Caroline out of sight.

She was baffled, irritated, and mortified—fearful of Lady Katherine's anger, which she might have fruitlessly incurred—wearied and exhausted from her long useless journey; and, reaching Abbeylands about dusk, she had only barely time to hurry to her own room to commence her evening toilette—for it was the day of the dinner-party—when Bessie Martyn tapped at her door.

"Miss Penn, could you come down to mother's room?—she wants you about the dessert," she said, inquisitively eyeing Caroline's finery on the bed—"about some ices or jellies, I think, Miss Penn."

"In a minute," answered Miss Penn, sharply, almost shutting the door in Bessie's face.

"I was just going to offer to do her hair up in splendid frizzed rolls, mother," said Bessie, indignantly, relating the affront, "and make her as nice as I could."

Miss Penn evidently thought she could do without Bessie's assistance, for when she sailed into the housekeeper's room, a quarter of an hour afterward, that good lady was overwhelmed with the grandeur of her appearance. She had not been saving up her annuity, and sitting up at nights, and paying visits to a dressmaker and various others for nothing.

Caroline's sleek black hair rose in perpendicular waves above her forehead, and fell in cataracts of suspiciously luxuriant braids and curls down on her neck and shoulders, which were whitened by a cloud-like web of snowy spangled tulle. There were billows of lavender silk rolling through the doorway in the wake of Caroline's figure; there was silken material glistening in Brodignagian festoons and "puffs" around Caroline's waist; there were damask roses in Caroline's hair, and tinkling ornaments all over Caroline's person.

"Why, Miss Penn, you're grander than her ladyship!" cried Mrs. Martyn.

"You don't say so," said Miss Penn, scornfully.

"Yes, indeed," replied the housekeeper. "My! there's a splendid dress! Must have cost a sight of money, Miss Penn. A great deal grander you'll be—she's in black velvet, Bessie tells me—very rich to be sure, but so sober. That's a splendid lavender, Miss Penn."

"My lady" was in black velvet, as the housekeeper had said—very pale, very quiet, with the sombre richness of her long sable robe clinging to her like a pall, her very diamonds shining with a cold frosty brilliance, her small beautiful hands wearily folded in her lap, and the light of her yearning eyes dimmed with sadness.

Sir Robert Lindsey wondered that he had never before noticed what a lady-like, good-looking girl Caroline Penn was, but Caroline Penn did not know what he thought of his grave, silent, young wife.

"She looked miserable," concluded the lady in the lavender silk, as she pinned up her dress in paper when laying it aside that night.

"Did you not notice, dear," said one of the county ladies to her husband, as they drove home from the dinner-party, "that Lady Lindsey is actually quite fading? Those olive-colored women lose their beauty very early."

Loosing her beauty! fading early!—Katherine, Lady Lindsey, though she was only twenty-four! Day by day Sir Robert Lindsey watched the cloud of spiritless sadness deepening on her bright face, and listened to melancholy tones making discord in the harmony of her clear, musical-ringing voice; a change, almost indefinable, but keenly painful to him, was observable in her frank, gay manner and her self-possessed bearing—a mute timidity, a nervous fear of displeasing him, a feverish anxiety to understand his wishes and commands, and, above all, a restraint, a guarded care and secrecy about her words and deeds.

Let men, such as Robert Lindsey was—honorable, kind and true, within an armor of sensitive pride, which rejected the slightest touch on its spotless surface as a foul stain—think what his feelings were, as he thus watched his young wife day by day. He thought he knew the cause of her secret sorrow. He thought the gold circlet on her finger was to her a badge of slavery, and that Abbeylands, and the heirlooms, and traditions, and splendors, were wearisome to death to her, when she had to share them with him. The mirror showed him a plain grave face, and dark hair threaded with gray, and the lines and wrinkles that had come with his forty-five years, and he thought that they were hateful in Katherine Lindsey's eyes. He thought also—ah! what did he think in lonely hours, when he reviewed his short married life, when he owned to himself that which he had never told to mortal ear, and when the knowledge only brought him deeper sorrow and more bitter regret?—that he loved her!

And Caroline Penn? She had never been so amiable, so powerful, so prosperous in every way, as in those days, when an intangible woe and grief, like an unresting spirit presaging coming trouble, walked through the tenantless rooms of the stately house, with the husband and wife apart, silent and secluded. Caroline dressed in silk and velvet quite commonly now; her spare frame, clothed in shining garments, flitted and rustled about the old mansion from garret to basement, like an omnipresent domestic goddess.

She was not wise, even in her generation, this managing, acute, sharp-witted young person. She was apt to be rash, and blind, and wrong-headed, where her passion for revenge or for gain was concerned. She kept close to Sir Robert as her sure friend and most powerful protector, and she disregarded all the rest of the household, by whom by this time she was beginning to be cordially detested. She hated Lady Lindsey too much to be able to preserve a cordial manner toward her—and of Caroline's envious flattery and hypocritical deference Lady Lindsey would have none. She would not have Caroline in any shape or form—she ignored her, she shut her out of her presence, and otherwise discarded that lady's strenuous endeavors to become her conscience-keeper.

With Mrs. Martyn, Caroline Penn certainly tried to form an alliance offensive and defensive; but she loosened the strongest bond of union there could have been between them, when she omitted to gain Bessie Martyn's confidence and goodwill.

"I'll never like her, mother, say what you please. She's a prying, deceitful, mean thing, even if she wore pearl-gray satin and ruby velvet, like my lady's court costume. What business has she to be giving orders and sailing about, with 'Sir Robert' here, and 'Sir Robert' there, and my lady sitting up there lonely in her dressing-room, and never giving an order or raising her voice, no more than if she were a visitor?" Thus uttered Bessie, indignantly fastening a lace tie with a natty carved ivory brooch over the blue crape, and otherwise making herself unnecessarily pretty.

"Well, my lassie, I'll tell you one thing," said her mother, gravely patting down the folds of her daughter's dress, "Miss Penn is like to rule Sir Robert and my lady, too."

"She never will!" cried Bessie, turning round sharply, her eyes sparkling with indignation.

"Bessie, I know what I know," said her mother, nodding her head, and speaking in an undertone of significance; "and I've a good reason for saying it. There, child, don't you mind; it's none of your business, Bessie."

This having of course a powerfully stirring effect on Bessie's curiosity, she made it her business to discover what Miss Penn had told her mother, and under the seal of secrecy her mother betrayed to her the secret that Miss Penn had intrusted to her keeping.

"It is the wickedest, blackest, cruellest lie that she ever told in her bad life!" cried Bessie, with tears in her blue eyes.

"Well, Bessie, I'm not going for to say that it's true," rejoined her mother, "but Caroline Penn hasn't watched her day and night for nothing."

"Well, then," muttered Bessie to herself, as she sat down before a heaped-up work-table in my lady's room, to unpick ribbons and edgings from a soiled white morning-robe, "I'll watch Caroline Penn—two can play at that game, I know."

So it was, alas! that while the spring sunlight and the tender green that decked the smooth lawns and meads of Abbeylands changed into summer's darker tints and deeper radiance of warmth, brightness and color, the golden beams of hope and happiness which may have trembled for a brief space above and around the gray ancestral pile had long since died out in cold blackness of silent sorrow and disappointment, and in their stead there lowered a cloud lurid with omens of coming desolation and woe.

Sir Robert Lindsey and his wife had lived apart in mute, dignified estrangement almost from the first month of their marriage. Each believed they had good and sufficient reason for imitating the other's behavior; but the breach had widened slowly, and then less slowly, and then rapidly, until the great gulf of separation between Robert Lindsey and the woman he had sworn to love and cherish could hardly have been greater if he had laid her in her dead youth and beauty beneath the cold white marble where slept the generations of high-born dames and demoiselles of the house of Lindsey; and alas! again, there were times when Robert Lindsey trembled to think that she never might be permitted to rest there.

The gulf had widened, until the happy, buoyant girl he had married had changed into an imperious, proud, cold, resolute woman, with schemes and plots ever agitating her restless, unhappy heart, craving for her past life, craving for what he might never hope to give her, recklessly perilling her fair name in her wilful defiance of him, weary of trying to please or obey him, weary of her gilded prison—this was his wife, the mistress of Abbeylands, the miserable husband owned to himself.

Owened to himself; but what of the evil angel ever at his ear? What of the ceaseless hints, and gentle reminders, and artfully disguised admissions, and pretended regrets, and delicate assiduous sympathy, and meekness, and patience, and admirable ministrations to likings and fancies and requirements, which were ever palpable to his senses in a thousand forms, daily and hourly, through the medium of a crafty, cruel, calculating woman's brain? Caroline Penn never flinched in her remorseless course; she never thought of pity or regret for a beautiful woman's ruined hopes, or compassion for an erring soul. She had no pity to spare for Katherine, Lady Lindsey. She laid her cruel plans and wily snares, and she cared not for the smirching and the bruising of the beautiful creature struggling in her toils.

CHAPTER IV.

"BESSIE Martyn, Sir Robert wishes to see you in the library."

"Me, Miss Penn?" said Bessie, nervously dropping her work, and rising with a fluttering color.

"Yes—you. Come at once." And Miss Penn drew her lace shawl about her with deliberate dignity, as she slowly descended the stairs before Bessie.

Her master was sitting on a chair by the open window when Bessie entered with a low curtsy. Some letters and papers, on a table near him, were pushed hastily away in disarray—bills, money, bunches of keys, and a half-emptied glass of wine; and he, with his haggard face leaning on his hand, was as if the world and its wealth and cares were gnawing at his very heart.

"Sir Robert, here is the young person," said Miss Penn, in a soft, modulated tone, and with a deep sigh.

"Ah," said he, rousing himself as if from a painful trance. "Bessie Martyn, I wish to ask you a few questions, which I shall expect you to answer in a truthful and straightforward manner. Do you hear?"

"Of course she will, Sir Robert. She would not attempt to answer in any other way," interposed Miss Penn, with a sweet smile tinged with sadness.

Bessie glanced at her with a hostile flush, and then said, steadily, "I always try to speak the truth, sir."

"A painful necessity," explained Sir Robert, with a hoarse quiver in his voice, "obliges me to seek information from you about your mistress."

Miss Penn turned away abruptly, and moaned at an escritoire near the fireplace.

"My mistress, Sir Robert?" said Bessie, trembling very much, but holding her head up. "What can I tell you, sir?"

"Where is Lady Lindesay gone to-day?" demanded Sir Robert, rising involuntarily to his feet, and speaking sternly.

"I think Miss Penn can tell you, sir, much better than me," replied Bessie, with a defiant nod at that lady's back hair. "She ought to know more of Lady Lindesay's comings and goings than my lady herself."

Miss Penn pressed her lips together, and, drawing her drapery around her, with a suspicion of offended majesty in her face and tones, she said, "Bessie Martyn, do you forget to whom you are speaking?—passing by my presence altogether," she added, with quiet humility.

Sir Robert had been watching her keenly, but he now turned to Bessie.

"Yes," he said, harshly, "you need not tell me what Miss Penn knows or does not know. Tell what you know, without any further prevarication. Where has Lady Lindesay gone to-day?"

"I'll tell you, Sir Robert," exclaimed Bessie, hotly, irritated by his manner and Miss Penn's sharp watchful eyes; "my lady's gone to visit some friends at a place called Charlton Mere, and that's all I know; and—and—Miss Penn ought to know a good deal more, when she watches, and spies, and tracks my lady across the country, and tries to get into houses after her, and peeps into her drawers and baskets, reading every bit of a letter she can get in a fireplace; and—and—listens at doors—I saw you, Miss Penn!—and tries to open her letters and papers, and—and—" (Bessie broke down with a sob) "and tells the most dreadful lies of a dear, beautiful, kind, good, sweet lady, that she's not fit to hold her slippers to, and frightens her, that she says she wishes she was in Heaven, to be free from spies and enemies. There, now—and I don't care—you may say what you like, Miss Penn; every word is truth that I've said, and mother knows it. And I beg your pardon, Sir Robert; I'm ready to cry my eyes out to see the way my lady is treated, because she's gentle and—"

"Hold your tongue, girl!" commanded Sir Robert, but he did not utter the words very angrily. "There is no one would dare to treat Lady Lindesay with anything but the utmost respect while she is mistress of Abbeylands."

Bessie shook her head doubtfully, and sobbed in her handkerchief.

"Sir Robert, you are quite aware of the real facts of the case, which this girl's attachment to her mistress—who has certainly been lavish of costly presents to her," said Miss Penn, venomously; "has represented in so distorted a light."

"Yes, yes, I know," he murmured, moodily.

"Unless you wish the young person to remain, after her insulting language to me, Sir Robert—"

"No, no; you may go, Bessie Martyn; and see that you keep your tongue silent," said Sir Robert, absently locking and unlocking a desk.

"Yes, I'll go now," muttered Bessie to herself; "but you'll hear more from me, Sir Robert, when Madame Pry isn't at your elbow!"

Bessie's indignation and schemes of vengeance were heard throughout the day; they flamed up fiercely in the servants' hall during dinner, when she dealt out mysteriously wrathful hints to her companions that "they might expect to hear something soon," and that "there was one too many in Abbeylands, for certain," and that "she would not stand it if she were shot for it." More could not be extracted from Bessie; but the servants coughed and nodded their heads with Masonic intelligence.

It was a sultry, lowering day, and as the hot, silent hours of the afternoon rolled on, Bessie grew sleepy and languid over her work, and at length put it aside; and taking a richly-bound novel from one of the rosewood shelves, she sat down by the open window to amuse herself. But the book was of rather too high a class of literature for Bessie's taste; she began to listen dreamily to the sleepy chirps of Lady Lindesay's canaries, to the ticking of the ormolu clock, to the steady pacing of Sir Robert's feet on the gravelled walk of the terrace; then fell to wondering where Miss Penn was, and finally slipped away into slumberous oblivion.

* * * * *

A sharp knock at the door startled Bessie violently, and she sprang to her feet with a bewildered stare at the twilight outside and the semi-obscurity inside.

"It's my lady! and I've been asleep for hours!" gasped Bessie, shivering; "and I'm perished to death. Oh, dear! there—I've knocked down the chair."

Half awake, and thoroughly confused, Bessie rushed to the door and unlocked it. It was not "my lady," but Sir Robert, who stood there on the fleecy violet mat.

"Has your mistress not returned yet?" he demanded, and there was something in his voice that frightened Bessie.

"No, Sir Robert," said Bessie, timidly.

"It is nearly eight o'clock," he remarked.

"Something may have delayed her ladyship," urged Bessie, trembling, she knew not why. "I dare say she will be home in a few minutes, Sir Robert; she is always back at six or half-past six."

He made no reply, but strode over to the easy-chair by the open window, and flung himself into it, leaning out on the sill, wet with dew.

"Shall I have the lamp lighted, Sir Robert?" asked Bessie, half fearful of the darkness.

"No," he said, in a low tone.

And so they remained, Sir Robert at the open dressing-room window, and Bessie in my lady's bedroom, afraid to look at the tall mirrors in the spectral gloom of the apartment—both listening and waiting.

The hour struck, and then the half-hour, and then the three quarters, and yet both master and maid waited in silence. The ghostly moonlight was beginning to steal into the room; Bessie could hear the throbbing of her heart in the oppressive stillness that seemed to have settled down over the whole household, when the clear, quick strokes of the clock telling the ninth hour resounded through the place, and with them the noise of Sir Robert's hasty steps quitting the dressing-room. Without giving herself time for a second thought, Bessie rushed after him, and heard him give a fierce order for his own favorite pair of horses and the light mail phaeton to be brought round instantly.

Bessie watched in silent fear while Sir Robert put on his overcoat, and, seizing his whip, ran down the steps.

"Will you hurry?" he shouted, like a man beside himself, to the bustling grooms and stable boys.

Suddenly Miss Penn, dressed in bonnet and shawl, brushed past Bessie, and joined Sir Robert as he waited. He said something in a sharp, dissatisfied tone to her, and as the phaeton swept round from the stable-yard, Bessie ran down desperately and touched his arm.

"Sir Robert, will you let me speak to you one minute?" she whispered, beseechingly.

"No, I cannot! Be off!" he cried, pushing her away roughly.

"Go in, you forward, lying minx!" said Miss Penn, in a savage undertone.

"Sir Robert," entreated Bessie, "one word!"

"What is it, girl?" he said, impatiently.

"If you are going to look for my lady, don't take Miss Penn with you! Don't, Sir Robert!" implored Bessie, in an urgent whisper. "She hates my lady; she has told shameful lies of a good, beautiful Christian lady," added Bessie, mixing up her adjectives in her distress; "don't take her; she'd send you wrong just to do my lady harm."

Bessie spoke rather at random in her agitation, but Sir Robert only said, "I am not going to take her, Bessie Martyn," and springing into the phaeton he drove away.

"Bessie Martyn, I will make you repent this!" said Caroline Penn, in a suffocated tone, while her pale face looked cadaverous in the moonlight.

"So you may, but I'll never stand to see you try to ruin an innocent lady!" retorted Bessie, courageously.

"Miss Penn, you let my daughter alone, please; she's a good, kind girl, who needn't be ashamed of anything she's said or done in her life," interposed Mrs. Martyn, with cutting significance.

The night passed away, and the gray dawn stole over the sleeping woods and lawns, and the grim silent old Abbey. Who would say that the sunlight could ever more bring joy and brightness to the desolate home?

CHAPTER V.

WHILE he lives, the memory of that night's drive to Charlton Mere will haunt Sir Robert Lindsey. The pale cloudy moonlight, the weird shapes of the trees and bushes as he swept past them, the deadened roll of the wheels on the early fallen leaves, the damp earthy scent of the close woodlands, the fragrance of the pine groves, and the gnawing agony of pain and anxiety goading him every step of the weary way beneath the calm pure eyes of Heaven, namely, the few sleepless stars that peered out here and there at him from behind hilltops and woods—all were vivid to him in after years. There were no other eyes upon him but those above, and the strong, proud man gave way to his grief and fear in frenzied words.

"Oh, Katherine, my darling!" he cried, "I cannot believe this! There must be some reason, some mistake. I will not believe Caroline's hints and stories, and yet—yet—have I not the evidence of my own senses? But not that—not that—my poor, beautiful girl! Wilfulness, weariness, disobedience, but not dishonor—it could never touch her; it could never touch her!"

In his dire extremity, Robert Lindsey took off his hat, and prayed aloud to Heaven to protect his wife.

Bessie Martyn little thought how often her unhappy master mentally referred to her passionate defence of her mistress, and each time with renewed consolation when Caroline Penn's cruel words occurred to him.

"I may have been always wrong," said he, with a sharp pang of remorse; "Caroline may have warped my judgment by her malice, since she hated Katherine so. Perhaps she might have cared a little for me, if I had tried to please her more in her own way, indulged her more, and been gayer with her."

Then he thought of the gray hairs in his beard and of his forty-five years against her twenty-four, and groaned with sick impatience.

It was past eleven o'clock when Sir Robert reached Charlton Mere. About a mile from the village he had stopped at a roadside hostelry which Caroline Penn had told him of, and procured a guide in one of the tavern-keeper's sons; and now by the latter's directions he drove across by the common and into the long deep lane.

"By the way," said he, asking the question which he had forgotten amid his troubled thoughts, "you have a pair of gray ponies in your stable—the lady has not taken them home yet?"

"Naw, sir," said the rustic, in some trepidation as to whom this stranger, who knew the interior of the stables, might be, "they're gone long ago."

Sir Robert pulled up the horses on their haunches. "Gone!" he cried.

"Yes, sur," said the lad, wishing himself anywhere but on Sir Robert's cushions and otter-skin rug.

"And Lady—the lady and the groom?"

"Naw, sur, naw un but the groom," replied the young fellow.

Sir Robert said not a word, but drove slowly to the farm-house gate and stopped there, "as if he were dazed," the lad said, telling the story afterward.

The furious mastiff made no delay in his frantic leaps and hoarse raging barks, and soon the sound of unfastening bolts was heard, and light streamed forth from a door near at hand.

"What do you want? Who are you?" cried a strong, clear feminine voice.

"I will tell you, if you will keep your dog quiet," said Sir Robert.

The woman bade the dog lie down, and came out with a lantern in her hand.

"Are you Mrs. Chivers?" asked Sir Robert, springing down.

"Yes," said she, holding the lantern to his face.

"Is Lady Lindesay here?" he demanded, laying his hand on her shoulder. "You must tell me, woman—do you hear—I must know."

"Who are you?" said the woman, rather stiffly.

"Sir Robert Lindesay," he replied; "and there is some secret or some mystery about this house which brings Lady Lindesay here, and I will know it. Is my wife here?"

"I never saw Sir Robert Lindesay in my life; I don't know you, sir, nor do I know who your wife may be; but this I know, that you have no right to come to a respectable dwelling at the dead of night, and storm at people in this way," said Mrs. Chivers, indignantly, shaking his hand off, and retreating inside her gate.

"Listen to me, woman," returned Sir Robert, hoarsely; "I will pay you well. I am nearly distracted, and I want you to help me. If Lady Lindesay is here I will take her home; if she has left, you must give me what traces you can of her whereabouts."

"Lady Lindesay is safe wherever she is—that is all I will tell you, sir," said the woman, when a second person ran over from the house door, and Sir Robert saw in the rays of light from the lantern the face of a young man. He whispered something to the woman, and she turned to Sir Robert with a different expression.

"You may come in, Sir Robert," she said; "Lady Lindesay is in the house. Softly, sir, there is one dying here, too."

"Who is dying?" demanded Sir Robert.

"A poor lady," said Mrs. Chivers.

He entered through the low-ceiled kitchen, in which was a small fire burning redly on the hearth; through long narrow passages, lighted by Mrs. Chivers with a tallow candle; and then into a small, neat parlor communicating with a bed-room. The door was ajar, and Mrs. Chivers motioned him to enter, with the warning, "Hush!"

A low bed draped in handsome damask, a small table beside it laden with a plate of fruit, a medicine bottle, and a decanter of wine, a shaded lamp burning softly on another table, a figure standing by the bedside, and a dark face and long tresses of shining hair streaming over the pillows—these were what he beheld, while a camphorous, sick-room odor filled the apartment.

The figure by the bedside was Katherine, Lady Lindesay, and the face on the pillow startled Sir Robert by its being a haggard, ruined likeness of his wife.

"Katherine," he said—his anger and fear fading before Katherine's sad, gentle face, and the serious light in her eyes—"what are you doing here? who is that?"

"My mother, Sir Robert," sobbed his wife. "Hush! She is dying. Come into this room to speak to me."

"Your mother?" gasped Sir Robert—"why, you told me—"

"I told you three months before you married me that she was dead," interrupted his wife, "and I told you what I believed. She was not dead, though, as I discovered afterward. It is a long story, Sir Robert, but I must tell it now, I suppose—long as I have striven to hide it."

"Was it her whom you came to see here?" he asked, tremulously.

"Yes," said Katherine Lindesay, with a deep sigh.

"And why did you keep it secret from me, Katherine?" he asked, taking her hand.

"Because, Sir Robert," said his wife, drawing her hand away and looking straight into his eyes, "I could not let you know my mother," and then her eyes fell, and her face quivered all over.

"Why, Katherine?" he questioned, very gently.

"You have not been very tolerant of my whims and fancies, Sir Robert," said Katherine, somewhat bitterly; "you have not been very unwilling to believe the worst of me, who never wronged you in thought, word, or deed; but you might be generous enough to spare me from further questioning. I came to see my mother here; I could not let you know the fact of her existence; and she is dying now. I found she was dying to-day, and I could not leave her, but I sent the groom home with a note to you."

"I never got it," he interrupted, eagerly; "it was because I did not know where you were, Katherine, and because I was nearly mad with alarm and anxiety, that I came after you. You say you have never wronged me, Katherine; but, in withholding your confidence from me, and suffering malicious people to make what assertions they pleased respecting your strange conduct, have you not wronged me cruelly?"

"I could not tell you," said Katherine, sadly and resolutely.

"But you could let others say worse things of yourself, Katherine," he observed; "which do you think would touch me more nearly?"

"I was wrong," said Katherine with tears, "but I was so unhappy and lonely, that I did not know what I had best do. I could not tell you that you had made a worst mésalliance than you thought," she added, drying her tears, and confronting her husband proudly.

"And this woman is your mother, Katherine?"

"Yes, and she is dying. I must go to her now, Sir Robert," said his wife, endeavoring to pass him.

He looked at her bright hair girlishly curling on her black dress, at her spirituelle face downcast and pale, at her little white hands nervously trembling, and as with one swift comprehensive bound his mind flew back over the past, seeing the wrong made right and the darkness clear, and in his joy finding his wife all that he believed her to be—pure and true—his yearning love, pity and thankfulness melted down the icy barriers of his pride at once and forever.

"Katherine, my darling," he cried, taking her in his arms, "who so fit to be your confidant and protector as your husband? You do not care much for me, I know, but, after all, you might be sure I would be your best counsellor and friend; indeed I would, Katherine."

She gave a startled glance at her husband's face, to see if he was in earnest.

"I did not think you cared anything for me," she said, in a low tone; "I thought you only married me for my money."

"So I did, Katherine," he answered, truthfully, though her reproach cut him to the heart; "but, my darling, I came to love you afterward. Won't you share your troubles with me, Katherine?"

"Why," said she, sorrowfully, "did you never tell me that before? Oh, Robert, it would have saved me such pain! I dared not tell you of my poor mother, when I knew how you valued your noble pedigree, and all those great names in your family history that you told me were so spotless, and concerning which there was never a blot on the escutcheon of the house of Lindsay."

Sir Robert colored with shame; his young wife had his pompous expressions so sadly by heart.

"There never was a spot or stain on our name, my darling," he said, "and there never was a purer or fairer wearer of it than Katherine Lindsay."

She glanced through the open doorway at the figure on the bed.

"Tell me of her, Katherine," he whispered; "tell me, my dear wife."

She looked at him, the color coming and going in her cheeks, and her bright eyes troubled.

"She is my mother, and she was a gay, beautiful girl when my father married her," said Lady Lindsay; "but he was too grave, and—I mean, she was very young, and—"

"Yes, I know," put in Sir Robert, with a sigh.

"She was fond of dress and admiration, and she had a passion for theatre-going, and the end was she ran away from him, and went on the stage—ran away and left her husband, Sir Robert, and went on the stage," repeated Lady Lindsay, distinctly. "And he said she was dead, and intended she should be dead to him from that time forth. That is two-and-twenty years ago, Sir Robert, and I know little of the life she led in those years, save that it was a miserable one; and when, at the time of my marriage, one of my solicitors discovered that a strange, wild-looking woman who came to his office to make inquiries about me was no other than my long-lost mother, he informed me of the fact, meaning to give her money and send her out of the country; but when I saw her in spite of him, and when she wept and kissed my hands, and asked to be let live somewhere near me, that she might see me a few times before she died, I resolved I would not forsake my poor wretched mother. And then, Sir Robert, I took this place for her, and Mrs. Chivers, who was an old servant of mine, kept the secret well, even from her own daughter and son-in-law—the young man you saw—and never told them I was Lady Lindsay; and I used to disguise my dress and leave my carriage and ponies at the hostelry beyond the village, and walk here across the fields. I have done this once or twice a week for nearly twelve months; but it is over now—she is dying."

There was a dead silence for a minute after she had spoken; all the pride of the Lindesays was doing battle with his love in Sir Robert's heart—but only for a minute. His living, beloved Katherine was a thousand times dearer than the dignity of his dead ancestors; still it was a struggle between the two.

"It is a sad, terrible story, Katherine," he said, with a sigh. "You must have suffered a great deal to keep a—a—"

"A disgraceful secret!" said Katherine, coldly. "Yes, it was very painful; but I came to feel such deep pity, and love even, for this poor desolate woman, that it made it easier to bear." She moved away a few steps. "Mrs. Chivers will get a room ready for you, Sir Robert, in a few minutes, if you wish to stay. I am going to sit beside my mother," said Lady Lindsay, with one of her old resolute expressions, though her features were wan and weary.

"Won't you let me keep watch with you, Katherine?" asked her husband. "Do you imagine I should think harshly of the poor soul passing away? Have we not both been wronging each other, Katherine?"

"We may—" she began, then quitted him abruptly. "Yes, mother," she said, softly leaning over the bed.

The haggard face was raised from the pillow, and the dark eyes, painfully distended, fixed on Katherine's face. They were so dreadfully like and unlike those two faces—she so pitying, and gentle, and youthful, the other so lined, and hardened, and scarred.

Robert Lindsay shuddered as he looked. The skeleton fingers of the trembling hand were pointing at him.

"Who is that?" came the faint, gurgling whisper.

"That is my husband, mother," said Katherine.

"You know I told you of him."

"Yes, I know—I know." The face was raised again in struggling anxiety. "Will he speak to me? Sir—Robert—you will—not be angry—Katherine was married when—"

"When I found her out," said Katherine, wiping the cold brow, while her tears fell fast.

In the awful presence hovering over them, with the fleeting soul striving to plead for forgiveness with him, with his wife's grief and the sight of a ruined, broken-hearted creature once as young and beautiful as she before him, Robert Lindesay, for the first time in his life, felt ashamed of his family pride and pomp, as making him contemptible where all was terribly earnest.

"No, not angry; how could I be?" said he, earnestly, "Katherine is my beloved wife," and in sight of the fading eyes he drew Katherine's arm within his.

The fading eyes flashed with some of the long-forgotten light of happiness, and then turned to Katherine again.

"God bless my daughter, and—"

A fluttering, shivering sigh followed, and then the gray pall of death fell on the world-worn face.

"She is gone, Katherine—poor soul, she is gone!" said Sir Robert, brokenly. "My darling, I will try to make up for the mother's love you never knew."

"Oh, Robert, why did not tell me before?" sobbed Katherine. "I never thought you cared for me, and—I loved you at first, until I grew afraid of you."

"Your poor mother tried to bless us both; will you not try to love me again, Katherine?" he entreated.

"I will," said Katherine. And thus in the presence of death the husband and wife were united.

* * * * *

Caroline Penn left the Abbey the hour Lady Lindesay returned to it, and went on the Continent, where she was soon lost sight of.

Katherine Lindesay is a happy wife and mother, and Sir Robert is not half as formally dignified as he used to be. Katherine laughs at him now, when he tries any stately frigid manners with her, and calls him some eminently ridiculous pet name, which provokes and amuses him at the same time. And then he pleases himself with thinking that there never was so bright, and winning, and talented a Lady Lindesay, or such a good mother to such a splendid young heir of Abbeylands, as his wife, and so becomes self-congratulatory about the esoutcheons and dignities after all. He knows they are safe in Katherine Lindesay's hands.

OUR CLUB.

BY ANNIE L. MUZZEY.

IV.

ABOUT MARRIAGE.

HOW would two such strongly-marked and individualized characters as Jeannette and the professor carry themselves in their new role of acknowledged lovers, and in what manner, if at all, would they announce the tender relation established between them? were questions mentally exercising the Club the ensuing evening, a whisper of the thrilling state of affairs having got mysteriously in the wind, as such things do.

Nothing could have been more simple and natural.

Jeannette, always first in the field, was sitting at the table looking over the fresh periodicals and talking energetically, as was her fashion, when the professor, a little late from his day's enforced absence, came in with the look of a man who, after long and painful journeyings had at last reached the shrine of his hopes, ambitions and aspirations.

With a general nod to all present, he went straight up to his "bright particular," who had risen with beaming face to greet him, and bowing his godly head, gave her a conjugal kiss with the freedom, grace and authorized right of a Benedict of twenty years' standing.

Might it not have evidenced more tenderness and delicacy of feeling if Jeannette had waited in some dark corner and come in all blushing with the guilty sense of having a lover? Was there not in this public demonstration of mutual affection and understanding—a—well, a lack of that fine sentiment which we awkwardly define as good taste?

These are delicate points which the Club, and others, always critical in such matters, are permitted to decide, each to his and her individual satisfaction.

"Good people," said the professor, with straightforward simplicity and honest pride, "I have the happiness of presenting to you Jeannette, my promised wife."

And there was nothing for the good people but to rise and acknowledge the relation with proper and becoming congratulations.

With the exception of our occasional and somewhat waggish visitor, Dr. Osgood, whose anti-marriage principles were sustained by his fifty years' single blessedness or wretchedness, as the case might be.

"My dear friends," he said in a hollow, sepulchral voice, looking around with a lugubrious countenance, "it becomes us on this most melancholy occasion to offer our misguided brother and mistaken sister, so late entailed in worldly snares, our sincerest and profoundest sympathy and compassion."

And suiting the action to the word, he got up in a funeral gloom, and, groaning deeply, advanced and with a commiserative look, as though the most heart-rending affliction had befallen them, shook hands solemnly with Jeannette and the professor.

"Thanks, friend doctor, for your kind condolences," returned the professor, with an air of gratitude, "we accept them in good faith against our possible time of need."

"For we are prepared for all sorts of weathers," Jean added, smiling.

"And as Robert Collyer said the other evening, only so our love is deep enough to float the ship we can bravely breast the storms, which are needful to clear the atmosphere," said the professor, coming to her support.

"Bless us!" ejaculated Sherwood, with a contemptuous shrug. "We shall have nothing now from these two demented persons, but panegyrics on love and connubial felicity. Except a couple newly married, I know of nothing that can compare in egotism, self-complacence and self-satisfaction with a couple freshly engaged. They advertise themselves wherever they may be with an obtrusiveness and persistency, and a total absorption in each other, which is—excuse me—quite disgusting; and the air of superiority which they assume toward those who have not arrived at their exalted and beatific state, is something that needs to be seen to be appreciated. Look at the professor. Should you judge the world had any farther honors or preferments to bestow on him? He glows, and shines, and scintillates all over. Ordinarily, you would not take him for a man at all inclined to sentiment, or likely at any time to be attacked with the poetic mania, but it would not be in the least a surprising thing after this to see him rumple up his ambrosial locks, and mounting his winged Pegasus, amble delightedly through a mile of flowery stanzas celebrating the heavenly blessedness, and divine ecstasy of love-united souls."

"And, Jeannette," struck in Dell Falconer, in her vivacious way, "like a certain renowned woman of the platform, after six months' celestial experience, will put forth, under a sensational emblem and title, a book eulogizing the exalted joy, happiness and freedom of the married state, with a theatrical clap-trap and rapture of enthusiasm, suggestive of new brooms, which always sweep well."

"No, truly, Dell, my friend, I will not that," disclaimed Jeannette, earnestly. "'As much virtue as there is, so much appears,' is an Emersonian period worthy to become a proverb. The thing must stand on its own merits. A too frantic dilating and bolstering-up of its claims justly excites a suspicion that there is something weak and shaky at the foundation."

"Precisely what I would say of the case in point," acceded Dr. Osgood, warmly. "There is so much rant and fusian sounding in the air regarding the sacred and beautiful relation of marriage, that one is moved to wonder whether, as we have come to judge of all things so extravagantly extolled, its virtues are not a little meretricious. After a trial of six thousand years, more or less, an institution, it is reasonable to suppose, should have become firmly enough fixed in the affections and the confidence of human kind to hold by its own intrinsic merit, if it had any, without the sustaining force of law and opinion. Do we need anybody to tell us that the sun is the light and life of this terrestrial sphere, and are there any pros and cons concerning the blessing of its influence?"

"No, I presume not," responded the professor, to this abstruse query; "but there are plenty of people who will tell you in the same day that it is too warm, and they can't abide it; that it is too glaring, and that it doesn't agree with them; that it shines too much, and that it doesn't shine enough—for even blessings cannot escape the criticisms of peevish, petulant, dissatisfied, fault-finding natures, as a reason for the vigorous defence of marriage, which you profess to regard as irrational and absurd, if it be the good that is claimed; I would refer you to the violent assaults which in these latter days are being made on that time-honored institution. When our principles are assailed, we have to rally to their support; when our sanctuaries are invaded, we cannot sit mute and unresisting."

"But that is admitting that you have assailable and vulnerable points," cunningly deduced the doctor. "Why flutter like a snared bird? No evil can befall the thing that is fixed and true. If God be with you, who can be against you?"

"God gives us the divine right to fight His battles, and the victory is sure, as we are faithful," answered the professor, coolly. "I admit the vulnerable points as being in ourselves, but not in the sacred social relation which we imperfectly sustain."

"Is that the reason of all this trouble? Why, then, we should have a law of social relation adjusted to the natures and needs of our people," returned his opponent.

"No, we should have a law pure, just and holy, and educate our people up to its standard," maintained the professor, firmly.

"Ha! a docile, tractable school you have, after centuries of training, with open divorces ranging at fifty per cent., and actual ones at ninety," chuckled Dr. Osgood, relishing the joke.

"You leave a generous margin," smiled the professor. "Ten true marriages in a hundred; that is really hopeful—that is progress, friend doctor."

"True marriage—hum!—elective affinities—psychic attractions—ah!—have I not heard somewhere somewhat of this before?" studied Osgood, rubbing his forehead meditatively.

"I must say, however," went on Professor Engel, not marking the doctor's ridicule, "that while I reverence and believe, with all my soul, in the institution of marriage, I do not in any sense approve of the reckless, impious fashion in which, in a majority of cases, its duties, relations and responsibilities are assumed. There is a kind of individual marriage, so to speak, a bringing of one's own faculties into harmony and equipoise that is necessary to accomplish before we have any right to seek marriage with another. Two undisciplined, undeveloped, inexperienced and ungoverned natures, brought together by the blind force of circumstances in the closest and most intimate association, will be convulsed by storms, embittered by strifes, overcome by temptations, and driven asunder by differences, which, with hearts more tempered with love, and minds more enlightened with wisdom, might have been avoided or controlled to higher and nobler ends; while the weak, unfortunate souls that wail helplessly into existence through them, will bear in themselves through all their marred, unsatisfied and passion-racked days, the scars and pains of battles that should have been fought and decided before they were summoned to a world which it is their right to enter at the best estate that human and divine power can confer."

"Come, come, my worthy man, you are trenching on my ground," said the doctor, rubbing his hands complacently.

"No, I'm not. I know your ground. I'd fight shy of it as I would of a cockatrice's den," retorted the professor, indignantly. "What I want to prove to you, is, that all this conjugal trouble and struggle and infelicity of which we see and talk so much, and about which you and your party are raising such a wild hubbubboo, is not the fault of the state, but the result solely of unfitness in the candidates for the state, and that our true remedy lies, not as you suggest, and as you insist, in abrogating the marriage relation; but, in making ourselves worthy to sustain it holily, reverently, purely. I would agree with you so far, that wedlock should be an exception rather than a rule, until the world is in a condition to admit of making it universal; but this is an order which neither you nor I can establish, and the unhappy, incongruous sortings will go on adding their accumulated miseries to the burdens of humanity, God knows how long."

"Well, you will remember those in bonds as bound with them, I suppose. There is no remedy in your dispensary for these poor, galled wretches, is there? 'What God has joined together,' you know," said the doctor, with pious cant.

"There is the same remedy in my dispensary, doctor, that there is in yours, for the patient brought to you with a mutilated limb. If possible to save it, and preserve, intact, the health and symmetry of the body 'which God has joined together,' you leave no means untried to that end. But if this cannot be done—what then?"

"Why, I lop off the offending member, to be sure," returned the doctor; "but not without an inward excretion of the infernal inventions contrived by human ingenuity, prompted of the devil to trap poor unwearied, witless victims to ruin. Had my patient been left to the ways of nature, I say, pitifully, he would not have been brought to this grievous strait."

The sharp, repeated tap of Dell's afghan hook upon the table commanded the disputants to order.

"Gentlemen," she said, pertly, "please be so kind as a talk down to the comprehension of your listeners. I cannot make out from the sound and fury of your words, what it is that I am to do. I'm a properly brought-up young woman, and my friends are all anxious and expect me to make a proper settlement in life—that is, to snare and catch a man with a sufficient competence to support me in becoming style. But here is one of you inveighing against marriage altogether, and the other hedging it about with difficulties and conditions that render it next to an impossibility—and pray, what is a well-brought-up young woman on a look out for a settlement, to make of it all?"

Sherwood had got up while she was speaking, and stood balancing himself uneasily, first on one foot and then on the other, his hands thrust into his pockets in an embarrassed way, his eyes cast sheepishly down.

"You see there's so many well-brought-up young women," he said, as though he had been personally appealed to, "a fellow doesn't know what to do. He can't marry 'em all, in this country—at least not all at once—and he doesn't want to show partiality—'tisn't gallant. If the dear creatures would only settle it among themselves and take me, some of them, I'd feel infinitely obliged, but it's a dreadful responsibility to choose."

And he looked around with an affected air of timid distress.

"Generous and suffering man!" Dell exclaimed, in a fervor of sympathy. "Your condition is so much more harrowing than mine that I withdraw my case entirely, and commend yours to the consideration of these wise savants. Prescribe for the afflicted 'fellow,' doctor."

"There isn't much to be done for a rattle-pated pair like you and Sherwood, who are always breaking in upon our profound discourses with your distracting nonsense," responded the doctor, brusquely. "Sherwood's symptoms are those of a man jilted in early life, and being excessively vain, the disappointment and mortification have soured on him until he has acquired a chronic and almost unconscious habit of sneering and railing at everything under the sun, and it is doubtful if he is even capable of a thoroughly earnest feeling. As for you, Miss Dell—well, I question if there will be any place for you in the 'New Republic.' Finding no game for your traps you will cry with all the anguish of the moor, 'Othello's occupation's gone.' You will need to put by your interminable worsted snarling, take off your back hair, sacrifice your beloved train and dromedary's bunch, loosen your corset strings, get into an attire fit for a Christian woman, and give yourself to some hearty, serious, honest, useful work that will help forward the cause of truth and freedom, and hasten the day when we shall have no debasing human slavery to fashion or passion."

"In a word, I am to rise up, lay the shears to my hair, put on the reform dress which is neither this thing nor the other, but a little of both, seize a blue cotton umbrella and rush forth shrieking in quest of a mission," Dell said, with undisturbed good-humor. "Excuse me, Dr. Osgood, but I think I'll snarl my worsteds a little longer. When you see them taking shape in a gay-hued afghan for your favorite horse, you'll feel more kindly affectioned toward them. But, soft, what is this that Templeton is saying in low murmured aside to his charming wife?"

"And Jeannette and the professor are listening with their hearts," noted the doctor.

"We were saying only how very wonderful and amusing it is to hear you wisecracks talking so sagely of a matter you know nothing at all about," Templeton explained.

"Of marriage, do you mean?" they all queried, in a flash of confusion.

"Yes."

"Well, people must theorize, you know," said the professor. "But, come, give us a word out of your experience. Mrs. Templeton, have you nothing to say?"

"Does not my life speak?" responded that sweet-voiced lady, smiling straight into the eyes of her husband, for it was a peculiarity of this couple always to look at each other, no matter to whom they were talking—a peculiarity at which we laughed sometimes, but with a curious little thrill at our hearts nevertheless. "I think with Jeannette," she went on, "that if marriage does not commend itself in the lives of such of us as have put it on trial, no words of ours can make it fair."

"And no words are needed to give force to the beautiful example we have daily before our sight," Jeannette said, warmly. "I am not at all affected by rapturous bursts of eloquence concerning the beauty, sweetness and sacredness of love and marriage; nor do a newly-wedded pair, whom most people esteem so interesting, suggest anything to me but the greenness, rawness and insipidity of unripe fruit which may or may not mature into something rich, generous, sweet and wholesome, as its nature is. But when I see a man or woman who have stood shoulder to shoulder through the battle shocks, and the dead, dreadful commonplaces of life with unflinching affection and trust—better still, when I see a loyal couple, with heads silvered white and forms bent and tremulous with age, clinging yet to the fresh, bright love of their youth that has been the one true, steadfast thing through all the fluctuations of time, the deceptions and treacheries and temptations of the world, and is now on the brink of eternity their guiding light and comforting support—why, then, I catch a glimpse, and I am penetrated with a sense of the wonderful power, and glory, and sweetness, and holiness of the divine thing we name marriage, and I bow my head with a reverence that I yield to nothing else under God."

"Aye, aye, Jeannette," responded Templeton, in his hearty, open, honest manner. "It is age that tests the quality and brings out the flavor of love as well as of wine. But these people will not believe there is anything they do not see on the surface, and they will weigh and measure and judge always after their own stupid, foolish, superficial fashion. Let them. It gratifies them, and it doesn't hurt us. Let them talk. We have no churlish objection. In fact, we rather like the agitation. All this wordy warfare about marriage, this knocking to and fro of things sacred and profane, will result by and by in a needed reform of very gross evils. It is as the wind winnowing the chaff from the wheat. And there is a good deal of chaff, Jeannette, and there will need to be a good deal of wind. Let them talk—let them talk."

But "they" did not appear inclined to talk after that. Templeton's love was his religion, and when he revealed his worship, which was not often in words, scoffing and doubting seemed as irreverent and irrelevant as cursing in a church.

Even the doctor was silent, and withdrew unto himself, as Dell said afterward, as though he had been a rattlesnake touched by an ashen wand. And presently he went away, and the others, intent on their own devices, followed, ere long, his example, leaving Jeannette and the professor alone with the Templetons to talk over in confidence and sympathy the duties, and hopes, and plans, and pleasures of their new estate.

But as the lessons of wisdom and experience evolved from this talk are only valuable to those who seek them, the reporter will withhold the notes, unless specially requested to use them.

MAKING PEOPLE HAPPY.—A poetical writer has said, that some men move through life as a band of music moves down the street, flinging out pleasure on every side through the air, to every one, far and near, that can listen. Some men fill the air with their strength and sweetness, as the orchards in October days fill the air with the ripe fruit. Some women cling to their own houses, like the honeysuckle over the door, yet, like it, fill all the region with the subtle fragrance of their goodness. How great a bounty and blessing it is so to hold the royal gifts of the soul that they shall be music to some, fragrance to others, and life to all! It would be no unworthy thing to live for, to make the power which we have within us the breath of other men's joys, to fill the atmosphere which they must stand in with a brightness which they cannot create for themselves.

A WOMAN'S TACT.—A lady writes, we all know that when a man in anger is whipping his horse, and we remonstrate, he will sometimes continue with renewed energy, to show he will do as he pleases. He had full opportunity to do this until the formation of societies for the protection of animals; and one had to resort to novel means to prevent cruelty. She then relates an instance where she saw a driver, angry with his horses for some fancied offence, about to lash them severely. She interrupted him by inquiring the way to a certain street, to a certain man's house, both of which she knew very well. But the driver, too gallant not to answer the lady's questions, had opportunity for his temper to cool, and restored the whip to its socket without striking a blow.

THE husks of emptiness rustle in every wind; the full corn in the ear holds up its golden fruit noiselessly to the Lord of the harvest.

INSUBORDINATION; OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER I.

AN INCIPIENT DEMONSTRATION.

"I'll not stand this any longer," said Bill Grimes.

"Nor I, neither," said Ike Wilson.

"I wonder how you'll help it?" responded Tom Peters, hammering a piece of leather to the tune of "Yankee Doodle," and filling the shop with a din that drowned all voices for the space of the next five minutes.

"There are many ways to kill a dog without choking him," broke in Ike, as the noise of Tom's hammer and ringing lapstone subsided.

"That may be, too; but you'll find old Lignumvitæ hard to kill, or I'm mistaken in him. He's a screamer when once raised; and I, for one, had as lief meet a bear, as to cross his path when his nap is fairly up."

"A hard bit and a steady hand have cooled many a wild colt," said Bill; "and I'll do it to the end of the world, or I'm mistaken."

"There's no use in your talking, Tom," said Ike, a little tartly. "You always were a chicken-hearted, babyfied sort of a feller, afraid of your own shadow of a moonlight night. Nobody asked for your advice, nor your help. Hardamer's an old tyrant, and his wife's as much of a she-devil as she knows how to be. We've stood their kicking and cuffing long enough, and would be fools to stand it any longer. But you can go on your hands and knees to them, if you choose, and thank them for beating you; but, for one, I set my foot down here, that old Lignumvitæ sha'n't lay a feather on me from this day, henceforth and forever."

"Here's my hand to that," said Bill Grimes, dashing his hard fist into the open palm of his worthy associate.

"I don't like the present state of things any better than you do," said Tom, who began to feel himself in the minority; "but I can't see the use of a feller's putting his head into the lion's mouth. We can't hold our own against old Hardamer, and it would be fool-hardiness to try."

"There were many just such as you, Tom, in the glorious days of the Revolution; but all the prophesying of faint hearted croakers, was nothing. Our Yankee boys had right on their side."

"But, right don't always make might."

"Pool ain't here three of us, and any one of us a match for old Hardamer? Don't talk of might against right, if you please. But you needn't fatigue yourself, Tom, about the matter, if you're afraid! Ike and I can do the thing to a charm. We're not afraid of the old boy, tail and all."

"I reckon you'd find the old boy a queer chicken to deal with. But we'll let his majesty rest, if you please," responded Tom. "I, for one, have no particular friendship for him; nor any particular desire to provoke his ill-will by too much familiarity. Let's hear how you're going to manage affairs, and then I can tell you whether I'm with you or not."

"Comparisons are odious, so says the copybook, but they are useful sometimes, you know, Tom; and, much as it may offend your ears, I must drag in your friend, his satanic majesty, by way of illustration. It's an easy matter to raise him, you know; but, as there is no telling beforehand how he'll behave himself, there's no telling how a body will act in the case. Now, we have determined to raise his majesty in old Hardamer; how we shall manage him afterward is yet to be told. No sailor knows exactly how he will act in a storm; but he would be a lubber indeed if he stayed on shore until he settled the matter to his satisfaction."

"That may be all very true, Bill; but a good sailor would be sure, before putting to sea, that all was right and tight aloft and aloft; and that there was ballast enough to keep all erect in the worst storm. You know that Hardamer has law on his side, and that if he can't manage us himself, he can turn us over to a constable. I've no wish to have a taste of the whipping-post."

"This is a free country, Tom; and a pretty big one, too. I'd find my way to the Rocky Mountains, before I'd wax another cord for the old rascal, if he attempted to play a game of that kind; and I'd tell him so, too. The fact is, the law wouldn't justify him in the way he bully-rags and beats us all the while. There's two sides to a question, always—and, of course, there's two sides to this. If he'll treat us well, we'll treat him well. But, 'wisey-wersey,' if he don't."

"Well, I don't care if I join you," said Tom, who was not quite so headstrong as his fellow-apprentices, but who, when he once set his head upon doing anything, would show no hanging back.

"I thought there was something of the man in you, Tom," said Ike, seizing his hand and shaking it violently; "if we don't have a tea-party now, with old Lignumvitæ, I'm a fool."

"Don't let's be in too much of a hurry about it, Ike," responded Tom, who always preferred the slow but sure way.

"Strike when the iron's hot, is my motto" said Ike.

"You're both right, and mean the same thing," said Bill. "Let's lay low until old Lignumvitæ cuts up one of his tantrums, and then I'm for being into him like a thousand of brick."

"Suppose we make this rule," said Tom, "that he sha'n't flog us, and that we will anub him up, the first time he tries that trick."

"Agreed," said Bill.

"Agreed," said Ike.

And the three worthies crossed hands in confirmation of the contract.

This little scene of incipient insubordination occurred some thirty or forty years ago in Baltimore, in the back shop of a neat boot-making establishment, on Market Street, the owner of which carried one face all smiles and welcome for his customers, and another all frowns and harshness for his boys. His name we will call Hardamer. As an apprentice, he had been hardly used; and having been taken while a very small boy from the almshouse, he had received no schooling previous to the time of his apprenticeship to the cordwaining business. By virtue of his indentures, he was to have been sent to school a certain number of months during his minority. But in his case, the indenture was pretty much a dead letter, for all the schooling he obtained was at night, during the last year of his service. In this time he learned to read a little, and to write a cramped, almost unintelligible hand. Soon after he became free, having the love of money deeply implanted in his mind, he opened a small shop, in a poor part of the town, and took one boy. By dint of hard work and close economy he was enabled to live upon about one-half of his earnings, and thus gradually to accumulate a small capital. His progress, however, was very slow, and it was full twenty years before he was able to open on Market Street. In the meantime, he had married a girl about as ignorant as himself, who felt her own importance growing gradually as did her husband's property. They had been ten years in Market Street at the time of the opening of our story, and were blest with a brood of six daughters, aged from seven to twenty years. These daughters, as they had grown up, had been accomplished in the arts of dancing, playing on the piano, doing nothing, etc., and in consequence of these superior attainments, had a commendable degree of contempt for all young mechanics, and an exalted idea of any one who could write "merchant," or "M. D." after his name. The three eldest, Genevieve, Geneva and Gertrude, were of the respective ages of sixteen, eighteen and twenty; and were looked upon by their mother as perfectly accomplished, and ready to make charming wives for doctors, lawyers or merchants, whichever might come forward and claim their willing hands.

We cannot say whether the reader will find them very interesting girls, but it is necessary that he should be introduced, and he must be as patient and polite as possible.

"I wonder, ma," said Genevieve, the eldest, one day after dinner, while lounging at the piano, "why pa don't quit business, it's so vulgar? I don't believe we'll ever get married while our parlor is within hearing of the shop, and the ears of our company stammered with the constant sound of the lapstone. How can pa be so inconsiderate?"

"That's a fact," said Miss Gertrude, just turning the corner of sixteen. "Doctor Watson has never been to see me since that night when it was hammer, hammer, hammer, in the back shop all the while. I tried to apologize to him on account of it, and said it was so disagreeable; and that I would persuade pa to move away or quit business, that he was rich enough to do without work. I wish, ma, you would move up into Charles Street, so that we could live like other people. I'm mortified every day of my life at the poverty-struck way in which we live."

Mrs. Hardamer was silent, for she did not know exactly what to say. She thought pretty much as her daughters did about matters and things, but she did not exactly like to bring her thoughts out in words before them.

"The fact is," again spoke up Genevieve, "I'm almost discouraged. I'm twenty, and have not had a single direct offer yet. And I never expect to have while things remain as they are. Pa don't appear to have a bit of consideration! If he'd only move into a bigger house away from this dirty shop, or quit business, as he ought to do, and then give large parties, we might get our pick. But we'll get nobody that is anybody at this rate," and Genevieve heaved a long melancholy sigh, as she laid her head down upon the piano, at which she was sitting in abandonment of feeling.

"Never mind, girls," said Mrs. Hardamer, soothingly. "It'll come right by and by. We can't always have things our own way."

"It's a shame, ma, it is so!" broke in Genevieve, lifting up her head, and exhibiting a face now covered with tears, "and I don't care what becomes of me, I don't! It can't be expected that I should do well without any chance, and I don't care who I marry, there! Just listen now!—Rap, rap, rap!—bang, bang, bang!—hammer, hammer, hammer! Oh, it makes me sick! this eternal ringing of lapstone and hammer. I sometimes wish the shop would burn down, I do!"

"Genevieve!"

"Indeed, and I'm in earnest, ma! If you will drive your children to desperation, you'll have nobody to blame but yourselves. I'm determined that if Mr. Dimety don't offer himself before two weeks, I'll accept the first tailor or shoemaker that comes along. I'll marry, if I have to marry a drayman, so there now!"

"You mustn't give way so, Genevieve, my dear. Marrying comes natural enough; and when it's the right time, it will all go off as easy as can be. Have patience, my dear!"

"Patience!" responded the interesting Genevieve, jumping up from the music-stool and stamping with one foot upon the floor, while her face glowed like a coal of fire. "Haven't I had patience, I wonder? It's all well enough to talk of patience, patience—but it's another kind of a thing, I reckon, to see the commonest drabs of girls making the best matches, and we sitting at home with hardly a decent beau, and all because we live in such a way. I'll leave home, I will, if there ain't some change. I'm not going to be sacrificed in this way."

"And so will I," chimed in Gertrude.

"And I will too," responded Genevra.

"I wonder where my young ladies will go?" said the mother, in a quiet, sneering tone; for she was used to such exhibitions, and understood precisely how much they were worth.

"Go?" asked Miss Gertrude, with emphasis—"Go? why, go anywhere?"

"Well, suppose you go now," continued Mrs. Hardamer, who had grown a little irritated—"I don't think you will find things very different if you stay here."

"And I will go, too, so I will!" said Genevieve, passionately, sweeping off to her chamber.

"Suppose you pack off with her," continued the mother, to the other two paragona, and they likewise swept off in high displeasure.

At tea-time the three young rebels were sent for, and found asleep in their chamber. On putting their heads together, they concluded that an elopement, where there was no nice young man in question, would be rather a poor business, and fell to crying, and finally slept the matter pretty well off, in the usual afternoon nap, which was prolonged an hour or two beyond the ordinary period.

When the young ladies appeared at the tea-table their eyes, from which a long sleep had not stollen the redness, attracted their father's attention.

"Why, what's the matter with you; you've not all been crying I hope?" he said, looking from one to the other, of the three demure faces.

But neither of them felt like replying to their father's question.

"What's the trouble, Genevieve?" he continued, addressing the elder of the three.

"Nothing," she replied, in a low, moody voice.

"Nothing? Then I should think it was a poor business to cry for nothing. Come! speak up, and let me hear what's the matter. Can you find your tongue, Genevieve?"

But Genevieve's tongue had not the slightest inclination to fill its usual office.

"I don't understand this," said Hardamer, warming a little, and looking from face to face of the three girls—"Can you explain, mother?"

"Oh, there's nothing particular the matter," said Mrs. Hardamer, "only these young ladies are getting discouraged about their beaux. They think the sound of the lapstone has frightened them all off."

"The devil they do!" said Hardamer, a good deal excited on the instant. "That is, they are ashamed of their father's business, and of course of their father. I wish in my heart they were all married to good, honest, industrious shoemakers."

"I'd die first!" broke in Genevieve, passionately.

"Then you'll not be likely to starve afterward, as you will if you marry one of these milk-faced, counter-jumping dandies, about whom your foolish heads have all been turned. Please to remember, my ladies, that you are a shoemaker's daughters, and that's the most you can make out of yourselves.

If your mother had put you in the kitchen, as I wanted her to do, instead of sticking you up in the parlor, you'd have been more credit to us and to yourselves, than you now are. Remember! I'll have no more of this kind of stuff."

There was a degree of sternness about the father's manner, that showed him to be in earnest, but his daughters had been taught manners in a higher school than that in which he had been educated; and they not only felt equal to their parents, but superior to them.

"I wouldn't be seen in the street with a shoemaker!" responded Genevieve, partly, to her father's positive expression of disapproval.

"Do you know who you are talking to?" said Hardamer, in a loud, stern voice.

"Yes, sir!" replied Genevieve, in a quiet steady tone, looking her father in the face, and drawing in her lips with an air of self-possession and defiance.

"Leave the table this instant!" he said, rising and motioning her away.

"No! no! no! father!" said Mrs. Hardamer, also springing to her feet, and putting her hand upon her husband's arm—"don't do that! don't! don't!"

"Why, do you suppose, madam, that I am going to let a child of mine talk to me in that way?"

"Sit down, sit down! she won't say so again. Ain't you ashamed of yourself, to speak so to your father!" she continued, addressing Genevieve, who still sat in her chair, apparently unmoved by the storm she had raised.

Hardamer resumed his seat, checked by his wife's interference, but by no means soothed in his feelings.

"It's a pretty pass, indeed," he went on—"when a child becomes ashamed of her father. Here I've been toiling this thirty years at an honest trade, and now my children must be ashamed of the very means by which they were raised to a comfortable condition in life. I wish I'd had my way with 'em, there'd been other kinds of notions in their heads I'm thinking."

"Well, it's no use for you to talk, pa. Your business ain't very reputable, and you know it?" said Gertrude, unmoved by the excited state in which she saw her father.

"Ain't reputable, you hussy! what do you mean, ha?"

"Why don't you sell out, pa, and quit business, or open some kind of a store?" said Genevra, following up her sisters' bold attack pretty closely.

The father was for a moment utterly confounded. His business had always been his pleasure, and it was yielding him a good income. He had never much liked the accomplishments displayed by his daughters, nor been especially pleased with the foppish, frivolous young fellows who dangled about them. Now they had left their own peculiar domain and had invaded his; and he was chafed to a degree that made it impossible for him to command himself. Springing up from the table, he resisted all attempts made by his wife to check him, and, in a loud, angry voice, ordered the three girls to leave the room instantly. For a moment they looked him in the face hesitatingly, but they saw something there that they did not wish to trifle with, and slowly obeyed the order.

"Not reputable!—quit business!—ha!—indeed!—not reputable," ejaculated Hardamer, pacing the room rapidly backward and forward. "This comes of making ladies out of shoemakers' daughters. Not reputable! I'll have 'em all binding shoes before a week I'll show 'em what's reputable!"

"H-u-h, husband, do!" said Mrs. Hardamer, in a soothing voice.

"Indeed, and I'll not hush! And it's all your fault, I can tell you, my lady! You would make fools of them, and now they're ashamed of us. Quit business! Keep a store! Not reputable! Indeed! Quite a new discovery!" and old Hardamer hurried off into his shop in a state of perturbation such as he had not experienced for years.

"How could you talk so to your father?" said Mrs. Hardamer, joining the three eldest girls in the parlor, and leaving the younger misses to take care of themselves.

"How could he talk to us about marrying shoemakers?" replied Genevieve, tartly, giving to her face at the same time an expression of strong disgust.

"If he's got no higher ideas, I can assure him his daughters have," said Gertrude. "Marry a shoemaker, indeed!"

Now this was almost too much for Mrs. Hardamer herself—for hadn't she married a shoemaker? And wasn't the father of these high-minded damsels a shoemaker? Still, she cared as little to have shoemakers for sons-in-law as did her daughters to have them for husbands. This latter consideration modified her feelings in a degree, and she replied: "Nonsense, girls! your father was only jesting. But you should remember that, in speaking as you do, you reflect upon him!"

"That's not our fault, you know, ma," said the incorrigible Genevieve. "If he will continue to follow a business that necessity compelled him to adopt many years ago, now that there is no occasion for it, he must not wonder if his children are mortified. And then to talk of putting us back to the point where you and he started from, was too much for human nature to bear."

"Genevieve, you mustn't talk so."

"It's the truth, ma, and I must speak it out!"

"It is not always necessary to speak even the truth."

"In this case it is. To talk of marrying me to a shoemaker! Give me patience to bear the thought!"

"Genevieve!"

"Ma!"

"I won't put up with this any longer. So just let me hear no more of it."

"But, ma—"

"I tell you to hush!"

"Yes, but—"

"Don't you hear me?"

"Ma, is this the way to con—"

"Genevieve, I command you to be silent!"

"I can't be silent, ma—and I won't be silent!" now screamed Genevieve, in the hysterical feminine octave. "Talk of marrying me to a shoemaker! Oh, I shall go crazy!"

"A good, honest, industrious shoemaker would be a fool to have you, let me tell you, you proud, lazy, good-for-nothing hussey!" said Mrs. Hardamer, in a voice pitched to the same key with her daughter's. "Your father is right! I've made fools of you all; but I'll bring you down, see if I don't!"

"It would be hard to get any lower, I'm thinking," remarked Genevieve, with provoking calmness. "I feel disgraced all the while, for isn't the hammer ringing in my ears eternally?"

"Yes, and the whole house is scented with leather and varnish," said Gertrude. "Who wonders that young gentlemen soon slack off? What's the use of attracting attention abroad, if receiving company at home spoils it all?"

"Will you hush, I say!"

"No, ma, I can't hush! Haven't we borne this, and met with disappointment after disappointment, until we are driven to desperation? There's that elegant young Williams, who was just on the point of declaring himself, when, as luck would have it, he must call upon me here; and then the cake was all dough, for he never came again. And last week I saw him at Mr. L——'s party, all attention to Grace Jameson, a pert minx; and he only gave me a cold nod. Don't I know the reason of all this? Give me patience!" and the disappointed lady of sixteen stamped upon the floor with her little foot in a towering passion.

"I can't stand this," said Mrs. Hardamer, completely subdued by the tempest she had called about her ears, and beat a hasty retreat, leaving the wounded dignity of the young ladies to heal as best it might.

Upon returning to the breakfast-room, she found that the younger children had finished their meal; and she set about preparing supper for the apprentices. Upon the table were two plates, each containing what had been once the half of a half-pound print of butter, but now somewhat diminished in size. One of these plates she took off, and cut the butter in the other plate into two pieces, and removed one of them. A plate of chipped beef was also taken off, and a bread-basket containing a few slices of wheat bread. Nothing except the plates and the tea things were left. From the closet she now brought out the half of a large cold Indian pone, and placed it on the table.

"Call the boys!" she said, in a sharp, quick voice, to a black girl, who soon passed the word into the back shop, and four boys, with three of whom the reader is already acquainted, made their appearance. The other was a small lad, not over eleven years of age—a puny child, with fair complexion, and large bright blue eyes. He was an orphan boy, and the drudge of the whole house and shop. One whose young heart had known enough of affectionate regard to create in it a yearning desire for kind looks and kind words; but few of these warmed it into even an instantaneous delight.

Placing herself at the head of the table, Mrs. Hardamer turned out the lukewarm, wishy-washy stuff she called tea, and then sat in moody silence, while the boys stowed away, with a kind of nervous rapidity, the cold, heavy slices of pone, just touched with the butter, which they had to use sparingly to make it last, and washed the mouthfuls down with the not very palatable fluid.

It so happened that the warm weather had awakened into remarkable activity certain troublesome little animals in the boys' beds; and Ike had been deputed by the others to inform Mrs. Hardamer of the fact, in the hope that some speedy remedy, made and provided for like necessities, would relieve them from their annoying visitors. This information Ike had determined to convey at supper-time, but the lowering aspect of Mrs. Hardamer's countenance, for a time, made him feel disinclined to perform his allotted duty. Gradually, however, he brought his resolution up to the right point, and suddenly startled that lady from her unpleasant reverie with the announcement: "The clinchers are as thick as hops in our beds, ma'am."

"Catch 'em and kill 'em, then," was the brief and crabbed answer.

Ike was silent, but his blood rose to fever-heat.

"Short and sweet, wasn't it, Ike?" said Tom, as the boys met in the shop after supper.

"Catch 'em and kill 'em, ha! I'll catch 'em, but somebody else may kill 'em, if they choose," said Ike, giving his head a knowing toss.

That night, at bed-time, Ike appeared with a little paper box, in the top of which was cut a small hole.

"What are you going to do with that, Ike?" said Bill.

"Going to catch clinchers. Didn't the old woman say we must catch 'em?"

"Quite obedient, Ike. You're improving!"

"People ought to grow better as they grow older," responded Ike, turning up the hard straw bed with one hand, and routing the young colonies of clinchers that had settled around the pegs of the bedstead. With a very small pair of pincers he caught the nimble animals, and thrust them into his box. For nearly an hour he worked away with all diligence, assisted by the rest, until he had caught and caged some two hundred.

"What are you going to do with these, Ike?"

"That's tellings, just now. Let me alone for a day or two, and then I'll show you a neat trick."

"But, what is it, Ike?" urged Bill.

"Never mind, now, Bill. You shall know time enough."

Sealing up the small aperture in the top with a piece of shoemaker's wax, softened in the candle, Ike deposited the box in his trunk for safe keeping.

Three days after he came into the shop with his prisoners.

"There'll be some fun to-night, boys, or I'm mistaken," he said. "Let us examine our captives."

Slowly removing the lid, the little animals were found lying upon the bottom of the box, to all appearance dead. Their deep-red color had changed to a light-brown shade, and they looked more like thin, dry flakes of bran, than anything else.

"They're all dead, Ike."

"Don't believe the half of it. Just look here, and I'll show you if they're dead."

Picking up one of the seemingly inanimate thin flakes, he placed it on the back of his hand, where it could hardly be distinguished, by its color, from the skin. For a moment it lay there motionless, and then its fine legs began to quiver, and its head to move and bend down upon the skin of the hand. In a little while its head was perfectly distinguished by a small brown spot, and from this spot a thin dark line began to run down its back. Gradually this line widened, and the whole back assumed a darker hue.

"Does he bite, Ike?"

"Don't he! See how he is sucking up the blood! He's about the keenest chap to bite I ever felt."

Ike still allowed the little animal to draw away, until he was swelled up with the dark fluid, and almost ready to burst; then brushing him off, he remarked, in a low, chuckling voice, "Somebody'll know more about clinchers to-night than they've ever known before."

"But what are you going to do with these bed-bugs, Ike? You haven't told us yet."

"Oh, haven't I? Well, I'm going to let 'em have a taste of the old woman, after their long fast."

"You're joking."

"Humph! The old lady won't think so to-night."

"But the old man'll come in for a share."

"Who cares! If he will go into bad company, he must take the consequences. But he's as bad as she is, any day."

After dinner Ike watched his opportunity, and slipped into the royal bed-chamber, while all were down-stairs. Carefully turning up the bed-clothes from the foot, he scattered the two hundred half-starved bugs between the sheets, so low down, that in turning the clothes over from the top to get into the bed, they would not be perceived.

"Did you do it, Ike?" said Bill and Tom, eagerly.

"In course I did."

"They'll never find out who did it."

"No. They'll not even suspect anybody."

The garret in which the boys slept was directly over the chamber of Mr. and Mrs. Hardamer, and when they went to bed they left their door open, to hear as much as possible of what should happen below.

About ten o'clock the old folks retired, and were just about losing themselves in sleep, when they were each awakened by a burning sensation about their feet and ankles. They bore it for awhile in silence, and tried to go to sleep again; neither being aware that the other felt the same annoyance. But the burning increased to a smarting and stinging, and soon covered nearly their whole bodies.

"I feel just like I was in the fire," said Mrs. Hardamer, who was first to complain.

"So do I," said her husband. "There must be bugs in the bed!"

"Indeed, and there can't be, then, for I looked the bed all over to-day."

"There must be, by jingo!" exclaimed Hardamer, in reply, reaching suddenly down and scratching his leg with all his might.

"Something's the matter!" said the old lady, rubbing with a like earnestness, and then creeping out of bed.

A light revealed about twenty lively fellows, who had, in the short time allowed them, filled themselves pretty well, and now stood out in full relief from the snow-white sheets. These were caught and dealt with according to law. The bed was examined, and in the belief that there was not another live animal on the premises, the worthy couple again betook themselves to rest.

But they were soon forced to turn out again, smarting, burning and itching all over. Thirty or forty more of the ravenous little creatures were discovered and killed, and the bed and bedstead again thoroughly hunted over.

Again did they seek to find rest; and again were they forced to leave their snug retreat. This time they abdicated their chamber and sought for repose in another room and in another bed. Here they were more fortunate, and after a few efforts to drive from their imagination the idea that bugs were all the while creeping over them, finally succeeded in falling into a sound slumber, from which they did not awake until daylight.

At breakfast time, while the boys were disposing of their cold pone, and weak, warm rye coffee, Mrs. Hardamer asked if they were troubled much with bugs during the night.

"Not at all, ma'am," said Ike, with a grave countenance.

"I never was so troubled with them in my life," said Mrs. Hardamer.

"I didn't feel any, did you, Bill?" said Ike.

"I wa'n't at all troubled," responded Bill, in a voice that trembled with suppressed mirth.

"Well, I had to go into another room. I never saw so many in a bed in all my life! They must have all come down in an army from the garret."

"There's a pretty large army of 'em up in the garret, that I know," said Ike; "but they kept pretty quiet last night."

"Well, I'd thank 'em to keep on their own side of the house," responded Mrs. Hardamer, with an expression of disgust; for the idea of having bugs from the boys' dirty beds creeping over her was by no means a very pleasant one.

That day the garret had a thorough overhauling. The bedsteads were taken down and scalded, and some thousands of bugs slain. Upon a close inspection of the sheets of her bed, the old lady discovered a number of what she thought the skins of bugs. These she gathered up carefully, and threw them into boiling water. She was a little surprised to see many of them stir, which created some vague suspicions in her mind; but there the matter ended. After this the beds in the garret were regularly examined every week during warm weather.

CHAPTER II.

A MOVEMENT NOT TO BE MISTAKEN.

"DID you ever see such a proud, lazy, stuck-up somebody as Genevieve is?" remarked Ike, one day, to the boys in the shop.

"I do believe she's ashamed of her own father, because he's a shoemaker," responded Tom.

"Humph! I know she is!" said Bill.

"And there's Gertrude, too. She never thinks of knowing me in the street on Sundays. But I guess I always speak to her as polite as a dancing-master," said Ike. "I like to cut the comb of such people."

"Ain't you afraid to do so?" asked Tom.

"Afraid, indeed! And what should I be afraid of? She can't help herself. Suppose she tells the old man? She'll only get a flea in her ear for her pains. He's not going to do anything."

"Jim said he heard Millie say, that all three of the fine young ladies had a high-top-tea-party with the old man and woman about the noise of the lapstone when they had company. Old Hardamer was as stiff as you please, and said he'd set 'em all to binding shoes before a week, if they didn't take care."

"I wonder if that's a fact! Are you sure Millie told you so, Jim?"

"All I know about it, Ike, is, that Millie said so, and I 'spose she knows," said the little fellow, in half apparent reluctance to make any communication on the subject.

"Ah, very well!" responded Ike. "They shall have lapstone enough after this. But, won't I lay it on with a vengeance, when the young doctors, and lawyers, and counter-hoppers are about?"

"They're what they call accomplished, ain't they?" said Bill Grimes. "What do they mean by that, I wonder?"

"You're green, Bill, if you don't know what accomplished means."

"I reckon I do know, Ike, what it means. But I can't for my life understand what it means when applied to old Lignumvitae's three oldest daughters! If it means to play on the piano, why the wife of black Jake, the barber, is accomplished, for Jake says she can play the forty-piano to kill. And she can beat either of our young ladies, if I'm any judge of music, for I heard her once, and you know we hear them until we're sick and tired. If it means to dress up in all kinds of flim-flammeries, Jake's wife is just as accomplished, for she sports as much finery as they do. Or, maybe it is to sit all day in the parlor, and do nothing; if so, Mrs. Morton's Spanish poodle is just as much entitled to be called accomplished as they are. I must find some new meaning to the word before I can understand its application."

"Nonsense, Bill! you're soft in the upper story. To be accomplished, means to dance, and talk poetry, and all that sort of thing. A perfectly accomplished lady can talk nonsense, and to save your life you can't tell it from good sense, it will come out so gracefully. She will tell you that you are a fool or a puppy in terms that leave you at a loss to know whether she means to compliment or insult you. A queer animal, I can tell you, is an accomplished lady."

"Of course, then," said Bill, "our up-stairs misses are not accomplished ladies."

"No, nor never will be, in full. They can ape a few of the graces, but can never be accomplished inside and out. A shoemaker's daughter, Bill, always seems to hear the sound of the lapetone, and it makes her both look and feel awkward. She will do well enough, if she is content to be herself; but the moment she tries to step above the path in which she walks easily and naturally, she will get on uneven ground, and wobble from side to side like a duck; everybody will laugh at her."

"That's a law of nature, Ike."

'Of course it is, Bill. Shoemakers' daughters are as good as anybody else's daughters, until they grow ashamed of being shoemakers' daughters, and then they ought to be despised, and are despised."

On that same night it so happened that the girls had company, and as it was in the summer time, all the doors in the house were open for the free circulation of air. The boys, of course, did not work at night, and the girls fondly imagined themselves freed from the dreadful annoyance of the hammer and lapetone. But they were not to be so highly favored.

"Where are you going to-night, Ike?" said one of the boys to this young ringleader of mischief.

"I'm going to stay home, I believe."

"Stay home! Why what's in the wind, Ike? It's a new kick for you to stay at home at night."

"Why, didn't you see that the girls were all furbelowed up at supper-time. They're going to set up for company—doctors, lawyers, merchants, etc."

"Well, what of that?"

"Nothing, only I want a pair of shoes, and must beat up the soles to-night."

"You're not in earnest, Ike?"

"Indeed, and I am though. I want these young gentlemen to hear the sound of the lapetone."

"The old man'll walk into you, if you try that trick."

"The Iron Chest Society meets to-night, you know, and he never stays away."

"True enough; but the old woman'll be into you."

"Well, suppose she is; the mischief will all be done before she can waddle into the back shop."

"But I wouldn't if I was you, Ike."

"Wouldn't you, indeed! But I would, though."

"As long as the girls hate the sound of the hammer so badly, I'd let 'em alone."

"Why, what's come over you, Tom? You're grown mighty feeling all at once! But you needn't preach to me, I can tell you! I know what I'm about. Won't I make the old stone ring a merry tune, though?"

As Ike had indicated, about eight o'clock a young Mr. Willis, who had just opened a dry goods store came in to see Miss Genevra; and shortly after, a student of medicine, a wild rake of a fellow, who had an idea that old Hardamer had a few of the "gooseberries," as he called them, dropped in to renew an acquaintance recently made at a party with Miss Genevra. His name was Anderson. A Mr. Wilkins also called; but as he was a young shoemaker, just in business, who did not think himself above shoemakers' daughters, he met with a very cold reception.

"It's quite a pleasant evening, Miss Gertrude," remarked Mr. Wilkins, the last comer, as he seated himself beside that young lady.

"Yes, sir," she responded, in a chilling tone, and with a face as free from smiles as a wintry sky.

"Not much danger of a gust, I reckon," he continued, glancing out of the window.

"No, sir."

"It's been rather an oppressive day."

"Yes, sir."

"Have you been to the museum, lately?" continued Wilkins, varying his attack. "They have an Egyptian mummy there—the first ever exhibited in this city."

"No, sir," replied the monosyllabic lady, as coldly and indifferently as possible.

Still, Wilkins was not to be driven off into silence, although he felt awkward and embarrassed.

"That's a beautiful painting there of the death of Virginia."

"Yes, sir."

"Were you ever electrified?"

"No, sir."

"You've no idea what a strange feeling it produces. You feel just as if your shoulders were jerked apart. How singular it is, that in a circle of even twenty, every one feels the shock at the same instant. They electrified a big negro there the other night. It was fun, I assure you. Mr. Peale charged the machine pretty strongly, and asked the fellow to put his hand on a knob. He, of course, did as requested, in all obedience. 'Now take hold of that chain a minute,' said Mr. Peale, and the negro obeyed. I thought the whole company would have died laughing to see the fellow jump and roll up his eyes. He couldn't understand it at all. 'Shut your big mouf, Mr. Pictor,' he said, shaking his fist at the two laughing portraits in the room where the machine stands. 'You've no 'casion to laugh.'"

Even this failed to interest the young lady, and and she did not accord a single word in response.

During this vain effort on the part of Mr. Wilkins to get up a conversation, the tongues of the other girls were running at a rapid rate; and as they grew more and more animated, their voices were raised to a higher pitch.

"He's a splendid writer, though, ain't he, Mr. Anderson, that Mr. Byron?" said Genevieve. "Oh, I've a passion for him!"

"Lord Byron is certainly a poet of splendid powers," responded the young student.

"He's a lord, then, is he?"

"Oh, yes, miss."

"Well, I declare! I didn't know it before. I shall admire him more than ever."

"You've read his 'Bride of Abydos,' I suppose?" said Anderson.

"I haven't got that far, yet," replied Genevieve, blushing a little.

"Then there's a treat yet in store for you. His 'Bride of Abydos' is one of his most beautiful productions."

"I'll read it to-morrow, then; I won't wait till I get to it. He's the author of 'Grey's Elegy in a Country Churchyard,' ain't he?"

"Yes," said the polite student; "and it is one of his finest pieces."

"I've always admired that. Ain't it elegant where he says,

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark, unfathomed caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness on the desert air?"

"Indeed, it is," responded Anderson, a little cooled off, but the thoughts of the old man's "gooseberries" warmed him up again.

"You're fond of reading poetry, Miss Genevieve?"

"Oh, I dote on it! It's a passion with me! I could read poetry from morning till night."

Rap, rap, rap, bang, bang, suddenly came ringing up from the back shop with startling distinctness.

"Goody gracious, me!" said Genevieve, suddenly thrown off her guard, and rising to her feet.

Anderson, with easy politeness, endeavored to carry on the conversation, as freely as if there was no deafening sound of lapstone and hammer ringing through the room. But not only Genevieve, but all the girls were terribly annoyed.

"That's quite a familiar sound," remarked Wilkins, in a quiet tone.

Gertrude looked at him as if she could have annihilated him.

"Your father is pretty busy now, I believe?"

"Sir?" said the young lady, with an offended air.

"Can't you give us something on the piano, Miss Geneva?" said Mr. Willis, who felt for the girls, and suggested the idea of music, as an antidote to the annoying sound below.

"Yes, I will play, if you wish me to," responded Geneva, moving quickly toward the instrument.

"What will you have?"

"'Washington's March,'" said Willis.

Instantly Geneva struck the keys with full force, introducing the drum whenever she could manage to give it a deafening bang, and thus succeeded in drowning the noise of Ike's hammer. But marches, like everything else, must have an end, and in the pause that succeeded, the ears of the poor girls were agonized by the terrible sound below.

Another tune was quickly called for, and during its performance Genevieve left the room, and descended with rapid steps to the back shop.

"What do you mean, sir, you insolent puppy, you?" she half screamed to Ike, who, seated on his bench, with a shade over his eyes, was still hammering with all his might.

Ike looked up with a simple, bewildered air, but made no answer.

"What are you filling the house with this eternal din for, I want to know?"

"Nothing, Miss Genevieve, only I'm making myself a pair of shoes. You see, I've got none fit to wear," poking up at the same time his foot, on which was an old shoe the toe of which gaped like the mouth of a catfish.

"Then why don't you make your shoes in the daytime, and not disturb everybody in the house at night?"

"'Cause I ain't got no time in the day."

"I'll tell pa on you, so I will," said the incensed young lady.

"Why, I ain't done nothing, Miss Genevieve," replied Ike, as demurely as possible. "But, if it disturbs you, I'll do it in the morning." And, so saying, he replaced his hammer upon his bench, pushed the stone under it, and threw off his pasteboard shade.

"Don't let me hear any more of this, remember that, sir!" and the offended beauty swept off so quickly as to lose the sound of Ike's humble "No, miss."

"It worked to a charm!" he exclaimed, as soon as Genevieve had retired, and hurrying on his jacket, he blew out the candle, and in a moment or two was in the street.

On the next morning, after breakfast, old Hardamer went into the back shop, and standing before Ike, addressed him in a loud, angry tone, with, "What were you doing here last night, I want to know?"

"Only hammering out a shoe-sole."

"Well, what business had you hammering out a shoe-sole at night, this time of year?"

"I wanted a pair of shoes, sir."

"That's a lie, sir! for, it's not two weeks since you made yourself a pair."

This was a poser, for it was a fact.

"You only did it to disturb the family, you imp of Satan! But I'll learn you a trick worth two of that! I'll let you see that you can't play off your pranks on everybody."

And, before Ike had time to do anything, Hardamer was laying it over his back and shoulders with a heavy stirrup. The old fellow was a cruel hand to flog when once excited, as the scarred and seamed backs of the boys bore ample testimony; and he was terribly passionate whenever he met with opposition.

Recovering himself from the surprise and confusion of so sudden an attack, and recalling his resolution to resist, Ike suddenly sprang from his bench, and driving his head full into the rotund abdomen of his master, sent him tumbling over backward into the corner among the lasts and rolls of leather.

Uttering a fierce oath, Hardamer sprang quickly to his feet, and made toward Ike, who stood calmly by his seat, waiting for the result of his bold innovation upon ancient usages. Blind and mad with passion, the short, thick, old fellow, plunged like an enraged bull toward Ike, who coolly stepped aside, and by just advancing his foot a little, allowed him to tumble heels-over-head into the other corner of the shop. There he lay for some moments, so bewildered as to scarcely know whether he was on his head or his feet. But he soon began to understand the position of matters a little more clearly, and seeing Ike still standing boldly up in front of him, he rose up, with a last in each hand, and, in the twinkling of an eye, launched them, one after the other, at Ike's head. But that chap had as quick an eye as his master, and readily dodged them.

"Two can play at that game, remember!" said Ike, picking up a last and brandishing it in his hand.

For a moment Hardamer was utterly confounded. Implicit submission to his will, and the privilege of thrashing any one of the boys whenever he pleased, had been prerogatives which no one had questioned for twenty or thirty years.

"Do you dare to threaten me? you scoundrel!" he at length said, moving toward Ike, his face dark with anger.

"Stand off, sir!" said Ike, retreating.

But Hardamer pressed forward, and, finding that warning would not keep off his master, Ike let fly a last at his head. It just grazed his ear. In an instant the old fellow grappled with him, and they rolled over together on the floor. Bill and Tom looked on with anxious interest, both resolved to aid Ike, according to the compact, if there was any chance of his master's getting the best of the battle. All at once they saw Ike grow black in the face, and were shocked to perceive that both of Hardamer's hands were tightly clasped around his throat.

"The old scamp will kill him!" exclaimed Bill, springing forward and throwing himself upon his master.

"Choke him off, Bill!" cried Tom, joining him on the instant.

Not taking the hint as quickly as Tom thought the nature of the case required, he clasped his own hands with a vigorous grip around Hardamer's throat, and held on, until the master's hold relaxed from the neck of the now almost insensible boy.

Ike quickly revived, and the three boys retired from their not very pleasant proximity to the body of their master, and ranged themselves side by side in an attitude of defiance.

"I'll murder the whole of you!" shouted Hardamer, rising to his feet, mad with passion. "What do you mean? you scoundrels! Go to your work this instant! and you, Ike, walk off up-stairs. I've not done with you yet."

"There's no particular use in my going up-stairs," said Ike. "Because, you see, I'm not going to allow you to touch me again, I'm a'most too old for that now"

"Hold your tongue, you scoundrel!"

"Well, I was only saying that—"

"Hold your tongue, I say! Off up-stairs with you!"

"Can't go, sir," said Ike.

"We might as well all understand each other at once," now broke in Tom. "We've all resolved that we won't stand your eternal beatings any longer. We've had enough; and, as Ike says, are too old for that kind of fun, now. If you'll treat us well we'll work; but if you don't, we'll raise the very devil; so there now!"

Here was a state of things, the possibility of the existence of which had never entered the mind of Hardamer, and he felt utterly at a loss how to act. If he had followed the impulse by which he was prompted, he would have dashed in among them and knocked right and left with blind fury, but he could not forget that these three nimble chaps before him, in whose determined faces there was no evidence of fear, had but a moment before proved too much for him.

"I can have you all cowhided by a constable," he said, in a calmer voice.

"We have calculated all that," replied Tom, more respectfully, "and are prepared to act in that case, too."

"I should like to know how you'd act in the officer's clutches. I guess you'd not like his cowhide much."

"I can tell you how we'll act," said Tom, in a determined voice. "We'll never wax another cord for you as long as we live. Mind, sir, we're not to be fooled with!" he continued, anxious to impress his master with a sense of their indomitable resolution; and thus avoid future contentions, which none of the boys had any desire to enter into.

Hardamer turned upon his heel and went into the front shop, while the three rebels retired, each to his respective seat, and resumed their work. He was as much at a loss to know how to act, as they were to know how he would act. At one moment, he resolved to avail himself of the law which provided for the punishment of refractory apprentices; but the determined manner of the boys caused him to hesitate. Although he was in pretty easy circumstances, he by no means considered himself rich, and had no idea of dispensing with the services of three well-grown and pretty industrious boys. This turmoil in his mind, accompanied with its troublesome indecision, continued for many days, during which time the boys worked steadily and quietly. Gradually the keen mortification, and chafed feelings of Hardamer, wore away in some degree, and the boys began to feel safe.

RELIGIOUS READING.

HIS WORD SHALL NOT FAIL.

AM I dark in mind about myself—about other men—about the world? Do I feel sometimes as if God had not spoken expressly to man? As if the problem of life were yet unsolved, and in fact insoluble? As if human creatures were little more than ghosts and shadows—man truly walking in a vain show, every man at his best state altogether vanity? Then it will be wise and well to let the word of Christ come to me, and dwell in me richly as a word of revelation—as the opening out and public declaration and verification of things which had been hidden from the beginning of the world. I must, that is, try to vanquish and cure such a state of intellectual despondency, by remembering how much Jesus Christ has revealed—how far, how very far, He has transcended and surpassed all other teachers by what He has said, and by what He has done; how, especially, He has “brought life and immortality to light by the gospel,” thus translating dim conjecture into firm and clear certainty. I must remember, and realize as a fact about which there can be no dispute, that it is His hand alone that has drawn the veil from the invisible world and the future life, so that now, if not all the glory of that high state, there yet shines out upon us the fair vision of the Father’s house with many mansions, which can be seen by the lowly, and the suffering, and the weary, and the dying, all the world over, if only their eyes are thitherward.

Am I—not doubting the revelation or its preciousness—doubting and desponding much about myself, my wretched self? finding few signs of grace? observing little progress through the years? feeling little but hardness within? fearing that I have no part nor lot in the matter? Then let me remember the word of Christ as a word of redemption, of complete, assured salvation. The Gospel is not an argument, a process, an education, a curriculum, a growth merely, although all these things are in it. It is a redemption, and those who receive it are redeemed. It is saving the eyes from tears, the feet from falling, and the soul from death. It is the annulling of penalty, the blotting out of sin forever, the slaying of enmity and the kidnapping of love, the death of the old man, the creation of the new. If this be so, then what have I to fear? If I find no virtue nor any good in myself, I find the more in Him, and by His complete redemption I am warranted in believing that all His own goodness will become a growth in me, through righteousness unto eternal life. If, when I look more narrowly, my very virtues, or what seemed so, darken into sins, do I not see, may I not at least see, and most clearly when things are at the worst, the light of a Saviour’s face beaming compassion on me in my helplessness and misery, as He says: “Believe, and thou, too, shall be saved. Come unto Me, thou weary one, and heavy laden, and I will give thee rest.”

Am I, although calmed with forgiveness, very weak, and as to my own feeling, although unfit for continuing the struggle of the nobler life? Then let me take some strong promise adapted to the need, and drink it up as a fainting man would drink a cordial, until I am refreshed; let me seize it as a sinking man would grasp a strong staff if it were offered to him, and lean upon it and be borne through.

Am I sorrowing? And can I forget that word of Christ which has sounded so sweetly in so many mourners’ ears, in so many desolated homes, over so many graves—“Let not your heart be troubled?”

Am I myself now in the very process of passing away from earth and time? “Warned by God,” by some sensible sign, by some inward utterances more and more audible of the sentence of death, am I now beginning to turn my face away from the interests and the homes of earth, and, in spirit, sometimes to part company with the nearest and dearest companions of the way? Ah, then, do not I the more need to take Him at His word who has said: “I will not leave; I will not forsake. I will come again and receive you unto Myself, that where I am there ye may be also?”

Thus, the thing is to find and bring in the word of Christ which is suited for the time, for the day, for the need, for the mental state, for the moral struggle, for the peculiar providence, and make that master and occupant of the house.

And yet there will be times when there is no sharp consciousness at all, no sense of distinct and peculiar needs, and still the word of Christ may dwell richly within. It is everything to have a real faith in Christ and in His blessed Gospel, and a real sense of the love of God therein, to be answered by our love and obedience forever. Life with some has few turns and changes, inward or outward, but with Christ and His word in the heart, it will be, in the main, what life ought to be, a passing from darkness into light, a growing through grace into glory.

MOTHERS' DEPARTMENT.

MRS. DALTON'S STRATEGY.

BY SARAH HART.

MR. DALTON sat before the glowing fire—for the bright spring days were a trifle too cool to do without it—but her usually cheerful face wore a troubled expression, as if her mind was seriously perplexed. And indeed she was troubled, for that morning had brought to her the intelligence that Florence, her eldest daughter, a bright, beautiful girl of sixteen, was fond of the company of those whom her mother would not have chosen as companions for her daughter. The intelligence had come in a way, too, that was deeply mortifying. Mrs. Dalton was in a store where were several other ladies, when a group of girls passed.

“There goes Lida Herring and her crowd,” remarked one of the ladies.

“What a brazen-faced girl she has become,” remarked the other. “I think if I had a daughter I should be careful she did not associate with girls who are so ill-behaved.”

“But mothers do not always know,” replied the other. “I dare say some of those girls’ mothers do not know anything about their behavior on the street, nor the company they are in. I often see Florence Dalton with them, and they say that her mother is, or tries to be, very particular with her."

The conversation was continued, but Mrs. Dalton heard no more. She quietly walked out of the store, and turned homeward.

Mrs. Dalton was a wise woman. She knew her daughter's disposition too well to rush to her with the intelligence she had gained, for she was a headstrong girl—slow to take advice, and quick to take offence. She knew that if she asserted her authority, and forbade all intercourse with these girls, that her daughter might look upon it as only antagonistic to her own wishes, and there might come of it either open rebellion or else strict vigilance and clandestine meetings.

"No. Florence must be made to see for herself why I wish her to break away from such associates," she said to herself. "I know that underneath all her frivolity and self-will there is good common-sense. I must find some way to appeal to that."

For more than an hour she sat there in deep thought. Then suddenly her face brightened, as if a happy idea had come to her; but she said nothing relative to the matter when, in a few moments, her daughter entered the room.

Mrs. Dalton was a widow in easy circumstances. The care of her two children had been a pleasant task, and she rather prided herself upon her and their good name. The bare possibility that anything should sully that had given a sting to her sensitive spirit. How bitter then must have been the reality.

"Have you any engagement for this morning, Florence?" said Mrs. Dalton, a few days after this had occurred.

"Nothing, in particular, mother. I was going out, but it makes no difference. Why, do you want me?"

"I was going to select flowers and ribbon for Katie's hat, and wanted you to go with me, and give me the benefit of your taste," she said, smiling.

"Very well. I'll be ready soon."

It was a bright, sunny day—just such an one as comes after the spring rains have housed us up for days together—and crowds of people, gayly dressed, were on the streets—some for business, some for pleasure, some for the sake of being there—to see and be seen. Florence met and bowed to several girls and young men who were strangers to her mother; but that lady asked not a question concerning them. She was patiently waiting for her time to come.

"Let us go in here," said Mrs. Dalton, stopping before a fashionable refreshment saloon.

They entered, and ascended the broad stairway to the ladies' parlor, and Mrs. Dalton took a table near a window, which commanded a full view of the street and promenaders below.

"What a delightful place this is!" exclaimed Florence. "I think I never was here before."

"It is very pleasant, indeed," said her mother. "But, here comes the waiter with our refreshments; I think you will find that part of it as delightful as any, and more substantial, after our shopping expedition. We have a full view of all the passers-by," continued Mrs. Dalton, after a pause. "I always like to watch faces and forms. Look, Florence, do you see that group of idlers lounging around that corner?" Florence looked, and her face flushed, for she recognized several faces there. "Do you know why they lounge there?" The bright face grew more flushed; but, meeting the calm, loving gaze fixed upon her, she could not dissemble, so she answered nothing. "Let us watch and see," said Mrs. Dalton.

Soon there came sauntering along a bevy of girls, all about the age of Florence, and most of them were her acquaintances. As they passed the corner they appeared not to notice the idlers there; but the most casual observer might have seen that nearly all gave some sign of recognition. One held her fan in a coquettish manner—another gave her handkerchief a toss—another sent a gay ribbon over her shoulder, and similar tokens were passed by the others; to all of which the young men (?) answered in some manner, and the girls passed on. The young idlers looked after them with jeering looks and vulgar grimaces, that made Florence's cheek crimson with indignation.

"Oh, mother! are young men so lacking in principle as that?" she exclaimed.

"Rather say, my daughter, are young girls so lacking in all that makes young womanhood respected. Those girls challenged those actions by their own behavior."

"I think, if those young girls could see what we have seen, they would not behave in like manner again," said Florence, warmly.

"You saw their actions, Florence; but the thoughts of their hearts were even more base and impure. No young man can maintain his purity of heart very long by associating with such companions; nor can a young girl long retain her charm of maiden modesty by such a course. But, come, dear, if you are rested, we will go on."

That evening, as Mrs. Dalton sat at her window watching the full moon

"Coming slowly

Through the silence deep and holy,"

she felt a hand upon her shoulder.

"What is it, dear?" she inquired, when she saw it was Florence.

"Oh, mother! I must tell you. Do you know I have walked down the avenue with those same girls we saw to-day, and was to go again to-day; and I knew they practised all those arts to attract attention. Oh, mother, I shall die of shame!" and the slight form shook with anguish.

The mother drew her child toward her till the fair head was pillowed on her breast. But she said nothing. She thought it better that the storm should spend itself first.

After a time the flood of mortification subsided, and Florence told her mother how these things had seemed nothing to her but girlish freaks—told her, too, of things the others had told her they had done, until Mrs. Dalton trembled to think how terribly endangered her daughter had been.

"These seeming trifles, my dear," she said, when Florence had ended her story, "are the beginning of greater evils, and are the steps which lead young girls from purity and virtue. I have known girls to become outcasts from society, whose first faults were a fondness for admiration and a love of fine clothes. I trembled with fear when I knew you had become fond of the promenade."

Long and confidently conversed the mother with her daughter that night. Nor was it the last confidential talk between them, but only the beginning of a new bond.

Mrs. Dalton's strategy proved an entire success—for her daughter learned to choose her associates from those who held modesty and purity of character in high esteem.

EVENINGS WITH THE POETS.

SPRING WEATHER.

BY OLIO STANLEY.

IF all the sweet, wild winds that blow
 Across the world in spring—
 If all the little flowers that grow,
 And all the birds that sing—
 If one and all were met together,
 What would they say about the weather?
 So low the soft south wind would blow,
 Its voice we scarce should hear;
 And yet 'twould bid our hearts rejoice,
 'Twould banish clouds of fear;
 And soft south wind, and west wind going,
 Would whisper to the small flowers growing,
 Till they should lift their little heads
 And shine and smile together,
 And wisely say, "We never saw
 Such rare, such radiant weather;"
 And each bright birdling swooping down,
 Would sing away some lurking frown!

So all the merry winds that blow,
 And all the buds of spring,
 And all the birds, on all the boughs,
 Alight, with ruffled wing,
 Would blow, and bloom, and sing together,
 "We never knew such radiant weather!"

The silver bracelet of a shower
 May deck Dame Rose's wrist,
 Yet still she leans her wet cheek out,
 Shy, waiting to be kissed;
 In merry dance, the winds together
 Shout out aloud, "What joyous weather!"
 And Robin winks his bold, bright eye,
 Gay, blithesome, little rover,
 And each sweet flower, laughing, says,
 "I would be were my lover;"
 And Rose and Robin say together,
 "Oh, merry winds, what fair May weather!"

A POSSIBILITY.

THE THOUGHT OF A MOURNING MOTHER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

MY little baby is buried to-day;
 Gone—down in the depths of the churchyard
 clay,

Up in the sky so dim and gray;
 Who will take care of my little baby?

Who will kiss her?—her waxen feet,
 That have never walked, and her small hands sweet,
 Where I left a white lily, as was meet.

Who, who will kiss my little baby?

Who will teach her? her wings to fly,
 Her tiny limbs their new work to ply,
 Her soft, dumb lips to sing gloriously,
 Oh, who will teach my little baby?

I have a mother—who long ago died;
 We speak of her now with our tears all dried;
 She may know my pretty one, come to her side,
 And be glad to see my little baby.

Christ, born of woman, hear, oh, hear!
 Thine angels are far off—she seems near.
 Give Thou my child to my mother dear,
 And I'll weep no more for my little baby.
 Surely in Heaven, Thy saints so blest,
 Keep a mother's heart in a mother's breast;
 Give her my lamb, and I shall rest
 If my mother takes care of my little baby.

THE RIGHT.

LIGHT after darkness,
 Gain after loss,
 Strength after suffering,
 Crown after cross,
 Sweet after bitter,
 Song after sigh,
 Home after wandering,
 Praise after cry.

Sheaves after sowing,
 Sun after rain,
 Sight after mystery,
 Peace after pain.
 Joy after sorrow,
 Calm after blast,
 Rest after weariness,
 Sweet rest at last.

Near after distant,
 Gleam after gloom,
 Love after loneliness,
 Life after tomb.
 After long agony
 Rapture of bliss!
 Right was the pathway
 Leading to this!

WAIT AND SEE.

WHEN my boy with eager questions,
 Asking how, and where, and when,
 Taxes all my store of wisdom,
 Asking o'er and o'er again
 Questions oft to which the answers
 Give to others still the key,
 I have said, to teach him patience,
 "Wait, my little boy, and see."

And the words I taught my darling,
 Taught to me a lesson sweet;
 Once when all the world seemed darkened
 And the storm about me beat,
 In the "children's room" I heard him,
 With a child's sweet mimicry,
 To the baby brother's questions
 Saying wisely, "Wait and see."

Like an angel's tender chiming,
 Came the darling's words to me,
 Though my Father's ways are hidden,
 Bidding me to wait and see.
 What are we but restless children,
 Ever asking what shall be?
 And the Father, in His wisdom,
 Gently bids us, "Wait and see."

BOYS' AND GIRLS' TREASURY.

SHAVING JACK.

"THERE'S something going on," said Aunt Lois, and the click of her needles stopped. "They'd never be as still as this if something wasn't going on."

"They're reading, most likely," answered Mrs. Barclay, the mother of one of the children referred to by her sister.

But Aunt Lois shook her head. "There's something going on, you may depend. Katy's a perfect witch when she gets started, and I saw this morning that she was let loose. She'll be into everything if you don't look after her."

"There's no harm in the child," said Mrs. Barclay. "Only boiling over with spirits."

the image of a sharp razor. But her fear was groundless. Katy had not done lathering Jack when she glided into the chamber.

"What on earth are you doing?" she exclaimed, not able to conceal the mirth that twitched at the corners of her mouth.

"Only shaving Jack," replied Katy, with much gravity. And she went on rubbing the brush over Jack's face.

Mrs. Barclay turned the key in her husband's shaving case to make sure of the razors, and then went back laughing to Aunt Lois.

"She's a limb," said Aunt Lois, "if there ever was one. I don't know what will become of her."

"There's no harm in the child," answered Mrs. Bar-

"Exactly! Boiling over with spirits. You've said it. But when a kettle or a child boils over, there's apt to be mischief. So I'll just take a look after her."

Aunt Lois put by her knitting and went out quietly. In a few minutes she came back with a broad smile on her kindly face.

"Well, I'll give up!" she said. "That child beats me out!"

"What is she doing?" asked Mrs. Barclay.

"Shaving Jack!" And Aunt Lois sat down, fairly shaking with laughter.

But Mrs. Barclay did not join in her mirth. A slight pallor came into her face, and she ran out of the room hastily. At the word shaving there arose in her mind clay. "She's only bubbling over with spirits. No one will get blue mouldy while she is about."

"I reckon not," said Aunt Lois, dryly, as her hands began moving again, and the sharp click of her needles sounded through the room.

THE CLIMBING PERCH.

THE Climbing Perch is best known as an inhabitant of rivers and ponds in most parts of the East Indies, and is about six inches long. Unlike other fishes of which we have any knowledge, it can live for several days out of water, and has the power of ascending trees, which it does, it is asserted, for the purpose of obtaining food. Hence its common and scientific appellation—scandens, or climbing. In all its parts, this singular little fish is peculiarly fitted for performing the feat from which it derives its name. From its gill-covers project numerous little spines or prickles, which are used as hands to cling to the tree. To facilitate its progress over the bark, its body is lubricated with a very slippery mucus. In climbing, the fish, turning its tail to the left, and resting upon the small spines of its lower fin, pushes itself forward by expanding its body, at the same time closing its gill-covers, that they may not impede its progress; then re-opening them it attains a higher point. Thus, and by bending the spiny rays of its back fin to the right and left, and fixing them in the bark, it is enabled to perform its curious journey. Both the lower and back fins, so necessary for certain portions of this climbing operation, can, at other times, be snugly packed away in cavities left for that purpose in the animal's body.

But it is not as a climber only that this fish is remarkable. In the countries in which it abounds the smaller water-courses or ponds dry up in the hot summers. When they begin to fail, the little animal creeps up the banks and "slowly makes its way over the earth to some larger stream. Though sometimes compelled to travel in this way by day—and it has been met within the glare of noon, toiling along a dusty road—its journeys are usually performed at night or in early morning, whilst the grass is still wet with dew." Climbing Perch are plentiful in the Ganges, and the boatmen have been known to keep them for five or six days in an earthen pot without water, using daily what they wanted, and finding them as lively as when just caught.

There is one other fish, found in the fresh waters of tropical America, which shares with the Climbing Perch its independence of its "native element." This fish is very abundant in Guiana, where it is much prized by the natives, who are passionate lovers of the fish, on account of its fatness. It is called the Hassar, and is one of the few fishes known to construct nests. It is a small fish, seldom exceeding eight inches in length, of a greenish-brown color. Perhaps the most curious part of the economy of this fish is the fact that its nest is not placed in the water, but in a muddy hole just above the surface. This, however, accords with the qualities of the fish, which has the power to travel over land from one pond to another. During the dry season the Hassar frequently burrows in the mud, remaining there until the welcome rain sets it free or until it is removed by some hungry native, acquainted with its habits and energetic enough to dig for it.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT.

NURSES.

SAYS Dr. George H. Hope, in his little manual "Till the Doctor Comes:"

There are five qualifications we require in a nurse—Sobriety, Cleanliness, Firmness, Gentleness and Patience.

SOBRIETY.—All I shall say on this point is, if, unfortunately, you cannot resist temptation, do not come near us; the sick room is no place for you; we dare not trust you.

CLEANLINESS.—Be always very clean yourself, and keep the room sweet. A very little thing will spoil the appetite of a person already sick. Never let anything offensive, any dressing from a wound or burn, remain in the room. Let every vessel be emptied as soon as it is done with, well washed out, and left in the open air. Change the air frequently by opening the window; remember, bad air will poison a person as surely as bad food. The poison of fever is dangerous or not accordingly as you weaken it with fresh air—just as you make spirits weaker by adding water. Do not leave food in the room if the patient cannot eat it. Do not let the drinking-water stand long without being changed, as it absorbs whatever gases there are in the room, so that when the patient drinks, you are actually putting back into his stomach the poison which has been thrown out through the skin.

FIRMNESS.—Remember firmness is not rudeness. You cannot expect a suffering patient to know as well what is best for him as those whose brains are clear. Therefore if a certain thing is best to be done, do it; do it kindly, but do it; he will thank you for it afterward.

GENTLENESS.—Whatever you have to do for the patient, be gentle. In cases of rheumatism and broken limbs, you must change the clothes, however painful the process, but do it gently, and cause no needless suffering. With care all jerks and knocks may be avoided. And lastly, PATIENCE.—Never forget the difference between yourself and the person under your care. Did you never yourself feel irritable and restless even when you were well? Have there not been some days when you had so easily been put out, so cross that you have been almost ashamed of yourself? How, then, must it be with the person taken suddenly from an active life and compelled to lie still in one position—or with one whose whole body is racked with pain? Never lose patience, however sorely tried; bear with these trials for awhile, and by and by you will have your reward.

A PAGE OF VARIETIES.

GEMS OF THOUGHT.

BUSINESS neglected is business lost.

IDLENESS is the grave of a living man.

HE has hard work who has nothing to do.

SHUT your ears when evil things are said.

LEARNING makes man fit company for himself.

A GRAIN of produce is worth a pound of craft.

VIRTUE and happiness are mother and daughter.

WISE men make more opportunities than they find.

FIRE gold fears not the fire, nor solid stone the water.

THE error of a moment is often the sorrow of a whole life

HE who spends before he thrives, will beg before he thinks.

A GOOD word for another is easily said and costs us nothing.

SMALL faults indulged are little thieves that let in greater.

LET your promises be sincere, and such as you can carry out.

A MAN had better be poisoned in his blood than in his principles.

BENJAMIN WEST said, "A kiss from my mother made me a painter."

A PRUDENT man is like a pin; his head prevents him from going too far.

YOU cannot jump over a mountain, but step by step takes you to the other side.

WHENEVER you doubt whether an intended action be good or bad, abstain from it.

ONLY what we have wrought into our character during life can we take away with us.

DID you ever do anything wrong without, sooner or later, being in fear, shame, or sorrow on account thereof?

SAYS an ancient writer: "when a man dies, people say, 'what property has he left?' But the angels say to him, 'what good deeds hast thou sent before thee?'"

PERSONS who are always cheerful and good-humored are very useful in the world; they maintain peace and happiness, and spread a thankful temper amongst all who live around them.

IN most quarrels there is fault on both sides. A quarrel may be compared to a spark, which cannot be produced without a flint as well as steel; either of them may hammer on wood forever, but no fire will follow.

NEVER do a good action from the expectation of gratitude. If gratitude follow, so much the better—you are so much into pocket; but gratitude or not, always do the good action when the opportunity presents itself.

THE good of human life does not lie in the possession of things which, for one man to possess, is for the rest to lose, but rather in things which all can possess alike, and where one man's wealth promotes his neighbor's.

WHAT good does scolding do? It does no one the least service, but it creates infinite mischief. Scolded servants never do their work well. Their tempers are roused, as well as the mistress's, and they very often fall in their duties at awkward moments, simply to spite her and "serve her out." Very wrong in them, doubtless; but human nature is frail, and service is a trying institution. It does no good to husband or child, for it simply empties the house of both as soon as is possible.

SPARKS OF HUMOR.

"THE best way to keep cool," said a witty person, "is not to get warm."

A LOAD of wood given to a poor person, warms you almost as much as it does him.

HE who pokes his nose everywhere, will sometimes poke it between a thumb and forefingers.

EVERY minnow wants to be a whale; but it is best to be a little fish when you have but little water.

THOSE who marry old people merely in expectation to bury them, hang themselves in hopes that some one will come and out the halter.

A RIVAL of a certain great lawyer sought to humiliate him publicly by saying: "You blacked my father's boots once." "Yes," replied the lawyer, unabashed, "and I did it well."

MRS. PARTINGTON has been reading the health officer's weekly reports, and thinks, "total" must be an awful malignant disease, since as many die of it as of all the rest put together.

"You have not one drop of the great Napoleon's blood in your veins," said testy old Jerome, one day in a pet to his nephew, the emperor. "Well," replied Louis Napoleon, "at all events I have his whole family on my shoulders."

A LITTLE girl was one day reading the "History of England" with her governess, and, coming to the statement that Henry I. never laughed after the death of his son, she looked up and said, "Whatever did he do when he was tickled?"

"How do you get along with your arithmetic?" asked a father of his little boy, who answered and said: "I've ciphered through addition, partition, subtraction, distraction, abomination, justification, hallucination, derivation, amputation, creation and adoption!"

A COUNTRYMAN was complaining of the trouble a drunken man had given him. "How do you know he was drunk?" said a bystander. The countryman indignantly replied, "What could he be else, when he asked for the shoe-horn to put his hat on with?"

THAT was a sorry case of a tailor who dunned a man for the amount of his bill. The man said he was sorry, very sorry indeed, that he could not pay it. "Well," said the tailor, "I took you for a man that would be sorry, but if you are sorer than I am, I give under."

A CLERGYMAN in a strange parish wishing to know what the people thought of his preaching, "interviewed" the sexton, and asked him what the people said of Mr. Jones, his predecessor. "Oh," replied the sexton, "they say he isn't sound." "Well, what do they say of the new minister?" "Oh, they say he's all sound."

AN editor in Illinois talks in this way: "If you owe but a single dollar, go and pay it; when there is so little money, we ought to keep it moving around lively. Jim owed us, and we owed Bill, and Bill owed Jim. Jim got mad because we made him pay one morning last week; but we paid Bill, and Bill paid Jim, and Jim went to bed that night as happy as a clam, with just as much money as he had in the morning, and three men out of debt."

FITTING FOR COLLEGE.—"That's where the boys fit for college," said the professor to Mrs. Partington, pointing to a schoolhouse.

"Did they?" said the old lady, with animation. "Then if they fit for the college before they went, they didn't fight afterward?"

"Yes," said he, smiling and favoring the conceit, "but the fight was with the head, not with the hands."

"Butted, did they?" said the old lady.

ARTHUR'S ILLUSTRATED HOME MAGAZINE.

Vol. XLI.

JUNE, 1873.

No. 6.

A VISIT TO SMYRNA AND EPHEBUS.

FROM "FOOTPRINTS OF THE APOSTLES," BY ANDREW THOMSON.

A SIGNAL from our ship warns us to be on deck, and waving many a grateful farewell to our kind Cypriot friends, we are in a few hours beyond the farthest point of Cyprus, and sailing along the shores of the Levant.

We have now time to look at the passengers in our somewhat crowded ship. In the saloon, England and America almost monopolize the accommodation. But when we look over upon the deck-passengers, what a strange medley presents itself! There is a sad, old, white-bearded Jew, seldom rising from his little bit of carpet, with a young Rebecca, probably his grandchild, watching his every movement, and anticipating his every want. There are many Mahometans punctiliously performing their devotion at the stated hours; while a few Maronites and Druses from the Lebanon, and some soldiers of the Sultan, help to make the groups more picturesque.

In one part of the vessel, between the saloon and the side, protected by an awning of canvas from the sun, there are six young women belonging to a pasha who is on board, going to fill up vacant places in his harem at Constantinople. They are inclosed and separated from the rest of the ship's company, and herd together. Their soulless looks give one the impression that their minds must have ceased to grow after the age of ten or twelve. They are not, however, without their full share of curiosity, as their frequent furtive glances into the saloon make evident. The waters have become a little rough, as we have approached the shores of Asia Minor, but it is enough to make the Orientals miserable. A gale is about the last thing in the world that they would wish for. They leave it to the pale-faced men from the West to sing—

"Be thou my chariot, stormy sea."

But by another morning we are lying off Rhodes, not with time enough for a comfortable landing, but with ample opportunity for receiving a general impression of the little capital with its neighborhood. Several Turkish war-ships are anchored at no great distance from us. The whole appearance of Rhodes produces a greater sense of majesty than did that of Cyprus, and vindicates her old title of "Queen of the Ægean." The town is fortified and surrounded by strong walls, and we can see from our ship the entrance which was once bestrid by that huge Colossus, beneath whose legs the most tall-masted ships could sail. Those who have been on shore on a breathless visit confirm the information of Fellowes and other travellers respecting the distinct marks which have been left on Rhodes by the knights of Jerusalem, though it is now eight hundred years since they were driven from the island, carrying honor and chivalry with them. The arms of England and France are seen sculptured on many an ancient house, and the castle continues in massive strength, under which sixteen thousand Turks fell, before the knights handed over their iron yet not ungenerous dominion to the Moslem. The little minaretted capital is circled on the land side by an eminence of considerable height, which is crested by windmills and trees, especially by the always-picturesque palm; while, further inland, mountains rise into the clouds to the height of more than four thousand feet. Remembering the old pagan fable intended to represent its delicious climate and its perfumed breezes, that Jupiter poured down upon this island a golden shower, it was with some regret that we were hurried away from it, and that soon after midday we saw it dwindle out of view.

Our course now lay in the midst of islands of every size and shape, some of them rising high in pyramidal and even fantastic forms, and others retaining a comparatively low level, many of them so small that their entire outline could be traced, as if the sea were a map, and those islets the highly-relieved and richly-colored parts of it. Classical and Christian associations strangely mingle in many of those islands. There, for example, is Cos, the birthplace of Apelles and Pythagoras, so abounding in old heathen altars, that the inhabitants scoop them out for vessels in which to bruise their corn, and in whose little seaport capital Paul must have spent a night on his third great missionary circuit. And that larger island, which seems like one vast mountain, its summit dark with clouds and nursing the thunder, when all the rest of the Ægean is cloudless and serene, is Samos, where Paul touched, and perhaps preached, on the same eventful voyage; and which is memorable as the birthplace of Hippocrates and the scene of Herodotus's temporary exile, where he wrote some of the books of his delightfully garrulous history. But our highest satisfaction was reserved for the afternoon of that singularly beautiful day; for an hour before sunset there was pointed out to us, beyond the shoulder of another island, the doubly sacred Isle of Patmos.

It continues to this day, in its external features, the "Æperima insula," which ancient writers called it. But, to our mind, it shone in that bright sea with all the solemn grandeur of a temple. As the scene of banishment for John the Beloved, as the place from which the Heaven-sent messages were communicated by the faithful Apostle to the seven churches on that western seaboard, and where there passed before the seer, in a succession of symbolic visions, the history of the Church of Christ from the ascension down to the winding up of its history at the judgment, what scene approaches it, in the interest of its sacred recollections, out of Palestine? Between what spot of earth and heaven was the intercourse so intimate and continuous? The golden ladder which Jacob saw for one brief night at Bethel, here spanned the distance between the two worlds for many a day and night. As we brought the island nearer to us by means of a good telescope, and saw it in the light of the western sun, we were able to appreciate the description of it by Clarke, as "surrounded by an inexpressible brightness, and seeming to float upon an abyss of fire." Probably the Dean of Westminster has overstrained his ingenuity, in his endeavor to show how much the visions of John took their shape and coloring from the natural scenery and the physical phenomena of this island-prison. But much may be said in support of the general principle on which his speculation proceeds. If we find the descriptions which other inspired men give of the worship of Heaven idealized from that of Solomon's Temple, why may we not believe that John's visions were influenced in degree by the scenes of this natural temple of the Ægean? It has been noticed that there was little in the sunrises and sunsets of Ephesus corresponding with the grand pictures of the Apocalypse, but it was otherwise with what John beheld in and around Patmos. As he looked down from one of its summits on the everchanging sea, he must often have seen it calm as a mirror at his feet, "as a sea of glass like unto crystal;" or when the neighboring volcanic mountain of Thera sent up its lurid flames, how often must the deep have seemed "like unto a lake of fire?" And, again, when its dense smoke darkened the heavens, the sun must have appeared "like sackcloth of hair," and the "moon as blood." Thus far, perhaps, we may safely go with the accomplished traveller in supposing the natural phenomena in and around this rugged isle to have been reproduced and enlarged in John's symbolic pictures of the spiritual world; and, indeed, the very circumstance connects the Apostle all the more with Patmos.

Before the dawn of the following day we were off Chios, "the isle of wines," over against which Paul had passed a night at anchor, on his return voyage from Troas to Cæsarea. We both received and landed goods. Indeed, it was one of our minor enjoyments to observe the commodities that were obtained from the various islands at which we touched; rich fruit and vegetables from one, poultry from another, earthenware of antique shape from a third, and flowers from a fourth. In the early morning we were sailing up the noble bay of Smyrna, skirted on either side by many-shaped mountains covered with woods that were green and beautiful. Before noon we had cast anchor in the midst of war-ships and merchant vessels from many lands, in the wonderfully spacious bay of Smyrna. The view of this capital of Asia Minor, as obtained from the sea, was grand and imposing. Spreading along the semicircular extremity of the bay, it rises far up the sides of Mount Pagus, minaret and cypress intermingling—a ruined fortress, its ancient acropolis, with dismantled walls standing out on the summit against a clear sky, while behind all this there is a far-reaching circle of verdant hills. We noticed, with our glass, far up Mount Pagus, a tall, solitary cypress bending over some object; and, on inquiry, we found that it was the tomb of Polycarp. There is an extraordinary vitality in this city of Smyrna. Ten times it has been destroyed, and as many times it has risen from its ashes. It would not be easy to compute the times in which it has been shattered by earthquake, and more than decimated by the plague; yet there it is, with more than one hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants, rapidly becoming the commercial rival of Constantinople. The chief explanation of all this is to be found in the fact that it is the natural emporium of Eastern commerce by caravans from the East and ships from the West, which ride in safety in one of the most tranquil and spacious bays in the world.

On landing we experienced a good deal of that disenchantment which all must expect on a closer view of an Eastern city; but still, we greatly enjoyed Smyrna. Many things that drew our attention, at once told their own story. The flags of so many foreign consulates, on the roofs of spacious houses, of semi-European architecture that lined the shore, bore testimony to the importance and magnitude of the commerce, of which this city was the centre. And as we passed from the Frank quarter to the interior of the city, which contained the native population, the one-storied wooden houses revealed the fact that the people dreaded the earthquake even more than the conflagration.

But three objects especially interested us in Smyrna. One of these was the famous Caravan bridge, a little distance out of the city, which spans the Meleus, from whose waters blind Homer may have drunk three thousand years ago. It is at once the chief scene of festivity on all gala days to the Smyrniots and the great thoroughfare of commerce; for all the rich produce of the East that is to be shipped at Smyrna must pass along this bridge, and all the caravans which pass toward the East and pay toll here, acquire a right to pasture their camels in any part of the sultan's dominions. It is a common wish of the people, by which they express their idea of becoming rich, that they might possess the value of what passes over this bridge in a single day.

Ephesus was about fifty miles distant, and there was a railway connecting it with Smyrna, and the attraction drawing us to this seat of the first of the seven churches of Asia now became irresistible. But there were discouragements in the way, for brigands were known to be active in all the neighborhood. A farmer's son had recently been seized by them, carried off to their horrid robbers' den, and only recovered by the payment of an exorbitant ransom. Three of these scoundrels had afterward been caught by the soldiers of the sultan, identified by the youth as belonging to the party that had stolen him, and promptly beheaded; and as the Smyrniots are fond of the sensational as well as the better-educated communities of the West, photographs of the ghastly heads were being sold in considerable numbers in the few shops in Smyrna that ventured to traffic in literature. Revenge was, therefore, likely now to actuate the remaining brigands as well as cupidity; but though we had the strongest aversion to being bound and blindfolded by ruffians and treated to their kind of hospitality, the mere possibility of such an unwelcome adventure was not sufficient to deter us.

When we reached the miserable mud village of Ayasolook, the modern Ephesus, we learned that the brigands had been deep in their potations during the previous night, and that drunkenness had probably made them harmless for some hours to come. The first object that attracted our notice when we looked beyond the village was a mosque of large dimensions, which was named from St. John. It had originally been a Christian temple, built by the Emperor Justinian in honor of the beloved disciple upon the site of an older church whose date went back to the early Christians. The famous council of Ephesus, with its two thousand bishops, met within its walls, and found ample accommodation for themselves and their dependants. But the central point of interest in connection with ancient Ephesus was Mount Prion, a mile and a half distant. The first part of our way to it was past a line of lofty marble columns, on the top of each of which, instead of the usual capital, was a stork sitting on her nest, and more than covering the whole summit.

We then walked along narrow paths; through the midst of tall, rank grass or waving corn-fields, often stumbling over prostrate marble columns or richly-carved sarcophagi which had been brought to light by Mr. Wood and his Arab excavators; keeping a sharp look out all the while for serpents, which are so numerous here that there are men with long hollow instruments who devote themselves to their destruction. Everywhere underneath our feet there is the buried city; for wherever excavations have been made there have been found not only the marks of its existence, but of its extent and splendor.

We are now wending our way around Mount everything else in magnitude as well as in interest, the Great Theatre, or, as it is popularly named, the Theatre of St. Paul. The proscenium, which has only recently been laid bare, is in good preservation, with its magnificent entrance gates and its sculptures in alto, and the whole of that extremity of the mountain where it stands, appears to have been scooped out up to its summit to afford seats for the spectators. The marble of which the seats were formed has been removed by native Vandals, but their places may still be distinctly traced in the grassy shapes which remain, and rising up from the proscenium to the summit, they must have been

Prion, and it is evident that the principal public structures of Ephesus were built around the sides, or at the foot of this mountain; while an ancient cemetery can still be traced upon its summit, where, tradition says, the ashes of the beloved apostle were laid. We can say nothing indeed with certainty of the locality of Diana's temple, for hitherto it has baffled the researches of the excavator—the earthquake having probably made its grave very deep. But with the help of the pencilled sketch with which Mr. Wood supplied us we were able to identify the Forum, the Market-place, the Stadium, the Odeon with its marble seats still rising a considerable way up the sides of the mountain, and transcending capable of holding at least ten thousand spectators. It was into this place that Gaius and Aristarchus the companions of Paul, were dragged, and here the maddened multitude called for hours together, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The Theatre looks forth upon what was once the Bay of Ephesus, in which, in the days of the city's greatness, a thousand ships were often anchored, and the sight must have been magnificent, whether of the crowded bay as seen from this enormous and splendid edifice, or of the theatre and the mountain with its circle of grand structures, as seen by the ships entering from the sea. All these effects were evidently in the design of the architect, and the whole proves on what a Titanic scale of grandeur the public structures of those times were both planned and executed. But how melancholy is the change! Ruin now bends to ruin. The once crowded bay is now a heap of mud, covered with reeds and coarse grass, through which the Cayster winds lazily, sending up exhalations laden with fever and pestilence. Around us for many miles there is one vast grave. It is not only barrenness we look upon, but something that is awfully desolate and judgment-stricken.

It was some hours after sunset on a Saturday evening when we got back to Smyrna. But the night was calm and the sky "sown with stars," and we glided easily from the shore to our ship, through waters so very phosphorescent that at every stroke of the oars we seemed sailing in a sea of gold

PERILS OF ARCTIC EXPLORATION.

BY MRS. E. B. DUFFEY.

WHEN we consider the perils which beset an expedition of exploration in the Arctic Regions, it seems almost incredible that there are to be found men brave enough to encounter them in the interests of science. The rigors of the past winter here have been almost too much for us; suffering has been great, and complaint universal. Yet the coldest of this winter weather has been mild compared to that experienced in Greenland at the same period of the year.

But even now there is more than one expedition quartered somewhere in the Arctic Regions waiting for the opening of the few months of comparatively mild weather to prosecute their researches. What their tale of suffering has been and still is, we have yet no means of knowing. We may never know; for, like the ill-fated expedition under the command of Sir John Franklin, they may never be heard of more. Let us hope, though, for better things.

The records of travel in these regions are highly interesting. The heroism and endurance which are necessitated by the great dangers constantly encountered, render even the most trifling incidents wonderful when compared with other records of travel. Hunger and thirst are frequently to be contended with, and the cold is an ever present enemy.

The ships in winter are ice-locked. In summer they must navigate amid fields of detached ice, while great ice mountains are floating around, and may at any time come rushing onward with irresistible force, bringing certain destruction.

Foot or sledge travellers in these regions may, in a blinding snow-storm, lose their way, and never more be seen alive. Hall, the Arctic explorer, who has made several journeys to Polar Regions, gives a touching narrative of a man who was thus lost. His companions went in search of him, and after tracing his steps for many hours, and finding he had wandered helplessly and aimlessly for miles—often going in circles which interlocked one with another—at last discovered him lying frozen and stiff upon the snow. Unable to bury him, they covered him with snow and ice where he lay, and returned sadly to their ship.

There is another danger which besets the traveller. The vast fields of ice which, in the colder season, connect one shore with another, are traversed the same as though they covered the solid ground, instead of hiding the treacherous deep. Sometimes a sudden change of weather will break up, in an incredibly short time, these icy surfaces, and perhaps cut off the traveller from the land. Hall describes a peril of this sort which once threatened him. Traveling with dogs and sledge, in company with three Esquimaux, one of them a woman, over the ice, they stopped for the night and built themselves an ice-hut or igloo, Esquimaux fashion. It was made by carving out snow blocks, and building a hut in the shape of a dome. They spent a very comfortable night, the woman getting them a hot supper, and attending to all their wants. The next morning they took up the day's journey over the frozen sea, and at night built another igloo. They were no sooner under shelter than a terrible storm burst forth which detained them all the next day. They could hear the roar of the elements without, and feel the ice upon which their frail tenement stood shaken beneath them. Toward night one of the Esquimaux took a survey of the outside world, and "returned with the astounding news that the ice was breaking, and water had appeared not more than ten rods south" of them. It was late in the afternoon. The shore presented a view of rugged precipices and steep mountains. They must remain another night in their insecure quarters. In the evening the gale abated, "but the heavy sea kept the ice creaking, moving and thundering, as it actually danced to and fro." The next morning they made all haste to reach a place of safety. But it was with great difficulty that they could pursue their way over the broken ice. The snow was very deep, and there was constant danger of falling into the snow-covered ice-cracks. Sometimes they came to wide fissures in the ice, and they would have to turn aside in their course to avoid them. Encountering and overcoming difficulties which would have discouraged people less brave, they at nightfall succeeded in reaching the shore ice. During all this toilsome journey they were suffering severely from thirst. Ice and snow were all around them, but so cold that if taken within the mouth they froze it instead of being thawed by it.

At another time, as Hall was crossing the ice in a sledge, the wind freshened to a gale, and there was great probability of a floe, or ice-island, cracking off and drifting them seaward. "The open water," he says, "was within a mile of our course, and the floe giving way would have been swept rapidly to the northeast." This danger he fortunately escaped.

Dr. Kane also experienced this same danger on more than one occasion. Once when crossing the ice, he found the spring tides had broken the great area of ice, and that the passage for the sledge was interrupted by fissures. Seeing the state of the ice, he attempted to reach shore, but the tide was low, and the ice-belt rose up like a wall. Turning about, he and his companions with dogs and sledge travelled for hours over the broken ice. The dogs would leap the chasms, dragging the sledge behind them. Once dogs and sledge fell through a wider chasm down enough to move on again. At high water they succeeded in surmounting the ice-belt, and thus escaped from their danger.

The most insidious enemy which the traveller in Arctic Regions has to contend against is the sleepy lethargy which overcomes him when exposed to into the water, and it was only after much difficulty that they were brought back upon the ice again. The thermometer was below zero, and at night the tent could not be raised, as it was frozen as hard as a hingle. So they laid down with their bufa'o robe bags for protection, and slept until it was light severe cold. We have all heard of that sleep which creeps over a man about to perish from cold. If this desire for sleep is yielded to, its victim seldom wakes again of his own accord.

Dr. Kane tells of a long and perilous journey himself and several others undertook to rescue four men who were lost and overcome with cold. At setting out, the thermometer stood at forty-six degrees below zero, and finally fell to forty-nine below, with a keen wind from the northwest. For twenty-one hours they wandered, hungry and thirsty, before they found the camp of their disabled comrades. The little tent was so small that of the fifteen men all told, only eight could enter at once. So while one-half the party took a turn of two hours' sleep, the other half had to remain outside and walk up and down to keep from freezing.

They finally set out on the return, with plenty of food, and the sick on the sledge carefully wrapped and bundled in furs. The thermometer was now fifty-five degrees below zero. For six hours they made encouraging progress. Then they began to feel the lethargic sleep of freezing. Kane's account of this journey is exceedingly interesting. He says:

"Bonsall and Morton, two of our stoutest men, came to me begging permission to sleep; 'they were not cold; the wind did not enter them now; a little sleep was all they wanted.' Presently Hans was found nearly stiff under a drift; and Thomas, bolt upright, had his eyes closed, and could hardly articulate. At last John Blake threw himself on the snow, and refused to rise. They did not complain of feeling cold; but it was in vain that I wrestled, boxed, ran, argued, jeered or reprimanded; an immediate halt could not be avoided. We pitched our tent with much difficulty. Our hands were too powerless to strike a fire; we were obliged to do without water or food. Even the spirits (whisky) had frozen at the men's feet, under all the coverings. We put Bonsall, Ohlsen, Thomas and Hans, with the other sick men, well inside the tent, and crowded in as many others as we could. Then leaving the party in charge of Mr. McGary, with orders to come on after four hours' rest, I pushed ahead with William Godfrey, who volunteered to be my companion. My aim was to reach the half-way tent, and thaw some ice and pemmican before the others arrived.

"The floe was of level ice, and the walking excellent. I cannot tell how long it took us to make the nine miles, for we were in a strange sort of stupor, and had little apprehension of time. It was probably about four hours. We kept ourselves awake by imposing on each other a continued articulation of words; they must have been incoherent enough. I recall these hours as among the most wretched I have ever gone through; we were neither of us in our right senses, and retained a very confused recollection of what preceded our arrival in the tent. We both of us, however, remember a bear, who walked leisurely before us and tore up as he went a jumper that Mr. McGary had providently thrown off the day before. He tore it into shreds and rolled it into a ball, but never offered to interfere with our progress."

They reached their tent in safety, and prepared supper for the rest of the party, who arrived a few hours afterward. After a short rest, they all proceeded on their journey. The thermometer had risen to four degrees below zero. Kane continues his narrative:

"Our halts multiplied, and we fell half sleeping on the snow. I could not prevent it. Strange to say, it refreshed us. I ventured upon the experiment myself, making Riley wake me at the end of three minutes; and I felt so much benefited by it that I tried the men in the same way. They sat on the runners of the sledge, fell asleep instantly, and were forced to wakefulness when their three minutes were out. * * * We reached the brig safely at 1, P. M., we believe, without a halt. I say we believe—and here, perhaps, is the most decided proof of our suffering. We were quite delirious, and had ceased to entertain a sane apprehension of the circumstances about us. We moved on like men in a dream. Our footmarks, seen afterward, showed that we had steered a bee line for the brig. It must have been by a sort of instinct, for it left no impress on the memory. Bonsall was sent staggering ahead, and reached the brig, God knows how, for he had fallen repeatedly at the track lines; but he delivered with punctilious accuracy the messages I had sent by him to Dr. Hayes. I thought myself the soundest of all, for I went through all the formula of sanity, and can recall the muttering delirium of my comrades when we got back into the cabin of our brig. Yet I have been told since of some speeches, and some orders, too, of mine, which I should have remembered for their absurdity, if my mind had retained its balance."

There are other dangers besides that of the elements. Kane refers to the bear which preceded them on their way. The great white Polar bear is a formidable antagonist. Then there are swarms of gaunt, starved wolves ranging the ice and snow in quest of food.

In the picture we see a man upon a floe or detached piece of ice, keeping at bay a pack of hungry wolves, who are longing to pounce upon him and rend him limb from limb. It is perhaps only the steady glance of his eye, filling their cowardly hearts with fear, which causes them to hesitate; or it may be the sight of his rifle, which they instinctively recognize as a weapon of defence.

A recent traveller tells of a pack of four hungry wolves which pursued him until he presented his rifle at them, when they turned tail and crept off.

It was the gentle politeness of a genuine Christian gentleman which led Dr. Richard Mansfield, the rector of the Episcopal church in Derby, Connecticut, to correct himself once, as he was passing a group of the children of his flock. They had grown so fast since he last saw them, that he said: "Why, my dear children, you grow so like weeds that I am scarcely able to recognize you." And then, as if he had done wrong, he said: "Pardon me—I should have said, you have grown so like flowers." It must be pleasanter to a little child to be likened to a flower than to a weed, and true politeness thinks of such little things.

THE STONECUTTER'S SIX WISHES.*

ONCE a poor stonecutter
In Eastern quarries wrought;
His toil was long and weary,
And little wages brought;
And as above the stone he bent,
He murmured in his discontent:

"Oh, if I could be only
Rich enough some day
To rest on carpets warm and thick,
In silken garments gay!"
His murmur mounted to the sky;
His guardian angel made reply:

"Thy wishes have been granted!"
And soon the poor man sat,
All clad in silk so soft and gay,
On many a costly mat;
There as he sat in wealth and joy,
Behold, the emperor went by.

Runners ran before him,
And his titles cried;
Splendid horsemen rode behind,
More splendid at his side;
While one above his head did hold
A great umbrella all of gold.

Then the rich man murmured:
"Mine is but useless treasure
If I've no right to ride abroad
In all this pomp and pleasure,
With glittering courtiers all around—
With the gold badge of empire crown'd."

Again the murmur mounted,
Again the angel heard:
"Thou shalt be emperor!" he said.
Soon had he kept his word.
Now the poor stonecutter, elate,
Rode forth in his imperial state.

Runners ran before him,
And his titles cried;
Splendid horsemen rode behind,
More splendid at his side;
While one above his head did hold
The great umbrella all of gold.

But fiercely beat the sunbeams;
All the land was parched;
The road was white and dusty
Where the grand procession marched;
The emperor cursed the blinding ray,
And almost fainted by the way.

"A fine thing to be emperor,"
He murmured, "when the heat
Pays no regard to all my power,
And these fierce sunbeams beat
On me, like any common one;
'Tis plain that I must be the sun!"

"Lo!" spake the guardian angel;
"Now surely thou'rt content?"
For now he had become the sun,
And forth his arrows sent,
Below, above, to right, to left,
Till all the earth was parched and cleft

* Paraphrased from "Max Havelaar."

THE STONECUTTER'S SIX WISHES.

Till all the green things withered ;
Till all the brooks were dried ;
Till all the princes of the world
Against the sunbeams cried.
Then a soft cool cloud stole in below,
And bade the beams no farther go.

"The cloud alone is mighty !
The cloud alone is great !
The cloud can dare defy my power,
And my burning wrath abate.
To be the sun no more I'm proud ;
I only want to be the cloud !"

Again the guardian angel heard,
Again the prayer was granted ;
Right in between the sun and earth
Lay the soft cool cloud undaunted ;
The half-dead earth took heart again,
And listened, longing, for the rain.

First in stealthy dews and drops,
Then in whispering showers,
Then in mad-roaring waterspouts—
The wrathful watery powers—
Till every river overflowed,
And wasted all the land abroad.

Trees, and men, and cattle
Whirled pell-mell down the flood ;
Castle and cot in ruin crashed ;
Only the rock withstood,
And smiled to feel the paltry beat
Of fuming billows round his feet.

"I'm master'd !" cried the baffled cloud :
"I fain would be the rock !"
The angel heard, the change was wrought
Ere he the word well spoke ;
His foot deep-planted in the ground,
His rugged head with sunshine crown'd.

No man could climb his pinnacle,
No storm could shake his root ;
In vain the cloud might spend its spite,
The sun its arrows shoot :
The floods their wildest passion proved—
He stood immovable, unmoved.

Then a poor stonecutter,
That in the quarries wrought,
Came boldly to the rock's huge feet,
And pick and hammer brought ;
Steadily, surely, day by day,
He hewed the rock's huge bulk away.

"How then ! and hath a mortal
A power beyond my own,
To carve these mighty blocks away
From out my breast of stone ?"
He needs must end where he began,
He prayed to be that quarryman.

So, a poor stonecutter,
As of old, he wrought ;
His toil was long and weary,
And little wages brought ;
But, as above the stone he bent,
He sang—for now he was content !

THE ERMINE.

BY MARION KNIGHT.

THE fur of the ermine is worn upon the robes of kings and nobles, and helps to form their crowns and coronets, and it is among the most beautiful and valuable for ladies' wear. We find it, when manufactured into robes, soft, fine and white, or of a delicate creamy tint, spotted here and there with glossy black. The ermine, from the value of its fur as an emblem of royalty or high dignity, has obtained a distinct recognition in heraldry.

Yet the little creature which provides this highly-prized fur is one of the commonest of animals in the northern part of America and of Europe. It belongs to the same family as the weasel, to which it animals, such as field-mice, birds and frogs, packed nicely away.

The ermine is, in the summer, called a stoat, and then its back is of a reddish-brown, while the under portions of its body, its toes and the edges of its ears are white.

As cold weather advances, it gradually changes its color, not, as has been sometimes supposed, by the shedding of its old coat, but by an actual whitening of the fur. Passing through a state of transition, it becomes of a pure white, all but the bushy tip of its tail, which remains black. It is this tip which is distributed over the fur in its manufactured state, and which contrasts so beautifully with the white.

In temperate latitudes the fur never becomes suffibears a striking resemblance, though it is somewhat larger.

Its food consists of rats, young rabbits, partridges and small animals of all descriptions, while it considers birds' eggs an especial delicacy. In search of this latter food it climbs the trunks of trees with the utmost ease, and stretches its long and lithe body along the branch until the nest is reached.

The female in looking after the wants of a family, is a wise and prudent housekeeper. She forages far and wide, and lays up carefully for future use all the products of her chase not required for immediate consumption. The larder of a mother ermine was once discovered supplied with five hares and four rabbits. Another one displayed a number of small ciently whitened to become of any commercial value. Thus the trapper seeks the ermine in Norway, Lapland, Siberia and in the neighborhood of Hudson Bay.

This white dress serves a double purpose. White is warmer than black or brown; and, being of the same color as the snow, upon which the ermine must travel in the wintry season, its wearer is not so easily discovered by its enemies.

The ermine cannot be really said to be a dangerous animal, though if molested, its sharp teeth and claws make it a formidable assailant. Mr. Wood repeats the story of a man who was attacked by several ermines. He says: "A gentleman was walking along a road when he saw two stoats sitting in the path. He idly picked up a stone and flung it at the animals, one of which was struck and knocked over by the force of the blow. The other stoat immediately uttered a loud and peculiar cry, which was answered by a number of its companions, who issued from a neighboring hedge, and sprang upon their assailant, running up his body with surprising rapidity, and striving to reach his neck. As soon as he saw the stoats coming to the attack, he picked up a handful of stones, thinking that he should be able to repel his little enemies, but they came boldly on, in spite of the stones and his stick. Most providentially a sharp wind happened to be blowing on that day, and he had wound a thick woollen comforter round his neck, so that he was partially protected. Finding that he had no chance of beating off the pertinacious animals, he flung his stick down, fixed his hat firmly over his temples, and pressing his hands to his neck, so as to guard that perilous spot as much as possible from the sharp teeth of the stoats, he started off homeward as fast as he could run. By degrees, several of the animals dropped off, but others clung so determinately to their opponent, that when he arrived at his stables, no less than five stoats were killed by his servants as they clung to his person. His hands, face and part of his neck were covered with wounds; but owing to the presence of mind with which he had defended his neck, the large blood-vessels had escaped without injury. The distance from the spot where he had been attacked to his own house was nearly four miles. He always declared that when he struck the stoat with the stone his companions called out "Murder!"

Although the ermine or stoat is naturally a wild animal, it is tamed as easily as the ferret or weasel, and is exceedingly gentle and playful and even affectionate in a state of domesticity.

WITHOUT, a perfect winter day,
Bright sky and dazzling snow.
Within, day home-life, pictures, flowers,
And firelight's ruddy glow.

When, like a sudden dash of bells,
A merry voice I heard,
A girlish voice, which seemed to me
Like gay, bright song of bird.

The messenger it was who came
Your gift to bring to me;
Oh, blessings on you, thoughtful friend,
And on your cherry-trees!

Thanks for your gift! such flavor rare,
So fair and fresh they seem,
That half inclined am I to think
This winter day a dream.

Thus fancying, fast from my eyes
The present fades away;
For wintry scene and sitting-room,
A golden summer day!

My childhood's home! bright are the skies,
The brooklet murmurs near,
Soft breezes whisper 'mong the trees,
Flowers bloom and birds sing clear.

A little child again, I stand
Beneath the cherry-tree,
And gaze, with wide and longing eyes,
On fruit too high for me.

Ah! I with ease those boughs might reach
If I were only tall;
And even now perhaps I might,
Could I but climb the wall.

At last, by persevering pulls,
Upon the top I stand,
And, reaching up—oh, joy of joys—
The bough is in my hand!

Oh, cherries kissed to ruby glow
By sunshine and by rains!
How rich am I: your wealth my all—
No king such grand realm gains!

The summer scene now vanishes,
The old-time fades away,
I to the present once more turn,
To live life's later day.

But still my mind will backward turn,
Soft winds from dreamland blow,
Till distant seems the present life,
And near the long ago.

Oh, friend of mine, your welcome fruit
This mem'ry brings, to teach
How we some things of life may grasp
That seem beyond our reach!

We children of an older growth,
Such tempting fruit oft see,
Some blessings which we long to grasp,
But all too high the "tree."

But, trusting God, let's persevere,
Life's current boldly stem,
And, soon or late, our strenuous will Must raise ourselves to them!

ALL FOR THE BEST.

All's for the best! set this on your standard,
Soldier of sadness, or pilgrim of love,
Who to the shores of despair may have wandered,
A way-wearied swallow, or heart-stricken dove.
All's for the best! be a man, but confiding,
Providence tenderly governs the rest,
And the frail bark of His creature is guiding,
Wisely and warily, all for the best.

MY MOTHER'S LOOM.

BY M. L. O.

WHEN we first moved to Wisconsin, my mother's loom made a prominent piece of furniture in our house.

That was about thirty years ago, and hand-weaving was not quite out of fashion at that time—and my mother, besides being a very good mother, was also a very good weaver.

How she ever managed to bring up a family of seven children, and spin and weave their clothing, and make and mend for them, would be a mystery to some people now; but she did it, besides doing a great deal of work for others—and she also taught her girls to spin and weave and knit and sew, as soon as they were old enough to learn such things.

We were poor, but were all healthy and happy. My father had given up his trade and come West for the purpose of getting a home for his family, preferring for us the companionship of nature, rather than the companionship of village children. It was the best thing that he could have done for us, and we enjoyed it to the amount of our capacity—the hills and the woods and the running brooks were our paradise then.

Father, with the help of my two brothers, worked a farm on shares, for a few years, to get a start; for he must have a team and farm implements, and some provisions ahead, before he could go out on the wild land and get a farm of his own; and mother, with the help of her girls, clothed the family. My oldest sister, who was then in her "teens," was of great assistance to her, especially in spinning and sewing. The rest of us were too small to do much, only light chores and errands. We were sent to school generally, when there was one in the neighborhood.

"Well, girls," mother would say to the little seven and five-years-old daughters, after the early breakfast was over, "mother must go on the loom, now, and Bessie must spin; so, you must wash the dishes and sweep the floor, and then you may play till time to go to school."

So the work would begin. Mother's commands were always obeyed—not that we were more obedient than children generally are, but because her requirements were always reasonable, and (whether willingly or unwillingly on our part) they must be heeded. Obedience was the law of the household. She did not waste many words about such things, and did not often have to resort to punishment; but when she did, it was sharp and decisive, and to the point; so that, being early trained, we soon took to minding our parents quite naturally.

She would go to her loom, and from daylight till dark, with the exception of the dinner-hour, up and down would go the treadles, in and out would fly the shuttles, back and forth would swing the heavy lathe. No steam nor water-power moved that loom—mother's hands and feet did it all.

I used often to wonder how she could throw the shuttle through so quickly. It would go like a dart—back and forth—from one hand to the other—and as it left either hand she would grasp the lathe, and as quickly as the other hand drew out the shuttle, she would "bang" the thread up into place. That was the work it required for each single thread of the "filling"—to treadle, to throw the shuttle, and to drive up the thread. Not to speak of the spinning, the spooling, the warping, the beaming, and the winding of quills to fill the shuttles, see how much work there was in weaving one yard of cloth. It took several yards for each garment, and many garments for a family of seven children, and that was the way she put in each thread, and the labor by which she clothed her family.

Sometimes little disagreements were heard in the other room among the children. We would soon hear her voice calling one of us by name to come and help her weave. Away we would go to help mother weave, which was to sit down on the back part of the loom, with our feet on the treadles near the place where they were fastened, and as she sprung them up and down, our feet would go up and down too, and we really thought at that time that we were helping mother very much—perhaps we were, but not in the way that we imagined.

She did not usually weave in the evening. She and the older girls would be busily employed with sewing or knitting, or whatever kind of light work could best be done or was most needed. We would all sit around the great fire in the old-fashioned fireplace and talk together, or listen to some of the family reading. Often some of the neighbors would drop in for an hour or two for a social chat.

But sometimes the "piece" would be to cut out in the evening, and that was a great diversion. Mother would weave it down from the great beam till the shuttle could pass through no longer, and then cut the cloth from the remnant of the warp (which is called "thrums").

"Now, girls," she would say, "take hold and pull off the cloth from the cloth-beam, while I measure it." And "girls" might pull pretty fast, they would not come out much ahead of mother with her yardstick. Each of the girls that could knit would have a bunch of the bright-colored "thrums."

So mother wove our clothes. Nice, they were, and bright and warm—and we wore them and were happy. And she wove another web at the same time—another, fine and strong, and the garments made from that web will last us forever.

When she taught us obedience to our parents; when she kept us in loving harmony with one another; when she taught us, by her own life, to love and speak the truth; when she taught us to live by honest labor, and instructed us in its arts; when she sent us to school; and, above all, when she made us such a blessed, happy home, that we loved it better than any other place, she gave us a garment that will endure in all weather and be fitting for any occasion.

Oh, my mother! may the web of my life be woven as firmly, and be as strong and true as the pattern thou didst give to me.

Those were happy days to us, though to my parents they were days and years of toil.

Some other time I may tell you how we made our home in the wild, unsettled part of our State.

"WORK WHILE THE DAY LASTS."

BY JANE O. DE FOREST.

EXCEPT in the gift of the Redeemer, God never bestowed so precious a boon upon mankind as the necessity of work," said, with truth, a distinguished statesman. The Saviour Himself gave us an undying example of the nobility of honorable employment, inasmuch as He was an humble artisan, a carpenter, and the son of a carpenter. The hundreds of distinguished men and women of every age have all been workers, either with the brain or hand, or both. We challenge the mention of one who was an inefficient do-nothing.

Idleness and greatness do not go hand-in-hand and many a person of superior natural abilities has lacked the energy to use them, thus remaining a mere cipher; while his brother, whom Nature had endowed far less liberally, has, by means of hard and untiring work, reached the goal of perfect success. If any of our readers feel that they have no particular "gift," let them remember that it was Application, and not Genius, who ascended the Hill of Science.

Mankind are said to be lazy by nature—original sin, we suppose; but that this inclination can be nearly or quite overcome, is proved every day by the lives of those earnest workers, who are never happy unless busily employed. Such persons are very apt to deny themselves needful relaxation and rest. They tell us that "it is better to wear out than to rust out," an opinion which we heartily endorse, but beg leave to suggest that it is better to do neither. Industry, though always commendable, never reaches its true position, unless the worker is actuated by other motives than those of pure selfishness. If one has no thoughts beyond the narrow limits of self, no desire to benefit his fellow-men, or to glorify his God, his life, though crowned with unceasing exertion, will become a grand failure at the last. When we look abroad over the vast universe, we behold no marks of indolence, no signs of weariness. The Eye that never sleeps, and the Hand that never tires, is seen amid all the works of nature. And as we stand beneath the starry heavens, on a calm, clear night, our heart is filled with awe and reverence, as we fancy we can almost hear the rush of our great planet, as it whirls through space with the speed of thought. If our Heavenly Father should suspend

His loving care but for one moment, what ruin and chaos and crash of worlds would follow.

The fields are whitening; there is work for all to do. Are the harvesters girding themselves? Are they using every opportunity for improvement? for gaining strength physically, intellectually and morally? Are they going forth with eager and hopeful determination? are they ready for the great work? God is calling—poor, dying humanity sends up its despairing wail, and our own souls urge us on to do or die. And shall all these petitions be in vain? shall we enroll ourselves among the sluggards, or join the noble army of workers? It may cost us self-denial, indomitable energy and courage; nevertheless, let us "Work while the day lasts, for the night of death cometh, wherein no man can work."

FOR YOUNG MEN.

JAMES PARTON, the noted author, in an article on Charles Browne (Artemus Ward), closes thus, and he gives good advice to young men:

"I thought I ought not to conclude this article without letting the reader know why this bright and genial spirit is no longer here to add to the world's amusement. Well, this was the reason: Wherever he lectured, whether in New England, California, or London, there was sure to be a knot of young fellows to gather around him, and go home with him to his hotel, order supper, and spend half the night in telling stories and singing songs. To any man this will be fatal in time; but when the nightly carouse follows an evening's performance before an audience, and if succeeded by a railway journey the next day, the waste of vitality is fearfully rapid. Five years of such a life finished poor Charles Browne. He died in London in 1867, aged thirty-three years, and he now lies buried at the home of his childhood, in Maine.

"He was not a deep drinker. He was not a man of strong appetites. It was the nights wasted in conviviality which his system needed for sleep, that sent him to his grave forty years before his time. For men of his profession and character, for all editors, literary men and artists there is only one safety, teetotalism. He should have taken the advice of the stage-driver on the plains, to whom he offered some whisky; and I commend it strongly to the countless hosts who see this paper every week:

"I don't drink—I won't drink! And I don't like to see anybody else drink. I'm of the opinion of those mountaineers—keep your top cool! They've got snow, and I've got brains—that's all the difference."

If you would add lustre to your accomplishments, study a modest behavior. To excel in anything valuable is great; but to be above conceit on account of one's accomplishments is greater. Consider, if you have natural gifts, you owe them to a Divine bounty. If you have improved your understanding and studied virtue, you have only done your duty, and there seems little reason for vanity.

THE MILL AND THE TAVERN.

BY. T. S. ARTHUR.

"T my oldest son, Richard, the tavern-stand known as the 'Red Lion,' and twenty acres of ground attached thereto; and to my other son, Jacob, the grist-mill on Dart Creek, and the residue of my landed property."

So the will read. A deep silence, and then a single word of dissatisfaction. It came from Jacob, the youngest son of the deceased Richard Cragan. His brother looked up with a troubled expression on his face, and their eyes met.

"The will is not to your mind," Richard said, gravely, but kindly.

"No, it is not," answered Jacob, with a hardness in singular contrast with his brother's subdued and gentle manner.

"You prefer the tavern-stand?"

"Of course I would," rejoined the brother.

"And I would prefer the mill. So all can be satisfactorily adjusted," replied Richard, in a frank and cheerful way.

Jacob's face was not the only one that showed surprise. But as none present had a right to question Richard's decision, there was no remonstrance or deprecatory remark.

"Well, you are a precious fool!" said Harry Glenn, in an angry voice, on meeting Richard Cragan next day; "and, if Katy follows my advice, she'll give you the mitten."

"What do you mean?" asked Richard, showing some resentment at this rude assault.

"Just what I say. Didn't your father leave you the 'Red Lion' tavern-stand?"

"Yes."

"And you've given it to Jacob for that miserable old grist-mill, on Dart Creek?"

"Yes."

"Humph!"—contemptuously—"I knew you were not remarkable for wit, but did not imagine you were such a cursed fool as you are. Why, the tavern stand is worth forty times as much as the grist-mill."

"Maybe so, and maybe not," replied Richard, with a flash in his eyes that was unusual to their blue tranquility; "time will show. As for me, I am satisfied; and no one has a right to question any decision I may choose to make touching my own affairs."

"I have a right," said Glenn, with something offensive in his voice, "as the brother of Katy—"

"Stop there, Harry!" interposed Richard, in a voice stern and indignant, that Glenn moved back a step or two in surprise. "I never permit any one to meddle in my affairs, and you cannot be made an exception. Katy has cast her lot with mine, and her happiness is in my keeping, not in yours."

"Not quite cast in yet," muttered Harry Glenn, as he stepped away from Richard, whose ear caught the muttering. Its meaning he well understood.

On the evening of the same day Richard met Katy Glenn, and noticed, with a sudden chilliness about his heart, a change in her manner. She was very different to him. He had loved her ever since he was a boy—loved her with a steadiness that no coldness on her part, no flirting with other boys, or, as the years went on, other young men, could diminish. She was pretty, but wayward—the very opposite of Richard Cragan, who was so quiet, reserved, and true of purpose. After a long series of tender vicissitudes, of pains and discouragements, of hopes and fears, Richard at last had the ineffable happiness of giving her the kiss of betrothment. This happened only a short time before his father's death.

A cloud that looked no larger than a man's hand at first now appeared in his sky. But it grew rapidly, and in a little while filled the whole horizon, obscuring the sun.

"Is this true that I hear?" said Katy.

"What?" asked Richard, his heart falling like lead, for he understood what she meant.

"That you have given Jacob the handsome tavern-stand your father left you, and taken that old grist-mill, and a few acres of poor land, for your share."

"It is true," answered Richard.

"What could have possessed you to do this?" said the maiden, all the beauty in her face dying out under the hot flushes of a selfish indignation.

"Because I would rather have the mill, and earn my bread by useful work, than burden my heart and life with evils that are inseparable from tavern-keeping."

"Pshaw!" ejaculated Katy, in no amiable tone. "As good men as you have kept, and still keep tavern. Are you better than your father?"

"I don't set up as being better than any one, Katy," replied the young man, whose face had become very pale; "I only determine for myself what I ought, or ought not to do. If I had not let my brother take the 'Red Lion,' it would have made no difference as to my own future—I should have sold it, and put the money into a farm, or something else by which I could make a living."

Katy bit her lips, and looked angry and disappointed.

"I will never consent," he resumed, "to bring up a family amid the baleful associations of a tavern. There are only two of us left out of six brothers. Four of them died years ago—and it is better that they died. Oh, Katy! try to think and feel as I do. The mill has a good run of custom. I shall improve it in many ways, and double its capacity. We shall get along well—trust me for that, and be, oh, so much happier! As for me, I should have a restless, miserable, guilty feeling all the time if I kept a tavern, and sold drink to the young men of our place—hurting all, and doing good to none."

And he shuddered at the bare thought of such responsibility.

"As you like," answered Katy, in a chilling voice. "But, one thing is certain, I'm not going to be cooped up in the little pigeon house over at the mill, you may count on that as settled."

"I will have it done up new all over, and make it the nicest place in the world," said Richard.

"But you'll never put me into it," cried Katy, with a sudden passion in her voice.

"You are surely not in earnest, Katy," remonstrated Richard.

"I surely am," she replied, tossing her head in a way that hurt and amazed the bewildered young man.

Richard Cragan sat silent and still for a long time. Then, rising slowly, and with a quiver of pain running over his pale face, he put out his hand to Katy. She let hers fall into his coldly, not returning by the slightest motion the pressure he gave.

"Good-night, Katy!"

The girl would never have known the voice as that of her lover.

"Good-night!" Not a pulse of feeling beat in her tones.

Richard turned slowly away, and left the house—but all the while, as he went farther and farther from her, his ear hearkened for her voice breaking out into a repentant cry, but hearkened in vain!

It was all over with Richard and Katy. The selfish, fickle and worldly-minded girl, who was incapable of such a love as glowed in the heart of this young man, broke off her engagement, and in less than a year became the wife of his brother Jacob, who installed her as mistress of the "Red Lion," which had been fitted up in the most attractive style, and was known as the best tavern for miles around. The custom had more than doubled since Jacob became "mine host," and the new owner was beginning to reap an abundant harvest of profit.

Katy had her horse and carriage, her fine clothes, her personal ease and comfort; pride and vanity were gratified in many ways. Yet she was not so happy as she had expected to be. Jacob was a different man from Richard. He was harder, more selfish, less scrupulous—and had little hesitation about trampling down with a ruthless foot whatever came in the way of his purposes. He had no tenderness toward his wife, and never seemed to regard her feelings, comforts, or wishes in what he did. Not that he was unkind to her—only indifferent. There were no little confidences between them—no concessions on his part to her wishes and comforts, but a silent self-assertion that left her wholly out of his business affairs, while in all that concerned her personally he seemed to feel little or no interest.

No, Katy was not happy. Far from it. And as the years went past, the desire of her heart was less and less satisfied.

Richard Cragan took possession of his mill, and began refitting, improving, and setting things in order. All the light of his life seemed for awhile to have gone out. But his work kept him up. There were not many in the neighborhood who did not call him a fool. But, in his own mind, he never doubted or repented.

"Better so," he would often say to himself, "than bear the responsibility of all that"—meaning the tavern. "I take no man's money without giving him what is good in return. My work will not come back to curse me in after years. No father or mother can ever say to me, 'Where is my boy?—my poor, lost boy, that was led astray in your bar-room?' No—no—no! I will give the people bread, not a poison to consume body and soul."

The years went on. Jacob Cragan grew rich; but, alas! how many became poor and miserable that he might abound in wealth. Richard had no ambition beyond his mill, and the thirty or forty acres of land attached thereto. His first work had been to put it in good order, and year after year he made one improvement after another, until he had the finest mill in all that region, and as much custom as he could possibly attend to.

The miller did not marry. Katy had been his first and only love; his heart never opened to another. Year after year he grew better off; but not with the rapid increase that marked the fortunes of his brother.

But there came a time when things began to change—when the owner of the "Red Lion" grew less attentive to business, and more given to sporting, and the company of sporting-men. A good customer at his own bar, the evil of his work cursed him as well as others. His feet drew near to the pit he had digged for other men, and the edge was crumbling away from them.

"The 'Red Lion' is not what it used to be," said one and another of its old customers.

"Jacob is going to the dogs, I'm afraid," was heard now and then, half confidentially.

One day, more than twelve years after Richard and Katy parted company, the former, while standing at his mill door, was surprised to see his brother's wife coming down the road. She was alone.

"Why, Katy!" he said, going out to meet her, "what has brought you away down here?"

As he looked into her face, he saw that it was full of trouble. "Is anything wrong?" he added.

"Yes, everything is wrong," she replied, her voice choking with the sentence, "and I want to talk to you."

Richard's bachelor home stood close by the mill, and he went in with Katy.

"What is it?" he asked, with kindly interest.

"Oh, Richard!" She choked, and sobbed, and then, controlling herself, went on: "Oh, Richard! I am almost heart-broken. Things are going to rack and ruin; and if there isn't some change, we'll not have a house over our heads in a year."

"Which may be the best thing that can happen," replied Richard. "A tavern is a curse to all who have anything to do with it, and the sooner you and your children are out of it, the better."

Katy covered her face, sobbing and crying in a weak, despairing way.

"I wish you would talk to Jacob," she said, after a few moments, looking at Richard with tearful, pleading eyes.

"I have talked to him again and again; but he only gets angry."

"Yes—yes—that's just it. I can't say a word without his flaring up, and—and—cursing me! Oh, Richard! It's dreadful how he goes on sometimes!"

"I know. Tavern-keeping has been his ruin; and I wish he were out of it—if it isn't too late."

"Too late!" The words sent a chill through Katy's heart.

"It isn't too late for your boys, if it is for their father," Richard added, in a softer voice.

"But what else can Jacob do?" asked Katy. "If we give up the tavern, we must starve."

"Not so bad as that," said Richard.

"He'll never turn his hand to anything else, you may be sure," replied Katy.

"Necessity drives men to doing a great many things."

"It may drive him to do worse than he is doing now," answered Katy. "He's in with a dreadful bad set of men—horse jockeys, and—and—gamblers, I'm afraid! Oh, dear! And I'm getting worried about Jimmy. He had trouble with the teacher, and has been home from school now for three weeks, and his father won't make him go back: says the teacher is a cross old hunk, and not fit for his place. And now he goes idling about, spending his time in the bar-room, or with the stable-boys. He'll go to ruin if something isn't done."

Richard looked very grave. There was so little in common between him and his brother, that they had been for a long time getting farther and farther apart, and now rarely met.

"The sooner this tavern-keeping is broken up, the better," he said, after a long silence. "I can't help you now, Katy. But when things come to the worst I'll do the best I can for you. If I had Jimmy all to myself, in the mill, I am sure I could make something out of him. But as things are, there's no use, talking about that, Jacob wouldn't give his consent."

Poor Katy went home but little comforted; and Richard had a weight of concern laid on his heart that was not to be shaken off.

Later in the day, Richard was surprised again this time by a visit from his brother, who had not been at the mill for over two years. Jacob wanted him to go on his note for three thousand dollars.

"I shall be sold out by the sheriff if you don't do it!" he said, after a hurried statement of his affairs and the pressing need for money that was upon him.

Richard was silent for a long time, trying to see what it was best for him to do.

"Let the tavern go, Jacob," he said, at length. "It has cursed you from the beginning, and will curse you tenfold in your boys, if you keep it. A sheriff's sale, if it must come to that, will, in my opinion, be the most fortunate thing that can happen to you. There are a hundred other ways to make a living. Let the tavern go, and then I will help you in every way that I can. But I should do wrong and hurt you and yours if I put a single dollar into that wretched, soul-killing concern."

Jacob started up, all on fire with anger. He shook his clenched fist in his brother's face, and cursed him for "a mean, selfish hound."

A sheriff's sale did not take place. But Jacob gave up his inheritance in a compromise with his sporting creditors—gamblers—and went off to a new place, two or three hundred miles distant, and set up another tavern, but in a style far below that in which he kept the "Red Lion."

Years passed, and no certain news from his brother and family came to Richard. Once or twice he wrote to him, but got no answer. A lonely man, working on steadily and patiently in his mill, the years crept over him, and vied with the dusty atmosphere in which he dwelt in sprinkling his hair with gray. He was spoken of far and near as the kind old man at the mill; and the gossips for once had the truth, when they told the story of his disappointed love, and the mistake of Katy.

Twenty years had gone by since Jacob Cragan sold out the "Red Lion," and moved away. One evening, late in November, Richard sat in his solitary home, while the wind and rain sobbed and sighed without, feeling more lonely and disquieted than was usual with him. His thoughts had all gone out of his control, back through more than thirty years, and the image of Katy, for whom a tender feeling had never died out of his heart—the image of Katy, in all the freshness and sweetness of girlhood—stood smiling and happy before him. He was stirred with feelings that he had believed dead and buried long ago. Then he thought of the fatal tavern which had been given up to his brother, and how it had blighted all their lives.

"If I had kept it and closed it," he said in a kind of bitter self-accusation, "it might have been so different!"

He started and listened. A voice had faintly touched his ear. He rose up, and moved toward the door. The voice came to him again, and then a low answering voice. He threw the door wide open, and let the light stream out. Then he saw two women, closely wrapped up, coming in from the road through his little gate.

"Richard! oh, Richard!" one of them cried faintly, and tried to hurry forward, but stumbled and fell on the wet ground. In an instant she was lifted in his strong arms and carried into the house.

The voice—how like the old voice that had been for all these years as the sound of music in his soul; but the face, when he looked into it, alas! how changed. Old, shrunken, faded—even haggard! What a wreck! What a transformation!

"I have come here to die, Richard. I have no right; but—"

Sobs choked the voice.

"Hush, Katy." Then, "Where is Jacob?"

"Dead."

"Dead?"

"Yes," in a steadier voice.

"How long since?"

"Not long: a month. This is Katy, my youngest child. You never saw her before."

Richard looked into the girl's face, as the light fell upon it, and trembled. He was back again through thirty years, and Katy, in the sweet May-time of life, stood before him!

"Dear child!" said the old man, as he took her hand and kissed it very tenderly.

The story that Richard heard that night was sad and sorrowful to the last degree. Both of his brother's sons grew up to be miserable drunkards, and died in the prime of manhood. His oldest daughter married their barkeeper, who broke her heart and then deserted her. She was dead. Three children were left, and were now with the husband's parents, who were low people, and not fit to have charge of them.

"There is room here for all," said Richard Cragan, when the sad history was told. He asked no particulars about his brother's life and death, and Katy did not intrude them.

A week later, and the last day of another mortal life was closed. Dark and stormy had been the years that preceded this dying day; but as the sun drew near the western hills, the clouds broke suddenly, and golden rays came flooding the earth and brightening all the air. All that Richard Cragan could do to soften the pillow on which lay dying his early and only love, was done.

"They shall be mine," he said. "Your Katy shall be my Katy; and the children out West shall be my children."

And smiling in gratitude and calm content, the woman died—died with a single, sweet draft from a cup that love had filled for her years and years ago but which she pushed aside for another that held only gall and wormwood.

Richard Cragan kept his word to the dying one. Katy's daughter and grandchildren were taken to his home. Their presence gave new life to the old mill, and a new grace and charm to his dwelling that filled his soul with a sweetness once dreamed of, but never tasted before.

It was a pleasant sight to see them all together, in the waning summer afternoons, gathered about the mill door, after the great wheel was still, and the air no longer jarred by the rumble of machinery. There was peace, and sweet content; and hope for the young lives over which, when their morning broke, dark clouds hung and threatened.

LORD, GIVE ME REST.

BY REBECCA RUTER SPRINGER.

LORD, give me rest. My soul is bowed and broken;
My heart is desolate and full of pain;
Its empty rooms—wherein no word is spoken—
Are like the chambers where the dead have lain.

Lord, send me rest. The clouds more thickly gather;
The skies above my head are leaden gray;
Oh, take me gently by the hand, my Father,
Until the darkness shall have passed away.

I dare not ask for earthly joy or blessing—
Do with me, Lord, in this as seemeth best—
I only pray, look on my grief, in passing,
And send unto my troubled spirit rest.

Lord, send me rest—I cry from out the shadows—
Rest in Thy love. Ah, shall I cry in vain?
And lo, like summer rain upon the meadows,
Peace drops into my weary life again.

AMERICAN FALLS.

BY C.

AMONG the many attractions that are presented to the traveller in America the different falls of water have been considered not the least interesting. The Falls of Niagara are celebrated in every part of the civilized world, as one of the grandest and the most sublime spectacles to be found in the universe. There can be no doubt that these falls were at one time lower down the river than they are at the present time; both reason and observation show that it must have been so. The rapidity with which the continual attrition of so large a body of water wears away the hardest rocks is evident, and may be seen in the changes which Niagara Falls exhibit both in form and position in the short time they have been under the observation of civilized beings. The falls could not have been further down the river than Queenstown, which is five miles, north of the falls, on the west bank of the Niagara River; because the elevation that occasions the falls begins there, and is called the mountain. The precipices which form the two sides of the river have a close resemblance to each other in form and outline, and the elevations exactly correspond. The wall-like appearance of the rocks on each side of the river is precisely the same at the falls as at the commencement of the chasm at Queenstown. As the present causes must continue to operate, the falls will probably reach Lake Erie, in a few centuries. From the remotest periods of the earth's physical history to the present time, the laws which govern inorganic matter have undergone no change, and those laws have produced the physical changes that have been going on through all time, these changes are under the influence of those immutable laws established by Divine Providence for the maintenance and renovation of the material universe.

Niagara Falls are the finest and most celebrated waterfalls in the known world, without question, yet, they have been so often described that any minute account of them would be undesirable to most readers. There are many other wonderful and beautiful falls, which cannot be here described.

Only as falls of a secondary character those of Montmorency will be noticed. The scenery around them is by no means as impressive as at Niagara, yet the true lover of nature—he who looks with the eye of an enthusiast upon the sublime and the beautiful, as it came from the hand of the Creator—can spend many an hour of pleasure and delight in watching the Montmorency, as it comes rushing and thundering down the steep precipice, sending forth its rainbows of light spray, in token of joy that the rough way is passed over, and that its waters may now roll on in peace and quiet. The Falls of Montmorency are on the river of the same name, six miles below Quebec. The river falls over a vast precipice; its breadth at the top of the cascade is about one hundred feet; its perpendicular descent is two hundred and forty feet. The banks on each side are smooth and precipitous, and crowned with trees.

INSUBORDINATION; OR, THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTERS.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

CHAPTER III.

A MATRIMONIAL SPECULATION.

"THE storm's pretty well over," said Ike, about a week afterward. "Who'd 'a' thought the passionate old rascal would have been cowed so easy."

"Tyrants are always cowards," said Tom. "Just make 'em lay aside their bluster, and all's safe."

"It's jubilee now, I s'pose," added Bill. "No more of his confounded weltings. Hurrah!—hurrah!—hurrah!" he continued in an animated voice, swinging a boot-lag about his head.

"Hush, Bill, the old fellow will hear you, and it's no use to provoke him without a cause. We are not altogether on dry land yet. A little false play may do the business for us."

"I'll fight till I die before I'll give in now," said Ike. "Still he's a fool to fight when he can have peace by being a little quiet, and lose nothing neither."

"It's my opinion," said Tom, "that the old man wa'n't so much to blame in calling you to account t'other morning. But then we'd resolved to snub him up the first time he went to cutting up any tantrums, and so it came all in good play."

"I've got it so often when I didn't deserve it, though," responded Ike, "that it's put the old Scratch into me. If our Old Harry-of-a-boss had treated us right all along, he'd had none of this work on his hands."

"That's true enough. He has no one to blame but himself. Tyrants make rebels. Boys know what's what as well as anybody."

"Humph! I reckon they do," added Bill. "Do you think Thompson's boys would ever raise on him? No indeed, he's a reasonable man, and treats 'em well."

"But he has one boy, though, you know," said Tom, "who hates him as he does a snake; and says he's a canting old hypocrite."

"Who's that—Abe Shriver?"

"Yes."

"We all know what he is. Didn't Mr. Thompson pick him up out of the gutter and make him all that he is? I hate an ungrateful fellow, and I hate Abe Shriver!"

"But he says Thompson is a hypocrite, Bill," continued Tom, "and that he cheats his customers every day, if he does have prayers night and morning."

"You don't believe him, though, do you?"

"Why shouldn't I believe him, Bill?"

"Why, just because Abe is a mean, low fellow, and had as lief tell a lie as the truth."

"How would you like to live with Parker down South Street, Bill?" said Tom, jumping to another subject.

"I wouldn't live with him, that's all."

"They say his boys have a pretty tough time of it."

"Yes. Harry Sands, who lives there, says that they're worked 'most to death, and half starved into the bargain. And I should think so, for they all look as yellow and lantern-jawed as bullfrogs. They are never allowed a bit of butter, and no bread for dinner. Mrs. Thompson cuts off for each boy one slice of meat at dinner-time, and then takes the dish off. Potatoes make up the bulk of the meal. They did get a pudding once, but Harry said their stomachs wa'n't used to it, and it made 'em all sick."

"I wonder they'll stand it."

"Boys'll stand a good deal sometimes to get their trades."

"But what I wonder at is," said Tom, "that boys, after they know their trades, will continue to submit to such treatment. I'd tramp in less than no time."

"Several have run away. But runaway apprentices rarely do well, and this fact is pretty generally known and talked about in shops."

"There's Wells, the tailor; a clever fellow to his boys, they say. If all I hear is true, I'd like to live with him," said Bill. "It does one good to look at his jolly, good-humored face."

"Tom Brown lives there, don't he?"

"Yes. Tom says he never flogged him in his life, though he's often deserved it. Once Tom stayed out all night, after Wells had positively forbidden him to do so. 'Where were you last night, Tom?' he asked, angrily, the next morning. 'I was at my aunt's,' said Tom. 'Haven't I positively forbidden you to stay out at night?' 'Yes, sir,' says Tom. 'Then what did you stay out for?' 'Because I wanted to,' replied the scamp. 'I'll break this up, I know,' says Wells; 'here, take this eleven-penny-bit and go and get me a cowhide. I'll teach you to mind me!' Tom went off and bought the cowhide, and brought it in with a demure countenance. His beeswax happened to be all out, and knowing his master's propensity to laugh at the ludicrous, he handed him the long, slender cowhide, saying at the same time very gravely and earnestly, 'Please, sir, to give me a tip to buy some wax.' Wells tried to keep in, but it was no use. He roared right out, and Tom escaped into the back shop with a whole skin."

"Wells is a prime chap, there's no doubt of that," said Ike. "Pd almost consent to be a tailor to live with him, much as I despise the pale-faced craft. No man with perfectly formed legs ever ought to be a tailor, that is my doctrine. It will do well enough for cripples and women."

"But they look upon us with contempt, and call us snobs," said Tom.

"Yes, and the chimney sweep despises the miller; but the world can see where the honor lies."

"There is something manly in our trade, any how," responded Tom, hammering his favorite tune of Yankee Doodle on the lapstone, and silencing all conversation for the next minute or two.

"You're right there, Tom," said Ike, as the noise subsided. "A bootmaker is as much above a stitcher as a merchant is above a cheesemonger."

"What do you think of Genevieve?" said Willis to Anderson, drawing his arm within that of the latter, as they left the residence of Mr. Hardamer, after spending from two to three hours there on the night the girls had been so distressingly annoyed by Ike's hammer and lapstone.

"She's rather tough to swallow, Willis; but then the old man's got the 'gooseberries,' and I'm terribly in want of money."

"Well, if you want her, stand up like a man, and she's yours."

"But how's the old chap? Is he at all come-at-able? Because, you see, Genevieve with the rhino and Genevieve without the rhino are not in my eyes one and the same person."

"I understand. But I don't know exactly about that matter. He's an industrious, hard-working old fellow, and I should judge that he would not look with very favorable eyes upon a young student of medicine, who may or may not graduate in the next twelve months, and then has no practice on which to support a wife."

"That does look a little blue; but then he needn't know all that. It's easy enough to talk of my father's splendid farm in Virginia, stocked with five hundred slaves, where we will go and live like a lord and lady."

"I guess he's too old a bird to be caught with chaff; still, the game's worth shooting at."

"I can bring down the game easily enough. But then I don't want an empty craw, you see; that's the big business."

"You'll have to feed Genevieve up, and trust to her stuffing the old man. She'll believe any story you can tell her."

"Yes, I see that. She almost coaxes me to deceive her. But, tell me, have you any notion of Geneva?"

"Not exactly."

"What takes you there, then?"

"To pass the time away, of course. I have twenty young ladies that I call on every month. I should be sorry if I was suspected of having a notion to all of them."

"What do you think the old fellow is worth, Willis?"

"That's more than I can tell, I'm sure."

"But, what do you think? I've heard his property estimated at a hundred thousand dollars. Do you think he is worth that much?"

"Hardly. And, even if he was, it wouldn't go far among six daughters."

"He hasn't that many, has he? I thought there were only three."

"Yes he has, though. There are three younger ones."

"Bless us! That alters the case. I've been calculating on a neat little plum valued at something like thirty thousand dollars. With that much I could afford to have the poetical Miss Genevieve quartered off upon me. But half that sum is too little."

"I've no idea that he's worth a hundred thousand dollars, myself," said Willis. "He may be, but I doubt it."

"What reason have you for doubting it?"

"No particular reason. It's only a notion of my own."

Anderson went home to his room that night, and found upon his table three letters, each containing an earnest demand for money. His pockets were empty; the small sum allowed him by his father for his incidental expenses having been all squandered away weeks before, nothing more he knew could be expected in that quarter before the usual period, for his father was a poor farmer in Virginia, who found it as much as he could do to meet the expenses of a large family at home, and spare from his slender income the sum of five hundred dollars a year, to carry his son through a course of medical studies in Baltimore. That son, as may be supposed, but poorly appreciated the sacrifice which a fond father made to give him an honorable start in the world. Already he had spent two years and a half in Baltimore, and in the ensuing winter he must offer for graduation. How little he had improved his time may be known from the fact that his preceptor had but a few weeks previous to his introduction to the reader, felt it his duty to admonish him in strong terms, and to represent it as being very doubtful whether he could get a diploma, unless he applied himself with vigorous attention for the next few months. His own case seemed to himself to be rather a hopeless one, in view of accumulated debts, and accumulated desires. And the only remedy he could hit upon was to marry a rich wife. He had tried for some time to get introductions to rich girls, but the few he had met seemed to take but little fancy to him, until accident threw him in the way of Miss Genevieve Hardamer. The usual question, "Is she rich?" always asked by him, on being introduced to a new face, having been answered by the pleasing information that her father was worth at least a hundred thousand dollars, he determined to follow up in the pursuit without delay. He was somewhat disappointed in the lady, and a little dampened in his ardor by the information that the interesting sisters were six in number. But, after reading over his duns, and reflecting seriously upon the prospect before him, he came to the conclusion that, as it was the first fair chance for a rich wife he had met with, he had better not let it slip.

On the third evening after his visit, he called a second time on Miss Genevieve, and, on leaving at eleven o'clock, proposed a walk with her on the next evening.

"I shall be most happy to walk out," she said, hardly able to keep down her exuberant feelings at the idea of having, at last, got a nice young fellow married.

Punctual to his engagement, Anderson called, and in a few minutes Genevieve's arm was trembling in his. They extended their walk, as it was a bright moonlight night, out Calvert Street to the Waterloo Row, and then crossed over into Belvidere Street, and out to the bridge. This was, at that time, a very fashionable evening walk, and hundreds strolled out every moonlight night.

Anderson modified his voice to the gentlest and softest tones, and talked of brooks and fountains and green meadows, until Genevieve's poor head was almost turned. He frequently alluded to his father's beautiful seat in Virginia, and spoke of it as a little paradise. His sisters, he said, were dear, good girls, and were all impatient for him to return home.

"How I should like to live in Virginia," said Genevieve, as Anderson dwelt upon the lovely spot he called his home. "I have always admired the Virginian character."

"They are a fine, frank, hospitable people. Somewhat proud, it is true. But, then, we have something to be proud of," said Anderson, elevating his head, and stepping forward with a bearing as dignified as he could assume.

"Virginia's a great ways off—more than a thousand miles, isn't it?" asked Genevieve.

"Oh, no. It's not a hundred miles to some parts of it. Our place is about two hundred miles from here."

"Is that all? La! I always thought it was such a distance! How long does it take to go there?"

"I can easily go home in a couple of days. You go down the Potomac River in the steamboat."

"Ah, indeed! Is the Potomac a river? Why I always thought it was a tavern. I heard father say once, when he went to Washington, that he stayed at the Potomac House."

"That tavern was called after the river. The Potomac is a splendid stream running into the Chesapeake Bay."

"I've often heard of this Chesapeake Bay; where is it, Mr. Anderson? But, perhaps I'm too inquisitive."

"Don't you really know where the Chesapeake Bay is, Miss Genevieve?" asked Anderson, in astonishment.

"Indeed, I do not, sir. I never was proficient in geography. It was such a dry study. I remember a little about the maps; and before I left school could easily find places, when our mistresses would point out on the edges of them the latitude and longitude. But I never could recollect much about it, except that Greenland and Lapland were in the North Pole; and that the Torrid Zone was situated in the Autumnal Equinox."

Anderson felt too solemn to laugh; for it was no pleasant discovery for him that the only being who was likely to make him a rich wife was, as near as could be, a fool.

He did not make any answer, and she ran on:

"Our teacher used to tell us that Italy was shaped like a boot, and I remember tracing the red and blue lines all around it with a pin one day; but I never could find it again, though I have often looked for it all over my old school atlas. Byron used to live in Italy. When I found that out, I was anxious to see it on the map. We were talking about Byron the other night. I've read the Bride of Abydos since I saw you. It is a glorious thing!"

"There is no doubt of that," said Anderson, pleased that Genevieve had so promptly read the poem after his recommendation.

"You said just now that you would like to live in Virginia," continued Anderson. "Were you really in earnest?"

"Indeed I was," she replied, trembling all over, and pressing closer to his side. "I've always had an idea that it was a delightful place. Pokerhontas, the Indian Queen, lived there once."

"How would you like to go there?" he said, acting upon a desperate resolution to bring matters to a speedy close.

"I should like it of all things in the world," replied Genevieve, fully understanding her part.

"If I were to ask you to go there with me, what would you say?" he continued, advancing a little nearer to the point.

"How should I go with you, Mr. Anderson? I don't understand you!" she said, in feigned surprise.

"Go as my wife, of course! You don't know how dear you are to me, Genevieve. I couldn't live without you. Since I first saw you, I haven't slept an hour at a time, and to-night I am determined to know my fate. Don't say no to my suit, or I shall die, dear Genevieve!" he continued, taking her hand.

"Have I anything to hope?"

"Oh, sir! Oh, sir! I shall faint! Who'd 'a' thought it? Don't let me fall!" ejaculated the astonished maiden, leaning her full weight against her enamored swain. "There! Let me sit down!" she continued in a faint voice.

It so happened that they were at the bridge when this scene occurred, and Anderson gently eased her down upon one of the stone elevations that rise at each end.

"Oh, dear!—oh, dear!" she continued to ejaculate, in an agitated manner. "It took me so suddenly!"

Gradually she recovered herself, and soon cast upon Anderson most loving glances.

"I have won the prize!" he said, pressing her hand to his heart, as his eyes caught the meaning looks.

"I loved you from the moment I first saw you," she said, more calmly; "but dared not hope it was returned."

"You are dear to me as the apple of my eye, and have been from the first," replied Anderson, in passionate tones.

But enough of this. That night, neither Genevieve nor her lover, as he had declared himself, slept much. She, from excess of delight, had no inclination to sleep, and he, from very different emotions, lay awake hour after hour. At times he repented of the rash step he had taken; but his embarrassed condition would then stare him in the face, and reconcile him to the revolting necessity. He could not conceal from himself that he had the most unconquerable aversion for Genevieve, but it was quite as apparent, that he had a tender regard for her father's money. But the old man could not fancy him, and when he asked for his daughter, gave him a peremptory denial. He had his own reasons for this. It was useless to talk to him of his rich father in Virginia. He knew too much about his unpaid tailor's and bootmaker's bills.

Presuming upon the forgiving disposition of all fathers, Anderson proposed an elopement, and in two or three weeks from the time old Hardamer had refused to give the hand of his daughter to a young, idle spendthrift, that daughter, who thought herself a little wiser than her father, took the responsibility of giving herself away.

Since her father's refusal to countenance the visits of Anderson, he had ceased coming to the house. But Genevieve had contrived to meet him at a friend's, and one night, at eleven o'clock, she failed to return home as usual. Her absence, up to that hour, was thought to be nothing remarkable, for all the girls were in the habit of running about with beaux, or visiting at the houses of acquaintances, until ten or eleven o'clock almost every night.

After sitting up until one o'clock for their sister, Gertrude and Genevra became alarmed on account of her absence, and awakened the old folks.

"Where can she be, Gertrude?" asked the mother with a strong expression of anxiety.

"Indeed, ma, I can't tell. She never stayed out so late before."

"Has she ever seen that graceless chap, Anderson, since I forbid him the house?" asked the father, abruptly.

"Yes, sir, I believe she has seen him pretty often since," said Genevra.

"Then the matter's explained!"

"What do you mean?" asked Mrs. Hardamer, in alarm.

"Why, it's as like as not she's run off with that idle student, she's fool enough!" replied Hardamer, angrily.

"It's impossible!" said the mother, bursting into tears.

"Don't believe the half of it! She's been crazy for a husband these five years, and has been ready, for some time, to take the first offer," responded Hardamer, bitterly. "If she really has married that fellow, though, she must not expect anything from me, for I shall have nothing to do with him or her either." And so saying, the incensed father retired to his room.

For an hour longer did the mother and the two daughters sit up, in the vain hope that Genevieve would return. As the clock struck two, they all retired with heavy hearts.

About ten o'clock on the next morning, a letter was brought to Hardamer, which, upon breaking open, he found to run thus:

"DEAR FATHER AND MOTHER:—Will you forgive your child for her first act of disobedience. Contrary to your wishes and commands, I have married Mr. Anderson. He is all you could desire in the husband of your daughter. Only consent to cheer us with your smiles and approval, and we shall be too happy. But if you will not forgive your child, she will never more know peace or contentment. I am at Mrs. —, and am trembling with anxiety to hear from you.

"Your affectionate child,

"GENEVIEVE."

"It's just as I suspected!" said Hardamer, entering the room in which his wife sat sewing. "The huzzy has married Anderson in spite of us!"

"You cannot be in earnest!" exclaimed the mother, dropping the work from her hands.

"Yes, but I am, though. Listen to this!" and he read her the letter he had just received from Genevieve.

"She's made her bed and she can lie in it, that's all!" said her mother, resuming the work that had fallen upon the floor.

"So say I! Let her eat the bread of her own baking!" and Hardamer turned away abruptly and entered the shop.

"Have you sent the letter yet?" said Anderson to his young wife, on the morning after the marriage.

"Yes, love, an hour ago."

"Ain't it strange that none of 'em have come yet."

"It takes the girls a good while to dress, and I suppose they're all coming along. They'll be here pretty soon, now."

"Do you think there's any danger of your father's being stiff about the matter?" he asked, in a tone indicating some concern.

"Oh, no, love, none in the least. He'll be quiet enough, now it's all over."

"I hope so."

"Never fear, I know him," said Genevieve.

Another hour passed, and yet there had been neither visit nor message.

"What can it mean, Genevieve?"

"I can't exactly understand it, love," she answered, her face indicating considerable anxiety.

"Perhaps your messenger did not deliver your letter to the right person. Suppose I call him up and question him."

The boy who was sent with the letter was now called and interrogated. He testified that he knew Mr. Hardamer very well by sight, and that he had placed the letter in his own hands.

"Surely they will not cast you off!" said Anderson, after the boy had retired.

"Impossible!" responded Genevieve, emphatically.

"What can it mean, then?"

"Indeed I don't know," said Genevieve, bursting into tears.

Anderson shook his head, and the young couple sat for ten minutes in moody silence.

"We've got each other, love," at length said the bride, looking up into the face of her husband, and twining an arm around his neck. "They can't rob us of each other, and we will be happy in spite of their cruel neglect."

This was a view of the case that was not at all flattering to Anderson. The more intimate had become his acquaintance with Genevieve, the more intolerable did she appear, viewed apart from the "gooseberries." He did not, for he could not, return her fond caresses, or respond to her affectionate expressions. This coldness, so unexpected, completely turned the current of the young bride's feelings, and she burst again into tears.

"You don't love me, I'm sure you don't," she said, laying her head upon his shoulder.

"You are dear to me as life!" he instantly replied, drawing his arm tightly around her, for he could not so suddenly give up the cherished idea of sharing with her a few of her father's hard-earned dollars.

"Then I am so happy!" she said, smiling through her tears.

A whole week passed, and not even an inquiry, so far as they could find out, had been made after them by any of Genevieve's family. Urged on by Anderson, she had written home three letters in the interval, but they all remained unanswered. At the end of that time, Genevieve, at the suggestion of her husband, determined to go home, and try to reconcile matters. The announcement in the newspapers of his having married old Hardamer's daughter brought down upon him all of his duns, who, from long fasting, had become as hungry and as importunate as wolves. This state of uncertainty, therefore, could not long be endured; more particularly, as his landlady had become a little pressing about her dues. Much against her will, for Genevieve was more incensed than troubled about the neglect of her parents and sisters, did she proceed, a week after her marriage, to her father's house. Her two grown-up sisters were, as usual, in the parlor, one reading a novel and the other thrumming the piano.

"Well, Genevieve?" drawled out Gertrude, not even rising. Genevieve did manage to come forward and offer her hand.

"Where's ma?" she asked, in considerable agitation.

"Gone to market," again drawled out Gertrude, turning over a music book, and resuming her pastime.

"Will she be home soon, Genevieve?" Genevieve ventured to ask, her eyes filling with tears.

"I expect she will; she's been gone a good while. What's you take off your bonnet?"

"No, I believe not. I can't stay long."

But few more words passed between the sisters for the next half hour, at the end of which time Mrs. Hardamer returned.

"Who sent for you, my lady?" was the salutation with which she met her daughter.

Genevieve looked at her for a moment, and, bursting into tears, arose and left the house, without the least effort being made to detain her.

"If ever I go back there I wish I may die!" she exclaimed, passionately, on entering the chamber, where sat, in all impatience, her expectant husband.

"What do you mean?" he asked in alarm, rising to his feet.

"I mean what I say! They didn't treat me like a human being, and I'll never go near 'em again!"

"Did you see the old man?"

"No, I did not."

"But, why didn't you see him?"

"Because there'd 'a' been no use in it!"

"But you don't know that. No man can be hard-hearted enough to turn away from his daughter when she asks for his forgiveness."

"I've nothing to ask his forgiveness for. Besides, you don't know him as I do. He's as stubborn as a mule when he once sets his head."

"But you never said this before! You always held out the idea that he'd be easily enough managed after it was all over."

"Well, suppose 'em I did. It was only to ease your mind on the score of the great sacrifice I was making."

"The deuce it was!" ejaculated Anderson, in undisguised astonishment.

Now this was too much for any young bride to bear, before the honeymoon was over, and she very naturally gave way to a flood of tears.

A weeping wife is never a very interesting sight to a husband, more especially if there is but a trifle of real love in the case; and this effusion of tears had but little effect upon the heart of Anderson, save to harden it toward her.

Rap, rap, rap, sounded on the door, and Anderson opened it with some misgivings.

"Mr. Wilson says, can you let him have that money to-day?" said a dirty little urchin, in a loud voice, pushing a bill at him.

"Tell Mr. Wilson to go to —!" replied Anderson, slamming the door in the boy's face, and retreating to a chair at the opposite side of the room from where his wife was sitting.

His words fell like ice upon the heart of Genevieve. A suspicion of the real truth flashed across her mind. Could it be possible that she had been deceived? But she dashed the dreadful thought from her mind.

After sitting for half an hour in silence, Anderson took his hat and left the house without saying a word. He felt completely caught in his own trap. If she brought nothing with her, what was he to do with a disagreeable wife—especially as he had not a single dollar in the world, and was over head and ears, as the saying is, in debt.

"A fine bit of work this, anyhow!" he muttered to himself, as he hurried along the street. "If that old rascal ain't brought to reason, I shall have to run away, or hang myself."

"Good-morning, Mr. Anderson! You are the very man I am looking for," said a well-known officer, smiling blandly as he addressed the young student.

"I can't say that I am much delighted at seeing you, then."

"That's hardly fair, Mr. Anderson. But, jesting aside. There's a little matter of yours down at Squire Miltenberger's that I wish you'd arrange some time to-day."

"Whose is it?"

"Old Lawson's, the bootmaker. He's a little impatient to share in your good fortune," replied the officer, smiling at his own humor.

"It's the last time I'll patronize the old scoundrel," said Anderson, in an offended tone. "But, never mind; I'll arrange it before night."

"Do, if you please," said the officer, bowing; and again Anderson was moving along with no companion but his own thoughts.

"A cursed fix I'm in, now, ain't I?" he said, half aloud. "A rich wife, and not a copper with her. But it's folly to despair yet. The old snob 'll come to, by and by; he's only acting a little stiff, to show off. He ought to be proud of the connection!" And the young man walked along with a dignified pace for the next half square, in the pride of self-consequence.

But Anderson was mistaken. Hardamer was so incensed at his daughter, and so displeased with all he could learn of Anderson, that he would take no notice of them.

After two months, during which time the young couple lived in open rupture, Anderson found it impossible longer to keep free from jail. Waiting just long enough to get his quarterly remittance of one hundred and twenty-five dollars from his father, who had been kept in ignorance of his marriage, he pocketed the money and left the city. He did not even leave a note behind for his wife.

A sad time, poor girl! had she of it afterward. On the third day after Anderson had failed to make his appearance, his wife received notice from her landlady to leave the house, as she could not afford to keep her any longer for nothing. This communication was made in no very choice terms, and wound up as follows:

"And, if you 'll take my advice, you 'll go home to your father, for not much good 'll ever come to you of living with Mr. Anderson, let me tell you that, even if he should show himself again—though I've no notion that ever he will!"

Genevieve burst into tears, and cried and sobbed as if her heart would break. This exhibition of distress touched, in some degree, the feelings of the landlady, and she said, with more kindness of manner: "I didn't mean to hurt your feelings, Mrs. Anderson—I wouldn't do that for the world. But I'm serious, when I tell you as a friend, that you would build on a vain hope if you calculated much upon a return of your husband. He's over head and ears in debt here, and has gone off, I have little doubt, to get clear of it."

"Don't talk to me in that way, madam! You cannot surely be in earnest? But even if he has gone home to Virginia, he will send for me directly."

"His father, if I am rightly informed," replied the landlady, "is a poor farmer, with a large family, who has stinted all the rest to make a doctor of this one. Having trifled with his father's kindness, and abused his confidence, he will hardly go back to him."

"Oh, ma'am! what you say cannot be true!" exclaimed Genevieve, the tears flowing afresh from her eyes.

"It is all too true, Mrs. Anderson, and sorry am I to have to tell you so. Anderson expected to get a fortune with you, but having been disappointed in this expectation, and being overwhelmed with debt, he has left you."

There was too much evidence in Genevieve's mind to enable her to reject fully her plain-spoken landlady's statement, and, overwhelmed at the idea of her situation, she covered her face with her hands, and rocking her body backward and forward, murmured: "What shall I do? What shall I do?"

"Go home at once to your father, Mrs. Anderson," said her landlady.

"But father won't see me, nor suffer me to come to the house."

"Then you are in a bad way, poor thing!"

"Mayn't I stay here a little while, ma'am?" she said, meekly, looking through her tears imploringly into the landlady's face.

The feelings of the latter, not usually very sensitive, were touched, and wiping the moisture from her eyes, she said: "Certainly, Mrs. Anderson, for a little while. But you know I can't afford to keep you long; and so you'd better make fair weather with your folks as quick as possible."

If there is anything of good remaining in the heart, circumstances of trial and affliction will develop it. It may lie hidden for years, like fire in the steel, but rough collision will reveal the spark. This is one of the uses of adversity:

"I have done wrong," said Mrs. Anderson to herself, after an hour's afflicting communion with her own thoughts. Now this simple conclusion and acknowledgment showed that beneath all the false pride and vain desires of Genevieve, there lay concealed something by which she might be elevated from an evil and a false into a good and true character. Had this shown itself under different circumstances, it might have been trampled upon and extinguished. But it had been kept concealed and protected until the right moment.

THE pure mind carries Heaven within itself, and manifests that Heaven to all around.

GEORGE ELIOT.

BY MRS. ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

EVERYBODY is reading "Middlemarch," and everybody presumably is interested to know something of its author. For, as has been well said, it is but her "second self" she shows us in her books; and behind that, one would fain catch a glimpse of the real woman. No other writer so constantly eludes us, and it is this very impersonality that gives to her works their dramatic force and truthfulness. She is like a calm and unprejudiced observer, equally interested with the reader in the fate of her characters, indicating and interpreting their actions and motives, but nowhere appearing to mould and direct them. And because of this reticence and absence of self-consciousness, we hardly think of George Eliot as a creature of flesh and blood like ourselves, but forget the woman in our admiration of the artist, teacher and philosopher. Other novelists put themselves tangibly between their pages, confide to us bits of personal experience, and make no secret of their likes or dislikes, preferences or prejudices. But she seems rather a transparent medium between her characters and us, and without any visible interposition on her part we are left to watch their unfolding and development.

George Eliot, like Mrs. Browning, is a refutation of the theory that intellectual women have dolts for husbands. She is married to a man well known in English literature, the biographer of Goethe and Robespierre—George Henry Lewes. Readers of Charlotte Brontë will remember her correspondence with him, and enthusiastic admiration of his talents. That these are of a varied order is sufficiently shown by the pursuits to which he has turned his attention, for he has written successively novels, dramas, histories and scientific treatises, and acquitted himself favorably in all.

He met George Eliot (Miss Marion Evans) at the house of Dr. Chapman, editor of the Westminster Review. A similarity of tastes drew them together, and that meeting was fraught with happy results. Rarely have two such highly gifted natures been joined in wedlock, and though the woman's is undoubtedly superior to the man's, their union is at once perfect and harmonious. Both are devoted to the study of science, philosophy and the languages, are passionately fond of music, and enjoy social pleasures intensely.

Mrs. Lewes herself, outside of her books, is a remarkable woman. She possesses a scientific knowledge, unequalled perhaps by that of any other novelist save Goethe; can converse with ease in several languages, and most brilliantly in her own; is a profound thinker, a poet of no mean order, and a musician whose extraordinary skill, when one remembers her other pursuits, may well excite wonder. But having bestowed upon her all these gifts, nature has denied her personal beauty, and her face, like Madame de Stael's, is homely and unattractive. We can fancy that to her friends it is lighted up and transfigured by the soul within.

Her first triumph, the publication of "Adam Bede," was not won until she had served a long apprenticeship to severe literary labor. Before that she had dived in German metaphysics, and written essays on abstruse topics for the Westminster Review, and at one time assisted in editing it. She had also made several translations, and one in particular of Feuerbach's "Essence of Christianity." But, strange to say, the only fiction she had hitherto attempted was a series of sketches, entitled, "Scenes of Clerical Life," contributed to Blackwood's Magazine; and though these attracted some attention at the time, and were greatly admired, they but faintly foreshadowed the greatness of what she afterward executed.

"Adam Bede," however, was a revelation, and raised George Eliot at once to the highest rank as a novelist. No other woman in England or this country approaches her in vigor of thought and conception, and where she is first few are second. Reade, Trollope and Collins may be more popular, but one would as soon think of comparing Shakspeare with the other dramatists of his age, as her works with theirs. English criticism even places her above Dickens, and though the echo of his name yet stirs us too powerfully to admit that, she is without doubt unexcelled by any living novelist, man or woman.

If we try to analyze her writings, and find out in what their power consists, we are struck at once with the variety of instruments she uses to rivet our attention and interest. She first creates a background for her figures, an English landscape, rich with local coloring, and then, as if unrolling a panorama, places before us the life of a whole neighborhood. Her chief personages are not thrust prominently forward, but are grouped with the minor ones as in actual life; and so effective are her touches, that we seem not only to have known these people, but to have read their very souls, and discerned the springs of their very thought and action. She goes straight down to the roots of human character, and brings us face to face with those great moral truths that press upon men's consciences, almost forcing us, as it were, to acknowledge their existence and necessity. Her men and women are psychological studies, whose lives and thoughts show the working of spiritual laws, and upon this our interest is made to centre rather than upon their happiness or unhappiness. Yet, although she thus places the moral relations between human beings higher than the social or intellectual ones, there is nothing didactic in her manner of doing it, and the truths she enforces are those our own lives teach when we recall their various events.

This, to our mind, is the crowning excellence of George Eliot's works. Other writers have created lifelike people, but she does something more, and we see the individual, influenced by personal desires and personal motives, yet bound by a tie he cannot break to the rest of humanity. Behind all her observation, pathos and humor, is a profound purpose, incorporating itself so easily and naturally with her work that we do not recognize its true significance until reflecting upon it afterward. Not that she seeks to mould our opinions in accordance with her own, but simply elucidates that individual life cannot be considered apart from that of the whole race, and that we are not only the heirs of the past, but the progenitors of the future. No mist blinds her clear vision; subtle distinctions between right and wrong are merged into definite lines: she sees and explains the varying relations between man and his fellow-men, and the duties that spring out of them. There is a death to her, not only of the body, but of the soul, and the last alone is pitiable and terrifying. She shows us the conflict between egoistic desires and that higher rule taught by the Divine Master, and points out the base paths into which a weak yielding to the former will lead. But, at the same time, she recognizes and depicts with terrible minuteness the agony of renouncing self when that renunciation involves our personal happiness. So strong is the struggle that goes on in Maggie Gulliver's soul between love and duty that we tremble at its intensity, and almost feel as if the sacrifice of one to the other were a wrong and cruelty. Why should she resign to Lucy what Lucy would never have given up to her? Why should the nature so fitted for passionate enjoyment be doomed forever to self-denial? Did not "natural law," as Stephen said, "surmount every other," and could they "help what it clashed with?" Stephen is blinded by passion, but Maggie's conscience makes her clear-sighted, and we feel the justice of her decision when she says: "I have tried to think it again and again; but I see, if we judged in that way, there would be a warrant for all treachery and cruelty. We should justify breaking the most sacred ties that can ever be formed on earth." Elsewhere we are told that the "higher life begins where we renounce our own will to bow before a divine law," and that is but a "poor sort of happiness that comes by caring very much about our own narrow pleasures."

Another quality of George Eliot's books is that broad-reaching sympathy which flows out toward all her characters, and gives us just and faithful portraits of the least as well as greatest. Dorotha and Lydgate are not more carefully drawn than Rosamond and Bulstrode, and with these figures stand out, more than a dozen others, part of the population of Middlemarch, clearly identified, and with an individuality as distinct and separate as those of the people we meet in actual life. No matter though some have natures that are dwarfed, or selfish, or stained with sin; they are all human, and she is careful to let us know whatever palliates their weakness, and not exaggerate either that or the virtues of others. We are made to realize Rosamond's littleness, and the effect it has upon Lydgate, but at the same time no touch of the author throws her character into greater relief than justice demands.

Such impartiality and insight into human nature are rarely found except in Shakspeare, and are the signs of a nature perfect and complete in every part. Dickens does not conceal his prejudices toward certain of his characters, and heightens their repulsiveness to an extent that is sometimes painful. In "The Old Curiosity Shop," the malevolence of Quilp is dwelt upon and intensified until even his grotesque humor cannot save us from a feeling of horror. It is demonic rather than human, and yet so powerful is the author's genius that Quilp lives for us as well as Nelly, even while we protest against the monstrosity of such a creation. The truth is, to read Dickens is to be permeated with his spirit, and see everything through his eyes rather than our own. But George Eliot affects us differently, and although we recognize the presence of a powerful intellect behind her creations, our judgment is not influenced thereby, and the criticisms we pass on her characters are like those given to everyday acquaintances. So it seems, at least, and yet few of us emulate her wide charity toward the faults and weaknesses of human nature. Dickens throws upon them the broad glare of his genius, and shows up their ludicrous aspects, and lets personal feeling color his descriptions; and in this we think sometimes offends against the canons of true art. George Eliot's manner is a marked contrast to his; the most vicious and foolish of her characters waken pity rather than hatred or ridicule, and her attitude toward them forever remains that of an impartial observer, unchanged by personal inclination or emotion.

But it is simply by way of illustration that we have alluded to these dissimilarities between her writings and those of Dickens, for the same rules of criticism hardly apply to both, and posterity alone can decide which is the greatest. That George Eliot's books will delight other ages than our own we feel assured, for not only are they founded upon truths as old as the world itself, but are illuminated by a sympathy for human nature and an understanding of its needs that the universal heart and conscience of mankind will forever recognize.

POWER OF GOOD HUMOR.—The effervescing, the overflowing, the irrepressible good humor of Franklin made a way for him wherever he went; in Christian America, in the halls of Congress, in infidel France, in the age of her disgraceful and inhuman and bloody revolution, Franklin was alike successful in carrying out his political purposes. What a life lights up in every eye, how instinctively a private company or a public crowd make a way for the man who is known to be full of fun, to be a jovial soul! But good nature has its foundation in good health, in an industrious, temperate life, with a loving heart at the bottom of it all.

JOHN JONES'S NEW LEAF.

BY ROSSELLA RICE.

IT was a dreary kitchen—the walls were dirty and smoky, the breakfast dishes stood on the table in the middle of the floor, the cooking-stove was open, with kettles and pans on it, and cold ashes on its hearth, its sooty plates awry, a pot of dishwater standing on top of the stove, and the broom and poker and tongs lay just where the little riders had left them when they were called to prepare for school. Johnny had gone off crying, and his whine could even then be heard coming up the hollow, in the direction of the school-house. The milk had not been strained, and the flies were buzzing about it as they sat on the edges of the two brimming pails, sipping and rubbing their hands together in a satisfied way. The baby was teething, and cross, and the one pair of hands that could have brought order out of this disorder were busy trying to soothe it.

Is it any wonder that tears were in the mother's eyes, as she cuddled her baby to her bosom, and walked across the floor trying to still its cries?

"Oh, dear, what a life!—what a life!" said she; "I try to be patient, and make the best of it, but it does seem so hard." Just as the babe was growing quiet, and its little blue hands had fallen listlessly upon its bosom, a shadow fell across the doorway, and the husband entered, saying, "Jane, can you tell me what the children did with the hatchet yesterday?"

"It was out on the rock, behind Johnny's wagon, last night," said she, speaking low, and gently laying the baby down in a bed that had not been made-up yet.

"Seems to me you're a good while gittin' your chores done; you haven't the knack of gittin' along like Mrs. Leavondyke—her work is done up long ago, an' she's busy in the garden. Tell you, she's a nice garden, don't look much like our'n; you don't put the time on our'n that she does in her'n."

"Oh, John," said the little woman, slipping back her sleeves and tying on a big apron, and trying to keep her face turned away to hide the gathering tears, "with four little children, and the baby sick, and three cows to milk and calves to feed, and hands to cook for, and all the other work to do, I only wonder that I get half my chores done in a whole day."

"Well, I'm sure I don't see how it is," said he; "my mother had ten living children, and she managed to get along first-rate, and do all our own weaving, besides taking in weaving for the neighbors. You have more room than she had, and you don't have to carry water forty rods, like she did—here it is, right at the foot of the hill; and you never have to cut your own firewood, unless it is in the midst of harvest, and I think you shouldn't complain. If there is anything I hate to hear, it is a growling, whining wife. Now, I have to be out o' doors all the time, no matter how the sun shines, or how cold the wind blows, while you are in the shade and comfortable—if you only knew it. Ah! you have an easy time of it, you women, if you only knew it; so, cheer up. I married you for a help-mate, don't you know. The girls will be big enough in three or four years to help you, and then you can take times easier, and maybe by that time the bottom farm will be paid for, and we'll be able to ride in a carriage, like the Leavondykes do.

"How long since you brought in this water?" said he, as he took a drink from the tin dipper, and finding it not fresh, he squirted it out coolly right on the floor among some pans that had slipped down off a shelf.

As he took the hatchet, and started out to the wagon to fix the hay-rigging on it, he said, "Jane, if you can as well as not, s'posin' you have some o' them new beans that grow in that fur lot for dinner."

"Well, I'll try," said she, hopelessly, as she slipped her shoes off so she might step softly and with more comfort. All we working-women know what a task it is to put a disordered kitchen into neatness, especially when little children have been about. First she strained the milk, saving out a quart, with which to mix the bread, for the yeast was set the night before, and had been bubbling two hours; she mixed it and set it in the warm sunshine, then started a fire and made feed of skim-milk and meal, for the noisy, frolicsome calves that ran in the door-yard. Then she swept and picked up playthings after the children, hung up their coats and aprons, and set their old shoes away, and moved their sleds and wagons and hoops from about the doors.

While the dishwater was heating she hurried upstairs and made the beds, then washed the dishes, and went down cellar and skimmed the milk. There was cream enough for a churning, and the churn was scalded, and then left with a pail of cold water standing in it, so as to be fresh and ready. By this time the baby woke and cried, and the tired little mother was compelled to sit down and take him in her sheltering arms.

In half an hour or so he was ready to sit down on the floor on a quilt, and she left him long enough to carry three or four pails of the skimmed milk to the pigs—two pailsful at a time, and she went on the run. She always fed the pigs; when she asked her husband once to carry the milk to the pen, on his way out to his work, he said, "That belongs to a woman's work; a man whose name is out for commissioner shouldn't be asked to slop the pigs—that's a little too steep."

It was no trifling job to feed those pigs; the pen had been made out of some old house logs, and the opening through which the pails had to be lifted before they could be emptied was so high up that it just came even with her neck, and was only wide enough to admit the pail with the bail lying down. Twice, when she was dressed up clean, had the unsteadily poised pail tipped back and poured the contents upon her, from her neck even down to her little feet, drenched as by a waterspout.

Withal the little mother was quite patient, and almost every day could her untrained voice be heard, even down to the lower field and the school-house, singing: "A charge to keep I have;" or, "God moves in a mysterious way."

But before another year a change came. The strong, hard man, her husband, was stricken down with typhoid fever, and for long, weary weeks he lay balancing between life and death. His recovery was very slow, and his confinement irksome; no prison walls could have been gloomier than were the home-walls that held him a prisoner. Day after day the ceaseless patter of his wife's patient little feet fell upon his ear; he could hear them up-stairs and down, now here, now there, her voice always kind and tender, her hand ever ready to minister to her dear ones, her words full of consolation, and love, and cheer.

John Jones was not wholly unimpressible; slowly the scales fell from his eyes, the light came, and he was as one born into a higher and a better life. He drew his bony hand across his eyes, often the sobs made him catch his breath suspiciously, and he marvelled much that he had walked beside this little woman for years and not known that he was mated with an "angel unaware." His voice grew softer, tenderer, his great talony hands touched her forehead and her hair lovingly, as would a woman's—touched her as though he was afraid she would fade away into a white mist.

Weeks afterward, when he was able to ride out, the old whimsical buggy that had done good service in the days of his church-going parents, was made comfortable by a soft woollen blanket and an armful of sweet-smelling oat straw. John didn't tell where he was going, but he looked wise, and his mouth had a perky look about the corners that seemed to say: "Just le' me alone; I know what I'm about!"

It was evening when he came home. He was still wise as when he went away. His cup of hot tea was waiting, and his toast, and the tender little pullet fried nice and brown. He seemed really happy—jolly. He trotted the baby on his foot that night, and he called his wife "Jenny," as in the days when he won her, and he let Johnny play horse with his boots, and there was such a contented, rich-man expression on his face that his wife couldn't help wondering what had made such a change in him.

The next morning the crazy old rig was called out again, and the soft blanket spread in it, and John Jones took the lines in his emaciated hands and drove off in the same direction as he did the day before.

When he returned, he was accompanied by a broad-shouldered, good-looking German girl, whom he introduced to his wife as "our girl."

She looked with amazement upon "our girl," and then stared at John. He soon explained things to her satisfaction.

"The upshot o' the matter is, Jane, that I've 'bused you long enough; the Lord helpin' me, I'll never see you make a drudge o' yourself ag'in. It's a burnin' shame for any great lout like me to expect a frail little body like you to be man, an' boy, an' dog, an' wife, an' mother, an' nigger, an' me a savin' an' a hoardin' up money and means to leave to the Lord only knows who. I beg your pardin, Jane; and now you'll tell this girl, Barbara Groetz, how you want things done, an' let her take your place an' work in your stid, an' you'll live hereafter like a human man's wife ort to."

By the time his speech was made, the poor weak fellow was blubbering like a whale.

Poor little surprised wife! She flew to his neck and laid her head on his bosom and cried like a baby, as she said: "John Jones! you old darling!"

"No, not a bit of a darlin'; just an old bear, a reg'lar old heathen, to sacrifice the best little woman under the sun, inch by inch, this way that's been a-goin' on for years an' years," snuffled he, as he fumbled over her face in an aimless, loving way.

Then "our girl," Barbara, went into Jane Jones's harness, and it fitted her to a fraction.

"Now we've turned over a new leaf, go and dress up, Jenny, bless you!" said the new convert.

So, with the memory of lang syne warming her heart, Jane unearthed her wedding dress in the afternoon, and put it on with a pretty old-fashioned collar, and brushed out her nut-brown hair that once upon a time curled beautifully. Perhaps she felt foolish and girlish and out of her sphere, but she looked sweet enough to make up for all discrepancies.

She sat sewing, putting a new band on Ruby's white skirt, when the children came home from school. Her back was toward the door. Tom came to a dead halt as he stepped on the sill, and then ran round to the lean-to to find his mother. No mother there, but the smiling, pinky-faced German girl, who was paring potatoes to bake for supper.

Tom bawled out: "Is mother dead? Oh, I want my mother!" and circled round the house and peeped in shyly with wet eyes.

Was that lady in a soft gray merino dress, wearing an embroidered collar and gold ear-drops, his mother? That pretty woman! Surely it was, for Nettie was feeling of her face, and was sparkling all over and saying: "Is this you, mother? Why where have you been?"

"Oh, ma!" said Tom, holding her round the neck as though he thought she might flit away the next minute; "why where did you go, and when did you come back?"

Poor little ones, how proud they were of the household drudge in her new and beautiful transformation!

But this is not all. Before the first cold blast of winter came, steps were taken to save and lighten the labors of the feminine portion of the farmer's household. An addition was built to the house, new siding was put on and painted white. New windows were added, and green blinds, and spouting, and a big cistern close to the kitchen door, and a wide, long, roomy porch. Closets were put in all the rooms; the old verminy bedsteads split up and used for kindlings; new chairs were bought, including a new rocking and a sewing-chair for mother; a new sewing machine, that was a love of a friend; the door-yard was paved in, and the calves and colts kept where they belonged; and evergreen trees, and flowering shrubbery, and rose-bushes, made beautiful the new yard. An easy chain-pump took the place of the old moss-covered bucket that held as much as a churn. It was packed off to the barn to put clover-seed in, and the heavy windlass was borne away forever from the little arms that had tugged at its ponderous weight with a sick weariness many and many a year. The big well-rope made a nice swing out under the oaks for Tom and Belle and chubby Harry.

Now that the no longer enslaved mother has leisure to mingle with her growing children as teacher, and companion, and friend, they grow more lovable and intelligent, and they cling to her like vines. They see so much in her to admire and emulate.

And John Jones? That spell of fever was the Aaron's rod that smote the rock of his soul and opened it for the outgushing of love, and sympathy, and charity, and all the virtues and charms and graces of the human heart; and to-day, growing broader, and ruddier, and riper, and better, there lives no happier farmer than dear old renovated John Jones.

IT IS DARK.

THERE come seasons of darkness in all our lives—times when there are neither sun, nor moon, nor stars in the sky, and we stand still in fear, or grope trembling.

A few years ago there fell upon my life one of these seasons, in which I could see neither to the right nor the left. A terror of darkness was upon me.

One night I lay awake, thinking, thinking, until my brain grew wild with uncertainty. I could not see a step in advance, and feared to moved onward, lest, with the next footfall, I should plunge into hopeless ruin. Very strongly was I tempted to turn aside from the way in which I was going—a way reason and conscience approved as right—but something held me back. Again and again I took up and considered the difficulties of my situation, looking to the right hand and the left for ways of extrication; now inclining to go in this direction, and now in that; yet always held away from resolve by inner convictions of right and duty that grew clear at the moment when I was ready to give up my hold on integrity.

So the hours went, heavy-footed, until past midnight. My little daughter was sleeping in the crib beside my bed. But now she began to move uneasily, and presently her timid voice broke faintly on the still air.

"Papa! papa!" she called.

"What is it, darling?" I asked.

"Oh, papa, it is dark! Take Nellie's hand!"

I reached out my hand, and took her tiny one in my own, clasping it firmly. A sigh of relief came up from her little heart. All her loneliness and fear were gone, and in a few moments she was soundly asleep again.

"Oh, my Father in Heaven!" I cried, in a sudden, almost wild, outburst of feeling, "it is dark—very dark. Take my hand!"

A great peace fell upon me. The terror of darkness was gone. "Keep hold of my hand, O my Father!" I prayed fervently; "and though I should be called to walk through the valley and the shadow of death, I will fear no evil." Let not my feet wander to the right or to the left."

Sleep fell softly on my eyelids, and morning broke with scarce a seeming interval of time.

I felt calm and strong. The day was to be one of severe trial. Dark uncertainty rested over it. But I was resolved to walk steadily through its trials and its pains, holding tightly the hand of my Father.

Oh! is not the Lord better to us, if we will trust Him, than all our fears? There came fierce assaults upon my integrity. I was lured by golden promises; I was threatened with disaster and disgrace. But my hand lay in the firm clasp of one who sticketh closer than a brother, and who is strong to save.

In my rectitude I found safety. Had I swerved, I would have gone down to hopeless ruin. Even my tempters, who had hoped to gain through my defection from honor, bore witness to my integrity. And now, having escaped the perils of this difficulty and dangerous pass, peace, prosperity and honor opened on my view. But the highest and dearest of all my possessions is mine integrity, which, but for the hand of my Father, grasped in darkness, I should have lost.

THERE is much good sense and truth in the remark of a modern author, that no man ever prospered in the world without the co-operation of his wife. If she unites in mutual endeavors, or rewards his labor with an endearing smile, with what confidence will he resort to his merchandise, or his farm; fly over lands, sail over seas, meet difficulty, or encounter danger, if he only knows that he is not spending his strength in vain, but that his labor will be rewarded by the sweets of home! Solitude and disappointment enter the history of every man's life; and he is but half provided for his voyage who finds but an associate for his happy hours.

THERE is an elasticity in the human mind capable of bearing much, but which will not show itself until a certain weight be put upon it; its powers may be compared to vehicles whose springs are so contrived that they get on smoothly enough when loaded, but jolt when they have nothing to bear.

CROOKED PLACES.

A STORY OF STRUGGLES AND HOPES.

BY EDWARD GARRETT,

Author of "Occupations of a Retired Life," "Premiums Paid to Experience," etc.

CHAPTER VI.

"THE HACKNEY MERCURY."

THE death of the head of a family generally brings many changes with it. It could not fail to do so in Mr. Maxwell's case.

There was no will, and David knew he had no right to anything. His father's private income had all been derived from funded property of increasing value. Mrs. Maxwell would take her widow's moiety, and the rest would go to the next of kin, the surgeon's only nephew, who had never even been seen at Blenheim House. David would scarcely have wished it otherwise, nay, would positively have rejoiced in it, but for the actual pinch of necessity. There are certain ties of life which seem to pollute and corrode any gold that passes over them. And though David had loved his father in a way, and would have taken any kindness from him in life when it might have savored of a personal affection, in his heart he rather preferred the plain legal cutting off of a legally nameless child, to any subterfuge.

Mrs. Maxwell promptly announced her intention to leave Hackney instantly, and go into apartments at some watering place, until she had time to secure a suitable permanent residence. She had secret visions of visiting and visited dowerhood, wholly free from the cloud that had hung over her in Hackney. Mrs. Maxwell was so densely ignorant as to think nothing of her own defective grammar, or even to suspect that her manners were coarse and ungainly. Everything would be well so long as her dress was rich, her apartments spacious and her table good. She judged thus in unsuspicious vulgarity. Other people might have confirmed her judgment in worldly cynicism.

On the very early date when she left Blenheim House "for good and all in every way," as she elegantly expressed it, David received a letter from the next of kin. It was couched in very courteous terms, asking him as a special favor to retain possession and keep everything going as usual until this unknown relative could himself appear upon the scene and wind up matters.

David was not ungrateful for this breathing time, for his future course was sufficiently indeterminate. His medical studies had proceeded so far as to render their completion desirable, and it seemed to David that his best plan was to offer his services to the parish doctor until such time as he could pass his examinations, since he believed he could make himself quite useful enough to deserve some salary in the meantime. He had a very natural desire to have arranged his future before his father's relation arrived. Phoebe's future he carried with his own, in his mental eye. He had never sought further to probe the mystery about her. It was connected wholly with his father, and he had in remembrance his father's dying encomium, and knew the surgeon well enough to have full faith in it. David would have been glad to receive Phoebe's confidence, yet he would not ask it. But he was determined to provide for her to the very best of his power. She had, indeed, been more than a faithful servant to him, and he was resolved to do his utmost for her, to keep her with him all through, if possible; if not, to aid her as much as he could at present, and hasten to bring about a speedy re-union. He did not hesitate in bringing this tie upon himself, nor forecast that there might come a time when he should have other uses for the income that must certainly be very narrow for a long time. David's was one of those simple, straight minds which, beneath the scriptural warning, "Sufficient unto the day is the trouble thereof," reads a command, "Sufficient unto the day is the duty thereof."

With quick tact he felt that Phoebe must be anxious about many things of which she would be too reserved and delicate-minded to speak. For with all her homely bluntness, Phoebe was a woman of many fine perceptions, and nobody knew it better than he who was almost her foster-child. It was not lost upon him that the moment he became the apparent head of the household, Phoebe prefaced her old nurse-like "David," or "Davie," by the title of "Mr." He was made owner of nothing else, neither acre nor coffer, but to that one plain, faithful woman, he had become "master."

So, in pursuance of his desire to set her heart at rest as much as possible, he announced to her: "I am going to call on the doctor, Phoebe, to see if he will take me into his surgery until I can set up for myself. Perhaps he will give me a salary to live out of his house, and then we must manage so that you can be my housekeeper. I know you are not particular about doing any sort of work that may come to hand, and I should prefer one kind woman overlooker all to myself to paying heavily for part shares in faithless landladies, laundresses and needlewomen. It would not only be happier for me, but really cheaper, I think, Phoebe."

"No, it wouldn't, tho' I've got clothes for two or three years, and needn't take any wage, and can live on taters, as I used to, once't before. Why can't you speak truth, Mr. David, and say you're doin' it out o' kindness to me?"

David laughed. "Kindness to myself," he said. "If you will have it that it is dearer, be it so, but what should I have to give elsewhere for the same article? What is the market value of care and kindness like yours? Can a king's revenue buy them? So, when I have the chance of them, I think they are dirt-cheap, even if they do cost an extra shilling or two. Why, I set such store by them, Phœbe, that if the doctor wants me to live in his house, I was going to get you to take a little retaining salary, so as to be ready to come back to me whenever I want you."

"I'll be that without taking a wage for it," returned Phœbe, with a toss of her head. "Trust me. Bless us, if it wasn't for the look o' the thing, I'd be your housekeeper, and keep myself, and bring home money into the bargain. It's made my fingers itch to hear what women get a-washing and charring. There's a poor fal-de-ral of a thing down the lane that gets three shillings a week for dusting out an office before eight in the morning, and cleaning the door-steps o' Saturdays. And don't do it, either. For I troubled myself to walk past one Saturday night, and I'd ha' been ashamed o' them steps, and couldn't ha' gone to church on Sunday wi' such allobbered work on my mind. I ain't going to take your money to live idle away from ye, Mr. David. And I'll never engage myself for more than a day, wi'out telling the folks that I may have to go off without notice if my old master wants me."

"I think there'll be no need for that, Phœbe," David answered, and then he went off, to call upon the doctor.

That gentleman received him kindly enough till he knew his errand, and then he grew cool, except in eager reiteration of his belief, that he believed his visitor to be personally all that he should desire either as assistant, colleague, or housemate. And though the good doctor did not intend it, there was an emphasis on the word "personally" which gave David an insight into his real meaning, and prevented him from seeking any detailed explanation, when the doctor went on to repeat "that though personally you are all that I could desire, and though for some reasons such an union of our forces might be highly desirable to both, still—there are—other considerations—certain drawbacks—things that cannot enter into any agreement."

The worthy man could have thanked David heartily when he put him out of his misery by courteously acknowledging the civility with which he had received his unwelcome overtures, and then rising and taking his departure.

The doctor meant what he said when he followed him to the door, and shaking hands with him twice, begged him "to let him know if he could serve him in any other way. He should be only too delighted—in any other way."

David understood, and yet he did not understand. As we have said before, from the inside and from the outside, things show differently. He knew his dead father was as far removed from what a doctor should be as he was from true Christian manhood, which, in fact, must be the foundation and finishing of all technical excellencies. But David knew that his own ideal was founded on standards which the world in general ignored. He believed that all professional etiquettes and prerogatives should be so permeated by Christianity that no lawyer should accept a client, unless assured that he had true and sufficient legal or moral claims for plaint or defence, and should find his sweetest professional success in the weight which such a man's name would presently carry with it. And that a medical man should be as severe and as curt to the criminal or imaginary diseases of his rich patients as he would to those of his poor ones, and as gentle and patient to the really suffering and dying poor as to the afflicted millionaire. But just as David knew that many lawyers were honored and prosperous in the worldly, mainly just because they could successfully make the worse appear the better cause, and show trophies of doubtful titles established, and criminals set scot free, so he knew that many a medical name stood high and fashionable, not only although he did not keep these ways, but partly, perhaps, because he did not! Whenever he had reasoned with his father on this or that grasping, selfish, or hoodwinking practice, his father, whether he yielded the point or not, had always proceeded to justify it by precedent, gilded by some name, often truly great in scientific skill, and in undeniable possession of the world's good opinion and respect. Therefore David had never supposed that his father stood condemned in the world's eyes save as an eccentric, coarse-mannered man, who failed to make the best of his talents either for himself or for it. Truly, David was never quite sure that he knew all, and Phœbe's speech to his father the night before his death, had changed his suspicions into certainty. Still, the style of Phœbe's hints, and, though inconsequently, the heat shown by Mrs. Maxwell, had led him to conclude that this something was a skeleton in the household rather than the surgery.

Therefore, though he felt that some cloud about his father overshadowed his prospects, he was mystified. He half shrank from any attempt to analyze it, and he walked moodily along, wondering, with the vagueness always attendant upon a new groove of thought, into whatever channels besides medicine he could possibly turn his knowledge of chemistry and anatomy. The former was his favorite, and this instantly struck him as fortunate, being the more adaptable of the two. He knew that the world was all before him, but dismissed that thought in an instant. There were three reasons why he should remain in Hackney. They must be written down in succession, but it need not, therefore, be inferred that they presented themselves so to David. He might have seemed more heroic if they had, but, in fact, they all came together, shading into each other, so that it was hard to say where one ended and the other began. First, he would not wish to extort from ignorance a confidence which was not to be obtained from those who knew his antecedents. Second, a confidence that goes so cheaply is seldom worth having, and in his case could scarcely be procured without evasions stronger than silence. Third, a charmed link held him to Hackney; had it been stronger, it might have been elastic; as it was, the least strain would snap it at once, and forever. If he stayed where he was, he might in time become Millicent Harvey's friend, her second brother, a familiar face in whatever household she blessed with her presence.

David kept his castle-building within these modest limits, and yet somehow it brought the blood to his pale face, and it was still flushing there when the corner of a cross-road brought him face to face with Millicent herself.

She paused and greeted him; and then, as for some few hundred yards their ways lay in the same direction, they walked on side by side. They had not met since the evening of the Lauries' party before his father's death. And Milly wondered rather awkwardly what she ought to say, which wonder resulted simply in more emphatic inquiries after Mrs. Maxwell's health and whereabouts, and in an observation that her sister, Mrs. George Harvey, had been telling her husband that he should call at Blenheim House, but that George had said he feared it would be too early an intrusion.

"Tell your brother that I shall only be too happy and honored," David responded. His very earnestness gave a hesitation to his manner, and Milly scarcely thought he was sincere. After a few moments' silence, he asked whether she had seen Fergus Laurie lately.

"Oh, yes," she replied, "he was with us last evening. I am very busy—just as busy as I can be—for him!"

"Dear me, has the firm so much on hand?" David observed.

"No; I am working for him," and Milly became a little embarrassed. "I am working for him apart from the firm. Of course you know he is soon going to set up in business by himself. I thought you were sure to know. I thought you were the same as himself!"

"I did not know," said David. "I have not seen him much this last week or two. I knew he was very busy. You see there was no object in his telling me—dear me, and he is going into business by himself. Once he starts, Miss Harvey, he will be a great manufacturer. You can't think how clever he is, nor how generous!"

"I can fully believe it," Milly answered, and thought to herself, "Of course, Fergus did not tell him about his plans, because it would have seemed so heartless, when this one is so miserably circumstanced." For in course of conversation Fergus had imparted to Milly all that he knew, believed or imagined about the Maxwells. And then as they parted Milly said in her frank, off-hand way, "Tell Mr. Laurie that I told you. I did not think I was revealing any secret. It would have been safe from everybody else. Good-bye."

David walked on homeward. He knew that he was Fergus's nearest friend, but for all that he was not so near as the girl whom his friend had scarcely spoken to six months ago! "Well," David thought to himself, "it is only natural; in fact, it is as it should be."

He pushed open the garden gate at Blenheim House, and made his way to the back door to save Phoebe the trouble of leaving her kitchen.

He lifted the latch and went in. The room was bright with what Phoebe would call a fine "cooking fire," and there were savory smells rising from sundry pots and pans grouped about the grate. But Phoebe, active, bustling Phoebe, sat apart, leaning heavily on the table. A local newspaper lay a little way from her, as if she had given it an impatient push. She sprang to her feet as David entered, and her face was ablaze with wrath, and sorrow, and tears.

"Ye might as well read it at onc't," she said, holding out the journal. "There'll be plenty that'll speak on't, and it's well to have on your front ready. Says the baker's boy to me, 'You look in the second column, third page of our Mercury,' and I saw the milkman a-smirkin'. There's no use in a-hushin' and a-hidin', I sees that. The only way to get rid o' dirty clothes is to wash 'em. Shut 'em out o' sight and they smells! It's a poor work to have set one's life to, that can be all unpicked in a minute, like mine. But oh, Mr. David, Mr. David, don't turn like that, but remember that the Lord Himself says that the son and the father may differ as dark and light, and anybody that reads the Bible knows it!"

For David's face had grown white and rigid over the paragraph which poor Phoebe's thumbing had made painfully conspicuous. But he gently stroked the hand she laid on his arm.

"Don't fear for me," he said.

Still he gathered up the paper in his hand, and went off to his own room and shut himself in.

CHAPTER VII.

DARKNESS AND DAWN.

DAVID MAXWELL kneeled by the side of his bed with the horrible local newspaper in his hand. He was guided by the same instincts which led the old Judean monarch up to the Temple of the Lord to spread out Rabshakeh's letter before the mercy-seat. There is a bitterness which cannot be uttered even in a prayer. We can only show it to God.

There he kneeled, nameless, and with a new shadow resting even on the name that he bore from custom. There lay the Hackney Mercury, with its cruel readiness to make capital out of a shameful story about the dead, which could serve no purpose, except to pain the survivors. There could be no mistake as to who was referred to in its paragraph, though dashes were liberally employed, and X, Y and Z, the only initials used. The phrases of "recently deceased medical man," "questionable popularity," "peculiar domestic arrangements," gave it an individuality which nobody who knew anything about Blenheim House could fail to recognize! Nor could David dare to doubt the particular instance of sin—sin, revolting and futile—which the newspaper reported. The revelation shed a flood of light over Phoebe's mystifications—and over the friendly doctor's disinclination to any professional connection with himself.

We must all look at trouble somewhere. The only question is, where? Shall it be in the glare of our own passions? Or in the cold, hard light of the world's opinion? Or in the softened glory of God's presence?

That last light does not hide any hard facts which the others could reveal. It does not even veil their ugliness. Hideous things look more hideous in the sunshine than in gaslight or candlelight. But the sunshine has a promise in it. It says, "I will dry up this stagnant pool." "I will clothe this yawning chasm with sweet flowers and soft mosses." "I will bring beauty out of burning—I will bring life out of death." So it is with the glory of God's presence.

As David kneeled there, sin and sorrow and shame, empty present and darkened future, passed before him, and showed themselves exactly what they were. God's proper gifts are sight, not blindness, memory, not forgetfulness, clear comprehension, not dull credulity. Because David drew near to God, he only saw more plainly all the happiness that might have been, and all the misery that was, and must be. For God Himself knows, better than any of us, what our lives have lost. And what a comfort it is to know that He knows.

Kneeling there, too, he remembered the text which lay hidden in the secret drawer of the old bureau, "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desire of thy heart."

And for a moment a mist closed about his soul.

Only for a moment. And then it cleared gradually. You and I, reader, who perhaps have but one sorrow in a life of happiness, may be left to walk in that mist for years, having only faith and not sight, concerning the brightness above it. God leaves us there, to let us learn that there is something in every sorrow, which no other mere blessing can heal.

But those who have no comfort, God comforts utterly. "When father and mother forsake us, then the Lord taketh us up."

David suddenly felt like one who stands on a mountain overlooking a fierce struggle in a dark valley below. Sin and sorrow and shame, empty present and darkened future were there, but they lay below him. There were also beautiful things among them, love and joy, and domestic comfort and worldly prosperity, but they, too, lay below him. They were not the very life of the soul. It might have them all, and yet be dumb and dead in misery. The very life of the soul was something above all these. They might come up to it. It could not go down to them. They could not live well nor long without it. It had them all, and more too, in God Himself.

And David felt that as he had gone up himself, he had carried God's promise with him. "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thy heart." The true desire of his heart now, and henceforward, would be something between God and himself—something that no earthly chance or change could touch. They might go and come over it, like clouds floating across a mountain, but it would remain the same forever.

Now, he knew what the Psalmist meant when he said, "Those that trust in Thee, Lord, Thou shalt hide in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man: Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

Oh, it is in the paths of special sorrow and shame, that the bleeding footprints of the Saviour show the plainest, and we can best plant our own steps therein. And it seemed to David as if he heard a brotherly voice say: "I bore all this, and far worse, for thee—canst thou not bear this for me? No, thou canst not without me; but I will be with thee, to make thy bearing easy. My cross was made of this cross of thine, and of every other cross that has ever fallen to any man. And there was none to help me bear mine; for, when they compelled Simon of Cyrene, he could only take it from my back, not from my heart. But I will be with thee to bear both thee and thy cross."

That is how God deals with his foundlings; that is how He deals with all of us, if we only break through all barriers of earthly comforts, and throw ourselves straight upon His heart. And, oh, what tender mercy and loving-kindness there is in such dealing with his foundlings! For, unless He was kind to them first, they would repel other kindness. To their sore hearts sympathy would come like a blow, and help like an insult. But He says, "You see I can comfort you, because I am your Father and your Brother, and because these are your brothers, too, it is well for them if they can give comfort, and well for you if you can take it from them. All the good things of my royal table are thine already, but let thy brothers hand them to thee. Take them so, gladly and thankfully and patiently. If thy brethren's touch seem sometimes rough, bethink thee it may rather be thy great weakness."

Still kneeling there, with the storm within him hushed, and a great calm in his heart and eyes, David heard Phoebe beginning to go to and fro below, and to make an over-ostentatious rattling of dishes. He would fain have stayed where he was a little longer. He needed no food but the spiritual refreshment he was enjoying. But he thought that he had left Phoebe rather abruptly, and that she would be worrying about him, and that it was unkind to waste her housewifely labors by letting the dinner cool untasted. So he rose; he folded up the newspaper and put it away. He would not burn it, that seemed like helpless spite against an enemy he could not destroy. And then he went down-stairs. He had a curious feeling, as if he had parted from somebody—one of those partings where a sacred solemnity enwraps the sorrow as with a robe of consecration. And it was so. He had parted from self. He had given it wholly to God.

Though Phoebe saw he was pale, she saw also that he was calm and cheerful. In a far different sense to what she meant, "he had on his front."

"There's a letter just come for you," she said. "A boy brought it. It's on the parlor table. I don't know who it's from."

David felt the half-recoil of a recently-wounded heart, but was reassured in a moment. Whatever happened, all was in God's hands.

The handwriting was quite strange to him, which was no wonder, for it was Christian Harvey's. George had been intending to obey her counsel, and visit Blenheim House that very morning, but had awoke with a severe cold, which would probably confine him at home for some days. In the course of the morning he and Christian had seen the ugly paragraph in the Hackney Mercury, and had conferred together thereon. Visiting David being out of the question, Christian proposed that they should invite him.

"It is a breach of all etiquette," George had said.

"My dear," said Christian, laughing, "let etiquette, as the school-books say of temper, be your servant, and not your master. Would you stand on this etiquette, if David Maxwell were your brother?"

"But then he would be sure to understand, and not to take offence," George answered.

"I think that now," pleaded his wife; "I see your argument, and it would be right in many cases. But I do believe, from all I heard of David Maxwell whilst I lived in Uncle Devon's vicarage, and from all I have noticed of him since, that he is a true Christian, and quite ready to believe the same of other people, if he can only find the least reason. Therefore, he will not suspect me of telling a lie, when I write the truth, that you are unable to leave the house, and he will credit us with the kindly intention of drawing him a little out of his loneliness. I feel sure he will, George, because if he declined the invitation, I feel that I myself shall believe the excuse he gives, and shall not fancy that he has taken a tiff."

"Is that womanly logic?" George asked, playfully. "Whether it is or not, there is something in it, Chrissy. So take your own way, and write the note yourself, for you have a wonderful knack of conveying your own kind heart between the lines of the commonest compliment. You have a genius for writing notes, Chrissy."

"I do wonder whether he will come," George remarked, presently, as his wife sat down to her desk.

"I am sure he will," she said.

There was an under-note of meaning in her voice, which made George look up and observe, "Why, you inconsistent woman! You said just now, that you would quite believe any reason he gave for staying away."

"So I should," said Christian, oracularly; "for it would be a very good reason that would keep him away from us."

"Why from us, particularly, in the name of wonder?" George asked.

"Because you are Millicent Harvey's brother," his wife answered, succinctly, and looked at her husband, who looked back at her. Their own courting-days were not so very long past; and George Harvey understood at once.

Somehow he exclaimed, "Poor fellow!" It was not in reference to David's circumstances; for George Harvey did not know very much about them. The details that Milly had heard from Fergus Laurie she had kept to herself. George quite supposed that David would be thrown chiefly on his own resources—but it never struck him that the revelation of that day's Mercury would be almost fatal to his medical pursuits, and so set him back once more at the very beginning of life. But even so, one with George Harvey's past was not very likely to despair of anybody's future. Still, George's first exclamation was, "Poor fellow!" Then he asked, "How do you know about it, wife?"

"By my wisdom," she replied, with a smile that was half sad. "I can't help knowing."

"And does my Chrissy think she will try her skill at a little match-making?" George asked, rather gravely.

"No," said Christian, quickly, looking up from her letter. "In this particular instance, I almost wish I did. Milly does not care for David Maxwell."

"Not now," said George, rather archly. "But these things grow. I don't think it is doing you justice to say that I fell in love with you the first evening we met at the vicarage. But I may admit that I was deeply impressed. Yet, of course, you did not care in the least for me till a long time afterward."

Christian's color deepened, and she gave just the least little pout. "That has nothing to do with the present instance, air," she said, loftily. "For, at any rate, I cared for nobody else."

"That infers that Milly does," said George.

His wife gave him another quick look. "I know it," she answered.

"Who is it?" George asked, with keen, brotherly interest.

"I shall not tell," replied his wife, laughing.

"Secrets?" said George. "Chrissy, I am ashamed of you. You should hear nothing that you cannot tell your husband."

"I have heard nothing, and seen nothing, except what your majesty's self has also seen and heard," Christian replied. "Yet, I know, notwithstanding. I can feel when there's love in the air, just as I can when there's thunder! But I never frighten people by prophesying storms, only just get them to take their waterproofs as a precaution against a possible shower! And so, I just watch the poor things who are getting into love, and help them where I can, without frightening them by telling them what a terrible bit of their life they are coming to!"

"Do you mean to say you know before they know themselves?" George asked.

"Oh, dear, yes, long before," said Christian. "The parties concerned always seem the very last to find it out. Dear Milly does not know in the least!"

"If I may ask so much," George went on, "I should like to inquire if the mysterious somebody is also in love."

"Well, yes, in his own way," Christian admitted, half reluctantly.

"That is all you can say for him," said George; "And do you think he knows of Milly's liking?"

Christian paused half a moment. "A great deal better than she does herself," she said, energetically.

"It is clear to me that if you had your own way, you would depose this favorite and substitute David Maxwell," observed George.

"Yes, I should," said Christian. "But then I have no right even to wish for my own way!"

"You must find it wonderfully interesting to be in secret sympathy with all these matters, Chrissy," George remarked.

Christian shook her head thoughtfully. "It is and it isn't," she answered. "It may be always interesting, but sometimes it is sad too. It is pleasant enough when, in all apparent innocence, one can contrive to convey a little counsel or comfort. But it is dreadfully painful when one daren't say what one knows, and yet see help is needed that can't be given without doing so. But one can always pray, George, and that is really the safest interference in love affairs, at any rate, till all is over, and people want cheering or keeping up to their own best selves."

"I suppose my mother felt that," said George, "for though I know what a deep interest she must have taken in our marriages, it was wonderful how she never gave any advice. In my sister Hatty's love affair, before she married Webber, Milly and I were very ready with our dogmas, but mother was only especially silent and sympathetic, till, as you say, it was all over, by Hatty's own act, and then she made no secret of her approbation."

"Ah!" said Christian, "I have always admired Hatty so much for the courage with which she did what she felt was the right and just thing both for herself and her lover. For it takes a great deal of courage to do it, George. The world does not help one. It either believes that the heroine of a broken match was 'jilted,' or it insinuates that if it be possible the breaking was her own act, then she is no true woman, but a false and fickle coquette. As if the mistake of a foolish engagement could be cured by carrying it on to a foolish marriage! Why, when the love is gone, it is the very kindest thing left to do, to remove the vow which is not yet irrevocable."

"I believe it is," said George, thoughtfully. "I remember that Hatty's final refusal seemed to stir up that young Westbrook into a new manliness. I should not have thought it was in him to write such a sensible, sorrowful letter as he wrote to Hatty before he went away. I wonder what has become of him?"

"And now," observed Christian, as she sealed up her letter, "as we are to have a visitor to supper, it is time that I retired to the kitchen to superintend the pudding."

This, therefore, was the letter which half an hour after, David stood reading in his dreary parlor:—

"DEAR MR. MAXWELL,—My husband has been intending to call on you for some days, but delayed, fearing lest he should intrude too soon. Just as he had resolved to procrastinate no more, he finds himself confined to the house by a severe cold. Under these circumstances, we take the freedom of asking if you will give up this evening to us here? We shall be quite alone, and supper will be ready at nine. We both trust you will excuse the great informality of this invitation, and with the assurance of our deepest sympathy,

"I remain, yours faithfully,

"CHRISTIAN HARVEY."

"Phoebe," said David, as she came in to remove the dinner dishes, "I shall be out this evening. I am invited to Mr. George Harvey's."

"I'm glad to hear on't, Mr. David, returned Phoebe, sincerely. "Dearie me," she added to herself, as she went down the passage, "he isn't invited out so often but that it's real wonderful it should be this evening. Those Harveys 'll have seen the Mercury. Well, one can do with an enemy, if one's friends closes round 'em. Them Harveys are the right sort of people."

CHAPTER VIII.

OTHER FOLK'S TROUBLES.

THERE was nothing special to relate about David's visit to Mr. and Mrs. George Harvey. Indeed, its charm lay in the absence of anything special. It was an evening "at home," in the true sense of the word. There were just two candles lighted as there would be, when George and Christian were alone. And though Christian sat unemployed during the first hour's conversation, she had a little work-basket at hand directly George brought forward the chess-board. Then, though the supper-table was graced with a pudding, all of its arrangements were of that easy simple sort which assure a guest that he is neither troublesome nor expensive. It is fitting to make elaborate festival in honor of the friend who can be expected but seldom: the best compliment to the near neighbor who may become the familiar visitor, is to admit him at once to the private style of home. Then the little servant was summoned to family prayer and dismissed to bed, and David felt that the evening which had been such a pleasure to himself had been no hindrance or burden to anybody else.

There was not much "clever" talk. Both George and Christian knew of better mental exercise than metaphysical gymnastics. They preferred to think less about thinking than about the common world around them, and found that upon the whole, this training gave them an immense advantage in the metaphysical gymnasium, whenever they chose to.

trifle there awhile, just as athletes are made by climbing genuine mountains, not by trudging useless tread-mills. Neither of them were at all averse to such "rounds" as they had taken with Fergus and Milly at the Lauries' tea-party, but they and their opponents set a far different value on them. With George and Christian they were scarcely a means to an end; just a pause in the business of life, to count up the items. With Milly, they were a delight, a holiday, something to which she felt as a child feels to household work while it is still "play," before it has set duties of dusting rooms and bed-making. With Fergus, they were the end. To have grand ideas and to associate with those who had, and to live a life that might be filled with such an atmosphere, was the form into which his ambitions were gradually shaping themselves. He never reflected that even a marble palace, with all its beauty, is not a desirable residence, unless its foundations are sound and right!

The group in George Harvey's parlor talked about very much the same subjects as were probably being discussed in the laborers' cottages just behind their house. They talked of the good works that were going forward in the parish, of the recent proceedings in parliament, of chess tactics, of the quality of the muslin that Christian was embroidering. But it was the talk of cultivated people. A pedant cannot hide his vulgarity in his learning, and thought and refinement will come forward even in chat about dusters and darning-needles, just as a beautiful woman remains beautiful in the homeliest garments.

Even with the shadow of death new upon him, and the still more recent horror of the weekly paper, David was far less silent than he had been at the Lauries. He quite wondered at himself. But the mute of one circle is frequently the wit of another, and the characters that we get are often the reflection of those who give them!

But after they had read the evening lesson, and sung Ken's beautiful Evening Hymn, and kneeled together round the family altar, and the servant was gone, and the curious hush of a completed day closed over the little household, a kind of silence fell upon the three, in which they seemed to draw nearer to each other than in the conversation which had gone before. They spoke in low voices of the chapter which had just been read, and then they sat and gazed into the fire. And they all knew what was in each other's thoughts, and David felt a comfort in the knowledge. It was like the grasp of a friendly hand on a dark and dangerous road. And when he rose to go, he could not depart without letting them see the gratitude with which his heart was overflowing.

"It was so good of you,"—it was Christian he addressed (perhaps it was easier to look into her face, because her eyes were not so like Milly's, as George's were). "It was so good of you to invite me here to-night. I know why you did it, Mrs. Harvey."

"It was so good of you to come!" Christian an-
